Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Archie Hamilton and
Mr. Michael Neubert.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): I beg to move amendment No. 68, in page 6, line 4, at end insert—

'(a) direct that any interception in relation to the applicant should cease;'.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 69, in page 6, leave out line 5.

Mr. Corbett: In a sense, we have already had half this debate in relation to the tribunal and the Committee is well aware of the strong feeling among Labour Members, with a distant echo on other Benches, that there should be at least some parliamentary oversight.

These amendments, especially No. 68, deal with the circumstances in which an application has been made to the tribunal and the tribunal, having considered the application, concludes that there has indeed been a contravention in relation to a particular warrant or a certificate.

6.30 pm

In those circumstances, what is set to happen under the Bill? The Bill states that the tribunal shall tell the applicant that this is what happened and shall tell the Prime Minister that this is what has happened. What the Bill does not state is that the tribunal should have the authority to order that that illegal and illicit interception should cease. It is true that the clause goes on to say that the tribunal may order —or, indeed, may not—that the warrant or certificate be quashed. It may direct the destruction of any copies of intercepted material which have been obtained in breach of the certificate or warrant—or, indeed, it may even tell the Secretary of State to put his hand in his pocket and fork out some compensation to the person who has made the application to the tribunal.

As the Bill stands, the tribunal could find that a tap or snoop was out of order, and could say so. But, as I understand the Bill, those breaches could continue in spite of that finding by the tribunal, in spite of its saying that it should not have happened and in spite of the Prime Minister being told, leading to another complaint from the same applicant—and so one would go round this crazy circle once more, which cannot be right.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would accept the proviso that if the tribunal directed that the warrant be quashed, but thereafter the tapping or interception continued, there would be a substantive offence under clause 1 capable of prosecution.

Mr. Corbett: Yes, I understand what the hon. Gentleman says. One of the purposes of the amendment is to make it mandatory on the tribunal, where it finds that the tap or snoop has been illicit, to state that it shall cease. I take the hon. Gentleman's point. That is another route to it, but we believe that it will be more simply done as proposed in amendment No. 68.

It cannot be right in our view to leave matters like this. If the intercept is in breach, the tribunal should be told explicitly to say to those who have been caught simply two words: "Stop it." If not, all the so-called protections which the Home Secretary in earlier debates prayed in aid for the tribunal are, if not quite useless, certainly a first cousin of useless.

I ask the Minister to take one further step in relation to the tribunal by accepting the amendment so that the tribunal can have real effect and teeth by making it mandatory to order that unlawful intercepts will cease. I believe that this will go some way to reassure those many people engaged in lawful activities which challenge, or seek to change, the policies of the Government that the tribunal is properly there to guard against political misuse of the security services. That allegation was present in the "20/20 Vision" film "M15's Official Secrets". The allegation was made that telephones were tapped and mail intercepted to provide information to the DS19 unit at the Ministry of Defence which had been set up to counter CND's growing success in arguing for nuclear sanity.

If the tribunal cannot order an end to interception where that has been found to be in breach of a warrant or certificate, the well-based fears of those properly engaged in these lawful activities, which are a healthy and thriving part of our democracy, will continue.

Even if the Minister says that amendment No. 68 is defective in its wording, I hope that he can offer an assurance to the House that he will take on board what we are saying, and will seek to put the matter right at a later stage.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Despite the intervention that I made in the speech of the hon. Gentleman, I am sympathetic to what he has done. I do not believe that there can be any objection in principle to what is being contemplated, because the Bill as drafted provides for the quashing of the relevant warrant. Once the warrant has been quashed, any interception which is done pursuant to a quashed warrant must be unlawful and constitute an offence under clause 1.

The problem is that the enforcement of clause 1 is dependent upon the Director of Public Prosecutions and his fiat. That will take time, and depends upon the discretion of the DPP. I tend to agree with what has been said from the rather thinly populated Opposition Benches. I think that the tribunal should have the power to issue a directive that the interception should cease. I therefore hope that my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State will give sympathetic consideration to the amendment.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): I am certainly not going to get involved in discussing the "20/20 Vision" film. I merely remind the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) that it really is time that the Opposition stopped talking about it, because it only highlights the fact that most of the misdemeanours, if they were misdemeanours, and most of the allegations, if the allegations were correct, related to the time when the hon. Gentleman's party was in power. It seems extraordinary that the Opposition should keep harping on about it.

Let us come to the matter with which the Committee is concerned. The amendments, which were tabled at the time that other amendments were tabled, were clearly designed to extend the role of the tribunal. Only in that context do they make sense. Now that the amendments extending the role of the tribunal—for instance, into the field of unlawful interception—have been rejected, and the tribunal is to be concerned only with the warrant sections of the legislation and with the question whether interception taking place in pursuance of a warrant can be properly authorised, it is difficult to see how ordering interception to cease could have any different effect from that of quashing the warrant. Once a warrant has been quashed, the Secretary of State's authorisation has been overturned, and interception must cease.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Is my hon. and learned Friend quite right? I think that he is not. Once the warrant has been quashed, the interception, if it continues, becomes unlawful. That means that a prosecution can be commenced, but it does not mean that interception must cease. All he is saying is that it is a criminal offence, prosecutable on the fiat of the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Mr. Waddington: That is precisely what I am saying. Once the authorisation of the Secretary of State has been overturned, interception cannot continue with the authority of the Secretary of State. Therefore, if it continues at all, it can continue only as a criminal offence. That is the way in which the system operates. Those carrying out the tapping would be guilty of a clause 1 offence and liable to conviction and punishment.

Mr. Hogg: Let us assume that the interception continues after the quashing of the warrant, and the person affected by it becomes aware of it. Is there a jurisdiction for such a person to apply to the High Court for an injunction?

Mr. Waddington: That is another matter entirely. I would have thought that we are talking here about the commission of a criminal offence, because the warrant has been quashed, and therefore the remedy of the person affected is to make a complaint to the police, after which prosecution can be initiated, with the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions. We went over this matter yesterday. We debated whether it would be possible to have a system under which a private prosecution could be brought. We concluded that it would not be proper for a prosecution to be brought privately because, if prosecutions could be brought privately, prosecutions could be brought by villains for the purpose of discovering whether lawful interception had taken place. It is not a question of going to the High Court for a remedy; it is a question of a criminal offence having been committed and a prosecution then being possible with the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions.

I return to the amendment. Now that the role of the tribunal is limited to considering whether the Secretary of State has acted properly, there is nothing to be gained by changing the wording of the clause in order to substitute for the words "quash the relevant warrant" the words "interception . . . should cease."

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): I beg to move amendment No. 76, in page 6, line 20, leave out subsection (8).

The Temporary Chairman (Miss Janet Fookes): With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 125, in schedule 1, page 12, line 8, leave out from first 'Tribunal' to the end of line 10.

Mr. Dubs: As the Bill now stands, clause 7(8) seeks to prevent any decision of the tribunal being challenged in any court, including any decision as to the jurisdiction of the tribunal. The purpose of amendment No. 76 is, by deleting subsection (8), to allow decisions by the tribunal to be subject to the jurisdiction of courts.

I have been puzzling about the reason for the subsection. I cannot think of any other tribunal that is totally exempt from appeal to the courts——

Mr. Douglas Hogg: What about planning?

Mr. Dubs: When I said that, I knew that there was bound to be a lawyer in the House who would correct me. I should be happy to have an example given to me. It is certainly extremely rare to have a tribunal that does not allow of any further legal scrutiny of its decision with regard to either points of fact or points of law. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to elucidate or give an example of the tribunal that he is thinking of, I am happy to give way to him.

Mr. Hogg: As the hon. Gentleman will know, one can appeal against planning decisions on points of law, but not on points of fact.

Mr. Dubs: I am not sure whether I am grateful for that intervention because it confirms what I said. I said that I cannot think of any tribunal where no appeal of any sort is allowed, even on points of law. On points of fact, that applies to quite a few tribunals, one of which the hon. Gentleman mentioned. I am asking hon. Members whether they can think of any other tribunal in which there is a restriction equivalent to the one that is the subject of the amendment. It is my contention that if there is one, it has not yet been brought to light by anyone with whom I have discussed the matter.

As a principle, this is rather dangerous. All sorts of things may happen in the tribunal, and there is no possibility of challenging that in any way. No doubt one could appeal to the Minister and make it a political challenge, but by the very nature of the way in which the tribunal is established and the way in which it is likely to operate in conditions of at least some secrecy, it would be difficult to find a basis for such a challenge, politically, if there were no possibility of any court being allowed to challenge the tribunal's decision.

The Malone case gave rise to the Bill—or it was one of the elements that contributed to the Government's feeling that they had to introduce the Bill. That case has been quoted by several hon. Members in earlier debates. Nevertheless, it might help to remind the Committee that the Malone case involved Mr. Malone seeking a High Court declaration on whether his telephone had been lawfully or unlawfully tapped. Although he was unsuccessful, and the case was dismissed in February 1979, at the time the Vice-Chancellor said that telephone tapping "cries out for legislation." The cry was heard, but there was a certain amount of distortion. I cannot believe that in any court of law the Vice-Chancellor would say that telephone tapping "cries out for legislation" with the intention that there would be no possibility of judicial review of the tribunal's decisions. Therefore, we have not only a dangerous but an anomalous principle.

The principles of natural justice may be denied by the way in which the tribunal operates. There is no redress against that. We can think of many examples of how a tribunal might function and of the decisions that it might make that would necessitate, in all justice, the possibility of an appeal against the decision of that tribunal. All those appeals are closed to us.

I am not absolutely clear about the interpretation of this point, so no doubt the Minister will correct me if I am wrong. The Malone case resulted in appeal to the European Court. The subsection states that the decisions of the tribunal shall not be "liable to be questioned in any court."

I assume that that does not affect the European Court. I assume that "any court" excludes the European Court. If it does not, the restriction in the provision is even greater than I thought. Whether or not that is so, I am satisfied —and I am sure that the Committee is satisfied—that this will be difficult for the Minister to justify, and could lead to denials of justice and the tribunal not operating in the way in which other tribunals operate. Therefore, I hope that the Committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I have two brief points to make. First, the statement by the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) that this tribunal process is not subject to any review is too broad, because the Bill provides that copies of every tribunal report should be sent to the commissioner. That is not a fully fledged appeal; I do not pretend that it is. None the less, it is a process of review that has not been taken on board by the hon. Gentleman.

The second point that we have to grasp is that the statutory grounds contained in clause 2 include sensitive material which may be relevant to the issues before the tribunal. The advantage of the tribunal process is that sensitive material can be disclosed and kept confidential. An appeal to the High Court or to a Divisional Court could not be so protected. One would have to have a very complicated apparatus and series of procedures to protect confidential material.

I personally believe that it would be almost impossible to create a leakproof system of appeal if it involved an application to the court, because one needs an immense number of documents and a lot of people knowing a lot of facts who would not be subject to any of the ordinary rules of confidentiality. I suspect that the process would not remain immune from leak. That being so, I should not be able to support the hon. Gentleman should he press his amendment to a Division.

Mr. Maclennan: I believe that the amendment should not be supported. The establishment of the tribunal is designed to enable full consideration to be given to whether the procedures set out by the Bill — the requirements of law — have been observed, but the sensitivity of the sort of material that will have to be considered by the tribunal does not make it appropriate to consider those issues in open court.

However, I have one anxiety about the provision in the Bill that seeks to exclude the jurisdiction of "any court" in these matters. That is that it should not, by indirection, deny to the citizen the right, protected by the European convention on human rights, to have these matters treated as justiciable. Clearly it is not the intention of the Bill to deprive the citizen of the due process of law which that convention guarantees. Indeed, it was part of the effect of the Malone judgment that our own process of law was found to be deficient.

I cannot think that the European Commission or the European Court would regard its own jurisdiction as being in any way interfered with by the terms of subsection (8). However, it is conceivable that, if it were argued before that Commission that there had been a denial of justice of the kind suggested by the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs), it could be held that there had been a violation of the convention giving the citizen the right to a remedy. It would be helpful if the Minister would address himself to that.

This is a curiously difficult area because, although the findings in the Malone case held quite clearly that our provisions in this country were inadequate and did not provide judicial remedies, they did not spell out what would be necessary to satisfy the provisions of the European convention. That was addressed, however, in the earlier Klass case, in which it was held that the protection of the constitutional court, as well as the other administrative procedures which existed, gave a remedy and that it was possible to pursue a legal case against a Government for denial of fundamental rights and freedoms within the domestic courts of the Federal Republic of Germany.

If the tribunal follows the procedures that it is intended it should follow, denial of justice would be a difficult case to make. A case would have to be made before the Commission that some of the procedures amounted to interference with the due process of law. Although I do not think that that is what is intended, it is important to have the Minister's confirmation that it is not, that it is intended that this will give a full and enforceable legal remedy and that the operation of the tribunal will be in accordance with the due process of law.

Mr. Waddington: I will deal first with the matter of the European Court and assure the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) that there is nothing in the Bill that restricts the right to go to the Strasbourg Commission and Court in connection with breaches of the European convention. That is not the effect of this subsection.

The short answer to the point made by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) is that, if there were an appeal to the High Court, there would be no point in having a tribunal at all. My hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) referred to the possibility of leaks if a matter were dealt with by a court. With the greatest respect, that is not the essence of the matter. It is not just a question of a court's being leaky and, even if it tried to hold its proceedings in camera, of what happened before it became known to the general public. If a court had jurisdiction in these matters, there would be no question of its being able to proceed according to the laws of natural justice, because there could be no question of its being able to allow the complainant to know of the information which was the basis of the defence case. There has to be a tribunal because, if there were not one, the court would have to be required not to proceed according to the rules of natural justice. It seems to us infinitely preferable, in these circumstances, to have a tribunal rather than a court.

Having had to have a tribunal because one could not allow the complainant, in the first instance, to go to a court, one could not possibly end up with a tribunal which has a special procedure which does not allow the complainant to know the evidence that is stacked against him, and then allow that same applicant to go on appeal to the court and discover that which one had been careful not to allow him to discover before the tribunal.

That is why we must have a provision in the Bill excluding the jurisdiction of the courts. Without that provision, we should end up with the absurdity of the courts having jurisdiction to hear the appeal but having to have special rules of procedure. That really would not be right.

The 1985 White Paper said:

> "It would clearly be neither sensible nor acceptable to establish means whereby those involved in serious crimes or espionage could learn the basis on which their activities had come to notice; or—perhaps even more damaging—could in some cases confirm whether their activities had come to notice at all."

That is why there has got to be a tribunal with these special procedures conducting its proceedings in private and not revealing to the complainant information passed on to it.

I hope that with this explanation the hon. Member for Battersea will consider it right to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Dubs: I am not totally convinced by what the Minister has said. He said that there would be no point in a tribunal if it were possible to appeal to a court.

Mr. Waddington: What I said was that there would be no point in having a tribunal if the whole matter could be dealt with by the courts. If we had not come to the conclusion that the matter had to be dealt with in the first instance by a tribunal with a special procedure, we might as well have had the whole matter dealt with by a court, with a complainant of unauthorised interception going to the court. We cannot have that, for the reasons I have mentioned.

Mr. Dubs: The difficulty is that the tribunal will operate in such a secret manner that no person who feels a sense of grievance will ever be able to establish whether the tribunal has looked at the evidence properly and considered it from an aggrieved person's point of view. So the Minister is right in saying that, since nobody will have any evidence that justice has been done, why bother about the courts?

Mr. Waddington: That surely is absolute nonsense. One has only to look at the composition of the tribunal. People will be appointed to the tribunal by letters patent. Their office will be as secure as that of the Parliamentary Commissioner. They will be lawyers trained to make judgments in quasi-judicial matters such as this. Surely, in those circumstances, it is completely absurd to undermine the credibility of the tribunal from the start and suggest that anybody who made a complaint to it could not be satisfied that it would be properly looked into.

Mr. Dubs: I have no wish to prolong the debate unduly on this point. The Minister's argument is that there will be worthy people on the tribunal, so nobody will have any reason to suggest that justice has not been done even if an individual with a sense of grievance has no information about the method by which the tribunal reached its decision, what evidence it had, and so on.

Of course, we are in a difficulty because—I fully understand this—some of the information cannot be revealed publicly or to the person about whom there is a dispute. Nevertheless, that is not the same as saying that there ought in no circumstances, for any reason whatsoever, to be any right of appeal against the decision of the tribunal. We could speculate and put forward situations in which everything might have been as the Minister says it would be, yet we would be left with a feeling that there was something not quite right in the way in which the tribunal operated. Therefore, we could still have the feeling that, because there is no way of appealing against what the tribunal has decided, we just have to take it or leave it.

I do not think that the Minister's assertions are an end to the matter. I think there are instances in which a right of appeal would be possible and sensible and would result in justice being done. But the Minister is adamant. I do not think that he has made his case, but perhaps we can return to this on another occasion.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 7, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 8

THE COMMISSIONER

7 pm

Mr. Maclennan: I beg to move amendment No. 79, in page 6, line 38, leave out from beginning to 'to' in line 40 and insert

'Her Majesty may by letters patent appoint a board of five members of Her Majesty's Privy Council which power shall be exercisable on an address presented by the House of Commons, and no motion shall be made for such an address except by the Prime Minister,'.

The Temporary Chairman: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 83, in page 7, line 6, leave out subsection (2).

No. 84, in page 7, line 6, leave out 'Commissioner' and insert 'Board'.

No. 85, in page 7, line 13, leave out 'Commissioner' and insert 'Board'.

No. 86, in page 7, line 13, leave out from 'as' to end of line 14 and insert

'they may require for the purpose of enabling them to carry out their functions under this section'.

No. 89, in page 7, line 16, leave out 'Commissioner' and insert 'Board'.

No. 91, in page 7, line 19, leave out 'Commissioner' and insert 'Board'.

No. 94, in page 7, line 25, leave out 'he' and insert 'they'.

No. 97, in page 7, line 28, leave out 'Commissioner' and insert 'Board'.

No. 99, in page 7, line 29, leave out 'his' and insert 'their'.

No. 103, in page 7, line 33, leave out 'Commissioner' and insert 'Board'.

No. 104, in page 7, line 35, leave out 'Commissioner' and insert 'Board'.

No. 120, in Clause 11, page 10, line 12, leave out 'Commissioner' and insert 'Board'.

Mr. Maclennan: The purpose of the amendments is to make two important changes to the way in which the Secretary of State's functions, when carrying out his responsibility to issue warrants for the interception of communications, is reviewed. The way in which these functions have been carried out in the past has caused public disquiet. We want to ensure that Secretaries of State responsible for authorising interception act in accordance with the highest traditions of probity and legality.

Earlier, we considered Parliament's role. I have said that I do not think that Parliament, either through a Select Committee or by any other means, can review such matters if an investigation into the Executive's conduct in the day-to-day operations of the security services is involved. However, Parliament has an overriding responsibility to ensure that a proper review is conducted. Parliament cannot be satisfied with the appearance at the Dispatch Box of a Prime Minister announcing the setting up of an inquiry or giving a general assurance after a breakdown.

The principle in clause 8 that the commissioner should be responsible for reviewing the conduct of Secretaries of State is sound. However, Parliament itself, rather than the Prime Minister, as head of the Government and head of the security services, should be able to appoint the commissioner. Parliament and the public will be more satisfied as to the competence, probity and tenacity of the body entrusted with that function if Parliament has indicated who it prefers to carry out that task.

The method of appointment which I propose is that which is followed by Parliament when it appoints the Comptroller and Auditor General, although that appointment is subject to the agreement of the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee. I do not suggest that the appointment of a board of five Privy Councillors should be subject to the approval of any individual Member of Parliament or of any Select Committee. The appointment should be subject to the approval of the House as a whole.

There is a precedent for such a mode of appointment. I believe that Parliament would welcome such a method, because it entrusts hon. Members with the task of choosing five suitable Privy Councillors to exercise the commissioner's role. The five need not necessarily be members of the Commons, or of the Lords, but Parliament would probably think it appropriate that those who had held high office and had issued warrants for the interception of communications would be suitable to consider whether Government practices are appropriate and whether they conform not only with the law but with good administration.

The five Privy Councillors would be better suited to carry out that function than would a judge. I regret that the public no longer perceive judges in the way that they did 10 years ago. Judges are independent. High ranking judicial officers are men of independence and great public spirit, but, because of the change in the public's perception of the judiciary, a judge is no longer regarded as totally independent of the Executive. That change in public opinion is measured by the popular public opinion polls. A recent Gallup poll drew attention to the changed perception of the independence of judges. Because of that, a judge is not necessarily the right person for the task of overseeing senior Ministers.

The problem is increased because the appointment is to be by the Prime Minister, who has overriding responsibility for security. There should be a disjunction between the Prime Minister's responsibility for security and the appointment of the person whose continuing task is to oversee the conduct of the Prime Minister and Secretaries of State. It is right that the Prime Minister's voice should be heard. Amendment No. 79 provides for an address to be presented by the House of Commons and states:

"no motion shall be made for such an address except by the Prime Minister".

The Prime Minister will have a substantial voice in the nominating process, although the appointment by Her Majesty by letters patent of five members of the Privy Council will be done on the basis of an address by the House of Commons. The independence of the five Privy Councillors can be assured by the obvious need to maintain a balance for ensuring that the task of oversight is not carried out by a single commissioner.

I believe that the appointment of Lord Bridge and his conduct of the recent inquiry into Cathy Massiter's allegations were extremely unfortunate. He was unwise to take on the task. It was impossible to reassure the public by discharging the task in that way. The fault lies with the Prime Minister for having asked Lord Bridge to take on the task, but Lord Bridge was unwise to accept it. That point has been forcefully expressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins).

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): Why?

Mr. Maclennan: The matters that had given rise to public anxiety could not conceivably have been investigated properly or in depth in a weekend. The terms of reference of the inquiry were so narrow that they excluded many of the matters that had given rise to public anxiety. That is why Lord Bridge made himself appear to be a tool of the Executive.

Mr. Norris: In fairness to Lord Bridge, is it not right to say that, as the present monitor, he was given a narrow brief, and therefore was unable to delve into the matters which some people would have liked him to investigate? Surely Lord Bridge's integrity, ability or judgment cannot be questioned on that basis.

Mr. Maclennan: The hon. Gentleman seeks to defend Lord Bridge's ability, integrity and judgment. I did not attack Lord Bridge's ability or integrity, but I did attack, and shall persist in attacking, his judgment. It was extremely unwise for a high-ranking judge to take on such a duty. It was an embarrassment to the Bench. I believe that the point has been well made and that it need not be laboured. It was not just unwise for Lord Bridge to take on that task; it would have been unwise for any judge to do so. It was peculiarly unwise for Lord Bridge to take on the task, because of his continuing responsibilities. He was asked to judge the effectiveness with which he was conducting his continuing scrutiny of public matters.

Mr. Mark Carlisle: The hon. Gentleman is totally misguided and unfair. Lord Bridge is the judicial monitor who is responsible for these matters. Surely he was the obvious judge to carry out the task. It would have been wrong for Lord Bridge to decline to carry out that task, which the Prime Minister asked him to perform. He was asked to review the interceptions that were made in previous years to confirm that they accorded with proper principle in the carrying out of individual warrants. Surely, because of his position, Lord Bridge was the one person who was qualified to look at that matter, although I agree that he was given limited scope. It was not his fault that he had limited scope. If the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) was correct to criticise Lord Bridge, why did he happily agree that interceptions during his period of office should be investigated by Lord Bridge?

Mr. Maclennan: My right hon. Friend the Member for Hillhead had nothing to hide, nor, I assume, did other right hon. Members who had held high office. The right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) shows a strange insensitivity to public opinion in believing that those who were concerned about the way in which those powers had been exercised could have been satisfied by appointing Lord Bridge and giving him what the right hon. and learned Gentleman admitted was an extremely restricted remit which had to be carried out in about four days. That is a matter of judgment. My judgment is that Lord Bridge not only failed to reassure public opinion, but damaged the independence of the Bench by putting himself in a position where he had to carry out the Prime Minister's will.

With that case in mind, I believe that the proposal that a review should be conducted by a single judge is no longer an adequate way of dealing with a continuing problem. I say that with regret, because in the past that proposal might have commended itself to hon. Members. A decade ago, hon. Members might have thought that a senior member of the Bench would be an entirely appropriate person to carry out the task because of his independence of mind and character.

There is a further important reason why I believe that the appointment of a judge is inappropriate——

Mr. Douglas Hogg: How many more minutes?

Mr. Maclennan: The hon. Gentleman is not obliged to remain in the Chamber in a semi-comatose posture if he finds the debate uninteresting.

The Temporary Chairman: Order. May I make it clear to the Committee that I deplore seated interventions. Hon. Members must either be quiet or seek to intervene in the normal way.

Mr. Maclennan: There is a further reason why I believe that a judge is not the appropriate person to conduct this continuing review. It is that the judge is not being asked to discharge a judicial role. He is being asked to scrutinise the conduct of certain senior members of the Executive in difficult matters. Judging whether actions are properly undertaken is not a matter of evaluating the law and ascertaining whether regulations have been followed entirely. The Home Secretary has told us that it is a matter of considering whether discretions have been properly exercised. That is not best done by legal analysis, or even by judicial analysis. It would be much better if it were done by those who had had to exercise such judgments for themselves. When an issue of national security is at stake, it would be better if the evaluation of whether the Secretary of State made a decision correctly was carried out by someone who had previously had to evaluate whether the interests of the security of the state would be harmed by not authorising a telephone tap.

There is a powerful case for ensuring that the scrutiny of the functions of Secretaries of State is conducted not by an individual but by several people whose seniority is such that they have some experience of the conduct of such matters and whose judgment has been proved in the House of Commons to show that they are fit to hold high office. Privy Councillors are conscious of the needs of security and absolute secrecy in accordance with their oaths. The parliamentary responsibility for oversight is not finally discharged by ensuring that that body shall be appointed by the letters patent procedure. It is appropriate that the board of five Privy Councillors should be answerable to the House. The provision in the Bill is a little short of what is required, and we may wish to return to this matter later.

There is a case for the report of the commissioner being considered by a Select Committee, whose findings might be suitable for report to and debate in the House. Whether or not we go down that route, the House will feel greater satisfaction if it is acting upon the report of a board of five Privy Councillors, rather than on the advice of a single commissioner appointed by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Norris: I have listened to speeches by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) not only on this Bill but on what is now the Data Protection Act, when he, my hon. and learned Friend the Minister and I served on the Committee. I have often found the hon. Gentleman's observations to be lucid and helpful, but I regret that on this occasion I must say that I have never heard such nonsense——

Mr. Douglas Hogg: And at such length.

Mr. Norris: Indeed, as my hon. Friend reminds me, it was a long speech.

There are two points on which I fundamentally disagree with the hon. Gentleman. I profoundly disagree with his uncharacteristically jaundiced view of the independence of the judiciary, and especially his unwarranted attack on Lord Bridge. There may have been an argument for widening the scope of the inquiry which the Prime Minister asked Lord Bridge to conduct, but that is a matter for debate elsewhere and on another occasion. There can be no doubt that at all times Lord Bridge fulfilled the warrant that had been given to him by the Prime Minister and that he discharged it, as far as we are aware, as well as could be expected.

The hon. Gentleman prefaced his attack on Lord Bridge by suggesting that a Gallup poll had indicated that esteem for the judiciary was on the wane. That might, in part, arise from the number of unreasonable attacks by Opposition Members on decisions by various members of the judiciary during the mining dispute. I do not believe that any responsible person has any lower opinion of the judiciary now than that which he has held for many years.

Clause 8(1) refers to the appointment of the commissioner as "a person who holds or has held a high judicial office."

There would be few of us in this Committee who could not think of a number of eminent judges, or former judges, who would not be entirely suitable to fulfil that description. Therefore, I entirely reject the notion that such a person would be unsuitable to carry out the functions of the commissioner.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about the desirability of divorcing the Executive from the judiciary in the authorisation of interceptions. I agreed with him yesterday that some divorcing of Executive and judiciary functions, both of which are elements of the authorisation of interceptions, was not only desirable, but that the absence of such a mechanism was a major defect of the Bill. I very much regret that the Committee chose not to approve the amendments that I tabled seeking to effect that divorce of functions. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman's amendments do not achieve the objectives that he has set himself.

Amendment No. 79 requires us to

"leave out from beginning to 'to' in line 40 and insert 'Her Majesty may by letters patent appoint a board of five members of Her Majesty's Privy Council which power shall be exercisable on an address presented by the House of Commons, and no motion shall be made for such an address except by the Prime Minister,'."

The hon. Gentleman appears to want to substitute the five Privy Councillor members of the board for the commissioner. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) reminded us, as members of the Privy Council they could all also be senior judges. The hon. Gentleman wants to replace the commissioner with that body, not only in respect of the first function, which is

"to keep under review the carrying out by the Secretary of State of the functions conferred on him", but also the second function, which is

"to give the Tribunal such assistance as the Tribunal may require."

It is unreasonable to move such an amendment when, implicit in the clause, are functions which can be carried out only by an individual. If the hon. Gentleman had moved an amendment to delete the first three words—"The Prime Minister"—and to substitute "Five Privy Councillors", thereby suggesting that it should be the five Privy Councillors who appointed the commissioner, I would have had more sympathy with the amendment. I believe that on those two fundamental grounds the hon. Gentleman's amendments are unworkable.

One of the functions referred to in clause 8(1)(a) is to keep under review clauses 2 to 5 of the Bill and the manner in which they are exercised. They include the definition of the only crucial part of the Bill where the commissioner will have to exercise discretion, and that is in the matter of the definition which my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) brought to our attention yesterday. My hon. Friend rightly suggested that the real difficulty in interpreting the Bill was that of defining precisely what is meant by the three grounds on which warrants are to be authorised. The commissioner, or the Privy Councillor body, will have the role of interpreting those criteria. The Committee had the opportunity to give a precise definition, but in its wisdom decided not to exercise that option.

I believe that all the amendments in this group would be unhelpful to the cause which in many ways the hon. Gentleman seeks to espouse, so I ask my hon. Friends to reject them.

7.30 pm

Mr. Soley: We thought that we might lose the vote on the amendment which my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) moved on Select Committee control. We then looked closely at this amendment and, because it seemed to call for a degree of parliamentary control, we were not unsympathetic to it.

Then I heard the speech proposing the amendment by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), which came close to dissuading me from supporting it. I had to re-read amendment No. 79 to make sure that I could still feel sympathetic towards it. I keep a list of solicitors and barristers whom I would pay not to defend me. He is now on that list. He made out about the worst possible case for the amendment that could be made.

It is nonsense to describe the situation in the way that the hon. Gentleman described it. In one breath he wanted parliamentary control and, in the next, he wanted that control to be exercised by Privy Councillors who were not even in the Houses of Parliament. What troubles me so much about the Social Democrats and Conservative Members is that they end up distrusting Parliament. The Labour party says on this issue that we should be giving more control to hon. Members because Parliament, through the Home Secretary and the Prime Minister, controls the security services. What, then, would be the point of bringing in Privy Councillors from outside Parliament?

A case could, I suppose, be made out for Privy Councillors doing the job. I would rather have the control done by way of Select Committee, as we said earlier. Failing that, a case could be put forward for Privy Councillor control. Whatever case might be made for that, the case adduced by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland was extremely poor. Nevertheless, the hon. Gentleman's amendment would allow for a degree of parliamentary control, and I have in mind the words of the amendment rather than the hon. Gentleman's words that will appear in the Official Report. We are not unsympathetic to his idea, although it is far from a good amendment.

We challenge the Government to say what degree of parliamentary control will be exercised over the interception of communications as proposed in the Bill when all that we shall have is a continuation of the present system, with the Home Secretary and Prime Minister doing it. I pointed out earlier that, with the best will in the world, no Prime Minister or Home Secretary can give sufficient time and attention to all the workings of the tribunal, the commissioner and the others involved to ensure the control that the public rightly seek.

As I said in the debate on the last amendment, people in almost every other country in the western world have, and expect, that sort of control. That is what we seek. The amendment represents a poor second best—made worse by the way in which the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland moved it—but at least it would give an element of parliamentary control.

Mr. Waddington: I am a kindly chap and it is not my habit to rub salt into wounds. After the demolition done by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris), it is not necessary for me to say much. We have spent an inordinately long time on a completely worthless amendment which was introduced in an extraordinary way by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), whom I admire and with whom I am often forced to agree. On this occasion, however, he presented a ludicrous case.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland said, among other things, that the public's perception of the independence of the judiciary had declined. I agree with my hon. Friends who said that it was about time that we in Parliament made it plain that there was no justification for any loss of confidence in our judiciary, for we know how independent they are.

In considering, for example, the monitor, now the commissioner, it is ludicrous to say that there should be a different method of appointment or he would not be respected as independent. We are talking about somebody, in the case of the present monitor, who holds high judicial office. It is ridiculous to say that it is necessary to have another form of appointment to persuade the general public that such a man is prepared to perform independently.

It was preposterous for the hon. Gentleman to say that it had been unwise for Lord Bridge to take on the job that he had been asked to do. Far too many people have deliberately set out to confuse the public about the task that was given to Lord Bridge. That task was purely to see whether warrants issued by the Home Secretary had been properly authorised, according to the guidelines. It is clear that that task was entirely appropriate for somebody who, for more than a year, had been exercising the role of monitor and had a knowledge of the way in which the system worked. He was the obvious person to carry out the task.

It is shaming that members of the hon. Gentleman's party should have made press statements and comments in Parliament denigrating a fine public servant who, on this occasion, was rightly prepared to carry out a task which he had been asked by the Prime Minister to perform.

The essence of the case put forward by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland was that the role was one not for a judge but for a board of Privy Councillors. What absolute rubbish. The commissioner is the successor of the monitor, whose post has been in existence sice 1980. His job is to keep under continuous review the way in which the Secretary of State carries out his duties. He can go where he likes and see what material he likes. It is a policing role carried out by someone who commands public confidence, who is absolutely independent, who has an experienced legal mind and who can act independently and decisively.

The work which I have just described is not work for a committee of any sort. We are not talking about a committee of inquiry designed to produce recommendations about an incident. We are talking about a continuing review of the exercise of discretion and all of the associated administrative procedures. It is ludicrous to say that such a role could be carried out by a committee. In those circumstances, with great confidence I invite the Committee to reject the amendment.

Mr. Maclennan: I listened carefully to the slender arguments adduced by the Minister and the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) and to the patently malignant remarks of the hon. Member on the Opposition Front Bench, the name of whose constituency eludes me. [HON. MEMBERS: " Hammersmith"]. I refer, of course, to the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley).

Mr. John Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): Perhaps it would be advisable for the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) to come nearer the Opposition Front Bench so as more easily to see the hon. Member to whom he is referring. Otherwise there may be much confusion in the Official Report about who said what.

Mr. Maclennan: Only one Labour Member has deigned to speak on the amendment. I am sure that Hansard will not have any difficulty in determining who that hon. Member was. His reputation, in any event, runs before him.

The Minister allowed his attitudes to be put forward as a substitute for reason on this occasion. I regret that, because he is a thoughtful man who normally listens to argument and does not take refuge in words such as "preposterous," as he did on this occasion.

The Minister, like his hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East, failed to analyse the function of the commissioner. It is not a judicial function in any sense. It is not a function of evaluating evidence and reaching a verdict. It is that of conducting a continuing inquiry into Executive activities. I do not believe that judges are the right people to carry out that type of inquiry at that level.

The Minister did himself less than justice in being so dismissive of the possibility of a committee of Privy Councillors being the appropriate body to conduct a continuing inquiry. When it suits the Government, that is precisely what they set up. They established a committee of Privy Councillors to look into the conduct of the Falklands campaign. It was analogous, and involved high executive decisions taken by Secretaries of State on issues of national security. It was precisely the sort of matter in which it would have been wrong to ask a judge to intervene. It is far more appropriate for someone of the calibre of Lord Franks or the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) to conduct such an inquiry.

An inquiry by Privy Councillors into matters that touch on national security would carry weight. That is what we seek to ensure. The review of the exercise of the functions would be seen by the public and Parliament to carry weight.

I must retract one of my remarks about Lord Bridge. I have no criticism of his abilities or his public-spiritedness. He is an eminent man, who has reached his eminence through the demonstration of his qualities of character and mind. However, it was a mistake to give an individual judge such a task. It was the Government's mistake. It was a mistake for a judge to seek to discharge that role. Lord Bridge made that mistake. It would be a mistake for a judge to accept the role of commissioner under the terms of clause 8. However, if Parliament wishes and prefers to entrust that task to a judge than to a committee of Privy Councillors, no one will quarrel with that.

I must confront head-on the Minister's allegation that I was contributing to undermining the public's esteem of the Bench. That is a complete misconception. I specifically said that I believed that the judiciary was independent, and was properly regarded as such. However, I must draw attention to changing public opinion, and Ministers who are not aware of it are simply out of touch. The Minister should not seek to turn the charge against me. As a lawyer I have nothing but admiration for the Bench, its independence, integrity and public-spiritedness. I regret that the Minister thought that his weak argument would be bolstered by making a personal accusation of that kind. It was uncharacteristic and I hope that, on reflection, he will regret it.

Amendment negatived.

7.45 pm

Mr. Dubs: I beg to move amendment No. 82, in page 6, line 42, leave out from first 'the' to 'and' in line 2 of page 7 and insert 'matters referred to in sections 1 and 6 above'.

The Temporary Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments:

No. 90, in page 7, line 19, leave out subsection (5) and insert—

'(5) If at any time it appears to the Commissioner that there has been a contravention of sections 2 to 6 above which has not been the subject of a report made by the Tribunal under section 7 above he shall refer the matter to the Tribunal for investigation under that section.

(5A) If at any time it appears to the Commissioner that any arrangements made for the purposes of section 6 above have proved inadequate he shall make a report to the Prime Minister with respect to those arrangements.'.

No. 92, in page 7, line 20, after 'that' insert

'an offence under section 1 above has been committed or'.

No. 93, in page 7, line 20, leave out '2' and insert '1'.

No. 96, in page 7, line 26, after 'that', insert 'offence or'.

No. 100, in page 7, line 30, at end insert

'nothing shall prevent the Commissioner from reporting upon any matter which he considers to be connected to the matters referred to in sections 1 to 6 of this Act, nor from making recommendations for the better regulation of the matters referred to in this Act'.

No. 101, in page 7, line 30, at end insert

'that report shall enumerate the number of occasions on which it appears to the Board that there has been a contravention of sections 2 to 5 above'.

No. 106, in page 7, line 40, at end add

'which exclusion may not remove the enumeration of the apparent contravention of sections 2 to 5 above referred to in subsection (6) above'.

No. 108, in page 7, line 40, at end add—

'(9) Where it seems appropriate to the Board and following consultation with the Prime Minister, the Board may report to the Tribunal its opinion that there has been a contravention of sections 2 to 5 above. On such a report the Tribunal shall notify any person who would in its opinion be entitled under section 7(2) to apply to the Tribunal for an investigation that it has received such a report from the Board.'.

Mr. Dubs: These amendments deal with the powers of the commissioner. I shall refer specifically to amendments Nos. 82, 93 and 100. All the amendments seek to widen the role and the functions of the commissioner.

Amendment No. 82 seeks to give the commissioner a wider role than that envisaged in the Bill. He would not merely supervise the Secretary of State in complying with the procedural requirements of the Bill, but would have the power to review the entire area of the interception of communications. He would also have a responsbility to review the extent of unauthorised interception which is not covered in the present arrangements for the commissioner's powers.

Amendment No. 93 would oblige the commissioner to report on any unauthorised or inappropriate interceptions which have been discovered, apart from any which may have been reported to the tribunal. Amendment No. 100 is intended to strengthen the role of the commissioner so that he could act as a watchdog over all operations which involve the interception of communications. It would allow the commissioner to review and comment on connected or related matters such as the visual surveillance of individuals or the infiltration of organisations. Why is it necessary for the commissioner to have wider powers than those envisaged in the Bill? I shall give some examples to justify the wider powers.

I shall deal with an incident that occurred a couple of weeks ago near my constituency, which is directly relevant to the amendments. The South London Hospital for Women and Children had been occupied by many women protesting against its closure. They had made contacts in the locality with many friendly people whose telephones they could use in their flats or houses, and where they went for cups of coffee. Those telephone numbers were on a list which the people occupying the hospital had made available. As a result of a court order obtained by the district local health authority, the police went in one night and removed the protesters.

On that evening four of the telephones in the neighbouring flats which had been part of the support system for the women occupying the hospital went out of action until the morning and then, miraculously, they started to work again. Hon. Members must decide whether that was a coincidence. However, I suggest that it is stretching the arm of coincidence too far for that to have occurred merely through a malfunctioning of the telephone system. Either the telephones were being intercepted and it was decided on the night when the police removed the protesters that to stop any support being marshalled it would be better to put the telephones out of order, or they were put out of order as part of a process of interception. It may have been a pure coincidence that four telephones went out of order. Other telephones may also have gone out of order, but I have not had time to check on that. I heard about the matter when people telephoned me to tell me what had happened.

I would like the commissioner to have the power to look into such an incident, and to be able to investigate such interception or interference with the telephones of ordinary people. At present there is no way in which people who feel their telephones have been interfered with have a right or the ability to have those wrongs redressed. If a commissioner had that responsibility, he could investigate and discover whether it was a coincidence or a deliberate attempt to undermine the ability of those women to telephone for more support on the night in question. However, if the events relating to the closure of the hospital were an isolated incident, one could say, "All right, it happened once".

We know well that whenever a cruise convoy leaves Greenham common heading westwards through Newbury towards Salisbury plain those people who are monitoring the movements of that convoy—this debate is not the occasion to go into the merits of that activity, but it is legal—and who telephone one another or who would like to to say that the convoy is heading down a road find suddenly that their telephones cease to function. There is no way in which that type of interference, which is what I allege it is, is within any of the terms of reference or the parameters which have been laid down by the Home Secretary or are suggested in the Bill.

Mr. Mark Carlisle: Perhaps I misunderstand what the hon. Gentleman has said, but surely what he is saying, if it be right, would be a matter for the tribunal rather than the commissioner. I thought that the tribunal was there to judge as the body to which the individual could go. As I understand it, the commissioner is more a judicial monitor. Although I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's argument that it is necessary to expand the role in the way he put forward, if it were, surely it would be the tribunal rather than the commissioner.

Mr. Dubs: I understand what the right hon. and learned Gentleman is saying. We are in some difficulty because the amendments seek to widen the role and functions of the commissioner and I therefore have to illustrate that predicament. As the Bill is at present drafted, it is unlikely that the incidents to which I have referred would be appropriate for the tribunal, because it would be argued that they do not necessarily represent interception of telephone communications so much as interference with or prevention of them. That being so, the amendments allow the commissioner to consider the wider question rather as some of us had hoped Lord Bridge would consider the wider question. I take the right hon. and learned Gentleman's point. It might be logical, if my argument were to be accepted, that one should also consider the functions, responsibilities and terms of reference of the tribunal and similarly to widen those responsibilities as I am seeking to widen those of the commissioner.

If the Minister were to accept the argument—I do not know that he will, even in the genial mood in which he is this evening—we could sort out the details on Report. There is a gap in the legislation and it is that gap to which I am drawing attention.

I shall return to the example of Lord Bridge which relates to the amendment. In a sense, the responsibility given by the Prime Minister to Lord Bridge recently in the context of anxiety about the "20/20 Vision" film about MI5 was narrow. I am not seeking to criticise Lord Bridge for the way in which he carried out his task. His terms of responsibility were so narrow that the conclusion to which he came was so inevitable that it was hardly worth his while carrying out the task. All he said was that no warrant for interception had been issued in contravention of the proper criteria, but the point about the "20/20 Vision" film and the amendments in relation to the commissioner are that other things may happen which are not directly and simply a matter of the precise way in which the Home Secretary has authorised an interception.

Clause 8(1)(a) states in relation to the functions of the commissioner:

"to keep under review the carrying out by the Secretary of State of the functions conferred on him by sections 2 to 5".

It is a matter there of saying, "Is the Home Secretary carrying out the functions as he should?" There was a clear implication with the "20/20 Vision" film not that the Home Secretary, or successive Home Secretaries, had authorised some of the things that the film revealed, but that they had been carried out without any authorisation. That is the difference.

If Lord Bridge had been given different terms of reference, he might well have been able to come up with conclusions relevant to the charges made in the film. There are three matters which are relevant to the amendments. Lord Bridge should have been asked to answer the following three questions. First, did the interceptions and other forms of surveillance shown in the film take place? After all, the film was a matter of allegations. Secondly, who authorised them? Thirdly, if they were not authorised, how did it come about that any of them were carried out in an unauthorised manner? If those three questions had been answered, we should have had a longer and much more revealing report, although it would have taken Lord Bridge longer to investigate.

In the amendments, I am seeking to establish wider terms of reference which would allow the commissioner, if on any future occasion allegations were made similar to those in the MI5 film, to carry out the task which many of us hoped that Lord Bridge would have been able to carry out.

It is a matter of the terms of reference. I have conceded the right hon. and learned Gentleman's argument about the terms of reference of the tribunal, but, nevertheless, I should like to feel that if there were unease in the future the commissioner could study the whole range of allegations, because unless allegations are investigated how can any of us be satisfied that the events that we have been told about have been happening? As the Bill now stands, we may have further MI5 films and further investigations by the commissioner along the lines of the Lord Bridge inquiry, and none of us will be happy that the truth has come out.

The Minister owes it to the House and, obliquely, to Lord Bridge and to whoever will be appointed commissioner to modify the Bill. I hope that that will be done by accepting these amendments so that the type of anxiety that I have expressed will not be felt in the future.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I should like to speak to amendments Nos. 92 and 96. I shall anticipate the criticism that is likely to be made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) and say that the amendments are mirrored by amendments Nos. 63 and 75 which I tabled previously with respect to the tribunal's powers.

The purpose of amendments Nos. 92 and 96 is similar to that which the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) sought to achieve. It is desirable that the commissioner should be empowered to determine whether an offence has been committed under clause 1. That is a jurisdiction which I wish to give to the tribunal as well. On reading the Bill, it seemed that the commissioner, as is also the case with the tribunal, is empowered to consider almost anything other than whether a substantive offence under clause 1 has been committed.

The commissioner receives the tribunal's report. He determines whether the Home Secretary is acting within the scope of the jurisdiction conferred on him by clause 2. The commissioner is empowered to determine whether the time limits have expired or have not been adhered to. He is empowered to determine whether the Home Secretary has complied with the procedure necessary to obtain a warrant. They are all proper matters for the commissioner to determine, but the one matter which he is precluded from determining is whether there has been unauthorised tapping, which is an offence under clause 1.

For the life of me I cannot understand why the commissioner, who receives information which discloses prima facie evidence of an offence under clause 1, should not be empowered to say, "This is my conclusion." Indeed, there are powerful reasons why he should. This is an infringement of the liberty of the subject. It is a criminal offence. At the discretion of the DPP, it is prosecutable. Why should not the commissioner draw the commission of an offence to the attention of the Prime Minister in the course of his report? He should do so. I would be very pleased if my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State could accede at least to the spirit of the amendment.

Mr. Maclennan: I rise to support the amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg). He has deployed his arguments with brevity and cogency and I will not animadvert further upon them. I should like, however, to commend to the Committee amendment No. 90 in the name of my hon. Friends and myself.

As the Bill is drafted, the procedures for investigating contraventions are somewhat inadequate. Only the tribunal will be able to investigate complaints by the public under the terms of clause 7(2), and neither the commissioner nor the Prime Minister seems to have any obligation to inform the tribunal of contraventions found by the commissioner. Someone whose communications have been wrongly intercepted may never know or suspect what has happened. As such contraventions cannot be considered by the ordinary courts or, under the terms of clause 9, even referred to in them, the commissioner should have an obligation to refer all contraventions to the tribunal.

Amendment No. 90 is designed to ensure that that should happen. It will also require the commissioner to have regard to the safeguards in clause 6 in deciding whether there had been a contravention. The commissioner would only report to the Prime Minister on the adequacy of the safeguards, as he or she would receive reports from the tribunal of its findings on any contraventions under clause 7(4).

Mr. Waddington: The Opposition amendments and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) give the commissioner a role other than that provided for in the scheme of the Bill. The amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) and his hon. Friends deal with a different point, but one that is also important. I promise not to be rude to the hon. Gentleman again.

The commissioner's role is to undertake from within a continuing review of everything concerned with authorised interception. That is often forgotten. His role is to ensure that warrants have been properly authorised. That task is entirely appropriate for a senior judicial figure and is one that a single person can effectively undertake.

Offences against the criminal law, on the other hand, are a matter for the police. What is the commissioner supposed to review in connection with clause 1? Is he supposed to supervise the adequacy of investigations or to become the recipient of allegations of criminal conduct that should be made to the police? I do not know. The commissioner has manageable duties under the Bill. How could he look into the operation of clause 1? His task is within Government. He has to consider whether, when the Secretary of State has authorised a warrant, he has done so correctly. It is not the commissioner's job to roam the country asking people whether they have heard funny clicks on their telephone lines.

I am not being frivolous. If the commissioner's job is other than to work within Government to make sure that when the Home Secretary issues a warrant he does so properly, what is his job? Is he to wander round the country in an investigative role? If so, is he the appropriate person to carry out that role? Is he to consider the way in which the police investigate offences? That would not be appropriate. Is he to be the recipient of complaints from members of the public that they think their wires have been tapped? That, again, would be inappropriate. That is a job for the police. I do not think for a moment that the commissioner could investigate the operation of clause 1. We should not muddle inquiries into offences, which are one distinct matter, with the duties of the commissioner, which are another.

My hon. Friend the Member for Grantham has raised — not in his own speech — a different point. What should happen if by chance, while carrying out his duties, the commissioner came across unlawful interception? Clearly, we in no way accept the implication that public servants will engage in unlawful interception contrary to clause 1. It is inherently unlikely that the commissioner will come across unlawful interception in the course of his duties, as his duties are undertaken within the Government, ascertaining whether the Secretary of State has issued warrants properly according to the guidelines.

In the unlikely event of his discovering that there has been unlawful interception, the commissioner is hardly likely not to bring to the attention of the authorities such evidence of an offence as he has discovered. In that respect, he would behave no differently from any other responsible person to whom evidence of an offence became available.

Amendment No. 101 stipulates that the commissioner's report should state the number of occasions when clauses 2 to 5 had been contravened.

Mr. Maclennan: I did not speak to amendment No. 101 because I assumed that it had fallen with an earlier amendment to which I spoke. However, I would be grateful for the Minister's remarks on it.

Mr. Waddington: I do not wish to speak for longer than necessary. Unless the hon. Gentleman particularly wants me to deal with that amendment, it would be more profitable for me to deal with matters about which hon. Members have shown concern.

Other amendments in the group suggest that the commissioner should report to the tribunal matters that have apparently not come to its notice, that the tribunal should then notify the person or persons concerned, and that the commissioner should report to the Prime Minister about any arrangements under clause 6 that he considers inadequate. There are considerable practicable difficulties in what is suggested. The tribunal is not supposed to substitute its own views for those of the Secretary of State, but rather to consider whether he has acted reasonably. The commissioner would be looking for cases in which something had gone wrong with the system. For instance, there might be a case in which the Home Secretary had acted reasonably but in which subsequent events had cast doubt on the reliability of the sources of his information. The commissioner will be able to question the wisdom of the issue of particular warrants without disputing the reasonableness of the Secretary of State's decision.

Presumably, if the necessary consequence of the commissioner's reporting his disquiet about a particular warrant was that the warrant became public knowledge, he would seek to minimise the damage to the system by limiting criticism to cases in which the issue of the warrant was beyond doubt unreasonable. Even then, difficulties would arise. For example, let us suppose that a warrant is properly issued in respect of a terrorist living in certain accommodation. However, a mistake is made and the Secretary of State is asked to renew the warrant after the terrorist has moved out and a perfectly innocent person has moved into that accommodation. If the commissioner notified the tribunal, and the tribunal notified the persons concerned, the tribunal would have to notify the terrorist as well as the householder. There is no easy way round the problem. We could not begin to follow the form of words chosen by the hon. Gentleman, and I am not suggesting that any other form would solve the problem that I have just described. That merely shows that the Bill is right to draw a clear distinction between the role of the commissioner in checking the system and the role of the tribunal in giving remedies to those who think that they are victims of improperly authorised interception.

I was surprised by what the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) said. In effect, he said that the amendments are important because the problem with the Bill is that people will have no opportunity to have their wrongs redressed. The whole point of the Bill is that, for the first time, people will have an opportunity to have their wrongs redressed. In those circumstances, I invite the hon. Gentleman to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Mark Carlisle: Although I accept that the commissioner is not the right body to consider the matters that the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) has mentioned, what is the status of the tribunal? I accept that the role of the commissioner is to review the carrying out of the Secretary of State's duties in the granting of warrants, but it must be highly likely that the tribunal will find during its inquiries that unlawful interception has taken place. I am not clear what is to happen if the tribunal, on receiving a complaint from a member of the public who believes that his mail or telephone has been intercepted, finds that there is prima facie evidence of interception for which no warrant has been granted. Should the matter be referred to the police? What is the tribunal expected to do? Is there not a lacuna and should the tribunal be required to refer such matters to the Director of Public Prosecutions?

Mr. Waddington: The tribunal is under no duty to report such matters to the police, but it will act as any other body or individual would act. There is no reason to suppose that a tribunal would fail in its clear duty. It would have exactly the same duty as any other citizen who learnt that a criminal offence had been committed. These matters were discussed yesterday when my right hon. and learned Friend was unable to be here.

8.15 pm

Mr. Dubs: I accept that our amendments should also apply to the tribunal. I have listened carefully to the Minister but do not believe that he has answered the main doubt.

I understood him to say that if, during an investigation, the commissioner comes across breaches of the law, he is expected to report the matter to the police. The Minister did not say why the commissioner should not be allowed to investigate prima facie when there have been allegations of the law being broken. I take the analogy of the Lord Bridge inquiry. He was asked to examine something which was defined pretty narrowly and he did not look further into whether some of the allegations in the film on MI5 were accurate. The Minister seemed to say that it is all right if the commissioner stumbles on something, in which case he will report it, but that he should not be empowered to set out to discover whether such things have happened. If the Minister is saying that such matters should be left to the tribunal, he must answer more fully how it will operate in circumstances such as I have described.

Mr. Waddington: I am not saying that that function should be carried out by the tribunal. It is to act in a quasi-judicial way. I am suggesting that those matters are for investigation by the police.

Mr. Dubs: The difficulty is how such matters are drawn to the attention of the police. I am sorry to labour the point, but the allegations in the MI5 film have not been answered, and the Minister knows it. There are clear allegations in that film that the law has been broken. Perhaps the law has not been broken because, before the Bill becomes law, we have no law. Perhaps that is the answer. However, if the Bill becomes law in its present form and if the film had been produced after then, how could the film's allegations be investigated? I suspect that they could not be investigated by the tribunal, unless those whose phones had apparently been intercepted complained to the tribunal. The alternative would be a Lord Bridge type inquiry, but with wider terms of reference—which are the subject of our amendments. I am not sure what the Minister is saying cannot happen and why. I think that the proposition is reasonable.

Mr. Waddington: I thought that I had made this matter plain. The commissioner's role is perfectly easy to understand. He works within the Government, carrying out a continuing review of how the Home Secretary carries out his duties, to ensure that when the Home Secretary issues a warrant he does so properly. How on earth can that be compared with investigating whether a criminal offence has been committed?

Mr. Dubs: I thank the Minister for answering the question. In that case, what is the procedure if there has been a breach of the law under clause 1? The Minister is saying that only the tribunal is available for that.

Mr. Waddington: No. The tribunal is concerned with complaints about warrants that should not have been issued but which have been issued. Clause 1 is concerned with breaches of the law. It creates a new criminal offence. If a person believes that he is the victim of the commission of a criminal offence, he will behave exactly as he would if any other offence had been committed. These are matters for investigation by the police. Any number of judges cannot carry out the work of the police. A man such as Lord Bridge cannot go on a roving commission investigating whether criminal offences have been committed. That would be improper. The job of investigating the new criminal offence created by clause 1 is for the police.

Mr. Dubs: I understand that, but we are still in a difficulty. If it is alleged that there have been interceptions without the issue of a warrant by the Secretary of State, as outlined in clause 1, what is an aggrieved person to do? The police will not have enough information on which to act. If MI5 is carrying out unauthorised interceptions, as was alleged in the film, the matter is too remote for the police to get the evidence. The whole point of the Lord Bridge inquiry is that it was set up following the allegations in the film on MI5. The Home Secretary may shake his head. However, when the Bill becomes law the police may well be able to carry out investigations if there are allegations of the kind made in the film. I understand the Minister's theoretical answer, but I do not understand how it will work in practice. Therefore, I do not believe that the point at issue has been covered. If the Minister says that the point has been covered, I can do no more than allow reinforcements to come in from the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg).

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I have some sympathy with the point that the hon. Gentleman is making. The Minister said that if there has been a breach under clause 1 this is entirely a matter for the police. If, however, the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) cares to look at clause 7(2) of the Bill he will see that it empowers anybody who believes that his mail has been interfered with or his telephone tapped to go to the tribunal. At that stage the tribunal is in a position to determine whether an offence under clause 1 has been committed. Why should it not make a report to that effect?

Mr. Dubs: If the tribunal's remit is so wide, there is no problem.

Mr. Hogg: Under clause 7(2) a complaint is made to the tribunal that an offence has been committed under clause 1 but the tribunal is not empowered under clause 7(4) to make that determination and to report.

Mr. Dubs: If that is the case, the tribunal is nearly there, but not quite. I repeat that I am unhappy about this matter and I am not sure whether it will be possible to resolve it. I believe that we are left with an inadequacy in the Bill. I do not think that our discussions have pinned down whether the inadequacy is in the way the tribunal functions or in the way that the commissioner might function. I am prepared to accept that the terms of reference of the tribunal ought perhaps to be widened, but I repeat that there is a sense of anxiety which the Minister has not allayed.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Golding: I beg to move amendment No. 87, in page 7, line 15, at end insert—

'(4) In pursuance of his functions under this Act the Commissioner may receive and retain documents or information from any person whomsoever, and such receipt or retention shall not be the subject of proceedings for an offence.'.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 88, in page 7, line 15, at end insert—

'(4) It shall be lawful for any person holding office under the Crown or engaged in the business of the post office or in the running of a public telecommunication system who reasonably believes that an offence under section 1 above has or might have been committed or that there has or might have been a contravention of sections 2 to 5 above in relation to a relevant warrant or relevant certificate, to disclose or give the Commissioner such documents or information as the Commissioner might reasonably be expected to need in order to determine whether an offence under Clause 1 above has been or might have been committed or whether there has been or might have been a contravention of sections 2 to 5 above in relation to a relevant warrant certificate.".

New clause 2 — Protection for disclosure of information to the Tribunal, the Commissioner or the Select Committee—

"Disclosure of information to the Tribunal, the Commissioner, or the Select Committee, in pursuance of their functions under this Act, shall not be the subject of proceedings for any offence.".

New clause 3—Complaints Commissioner in respect of allegations of misconduct and abuse of authority by members of the security services intercepting communications—

"(1) The Prime Minister shall appoint a person who holds or has held a high public office (in this section referred to as "the Complaint's Commissioner") to carry out the following functions, namely—

(a) to investigate any complaint made to the Complaints Commissioner by a member of the Security Services in respect of an allegation of misconduct or abuse of lawful authority by another member of the Security Services in relation to the interception of communications; and

(b) to decide whether in all the circumstances any such allegation is of such a character and substance as to justify a report by the Complaints Commissioner to the relevant Secretary of State; and if this is the case,

(c) to make as soon as practicable, a report to the relevant Secretary of State with respect to the alleged complaint.

(2) The Complaints Commissioner shall hold office in accordance with the terms of his appointment.".

Amendment (a) to the proposed new clause 3, at end add:

"(3) The Complaints Commissioner shall present an annual report to parliament of the number of complaints he has received and the number of complaints he has reported to the Secretary of State.".

Mr. Golding: May I say what a pleasure it is to debate the amendments without undue pressure on time.

These amendments relate to the situation that will face individuals who give information about unlawful telephone tapping. They will not be subject to the Official Secrets Act if they pass on information in a proper manner. I added my name to new clause 2 because of my interest as an official of the union which organises both the engineering and clerical staff of British Telecom and many workers in the Post Office. I want them to receive absolute protection when they provide information to the commissioner, the tribunal or a Select Committee, if such a committee is created, and also to a complaints commissioner, if this proposal is accepted.

Telephone tapping is undertaken by a small group of our members, and many others come across it in the course of their work. It is not a pleasant duty. Our members are sensitive to the criticism to which they are subjected for being associated with it. Many of them are also troubled when they believe that there is no apparently legitimate reason for the taps. They tell me that they particularly resent taps being installed for the monitoring of industrial disputes. As good citizens they support telephone tapping to fight serious crime and subversion, but the problem that our members face is that they cannot tell anybody when they believe that telephone tapping has gone beyond that. The managers of BT do not wish to know. They put the responsibility on the Home Office.

Our members are inhibited from coming to the union because of the Official Secrets Act. They ought to be able to complain either when they see what they believe to be unauthorised tapping or when they believe that the Government are failing to keep the law. They ought to be able to go to the commissioner, the tribunal or a Select Committee without fearing that action will be taken against them. The Bill, as drafted, does not provide that protection.

Clause 8(3) says:

"It shall be the duty of every person holding office under the Crown or engaged in the business of the Post Office or in the running of a public telecommunication system to disclose or give to the Commissioner such documents or information as he may require for the purpose of enabling him to carry out his functions under this section."

That, to me, implies immunity from prosecution, and I should be delighted if the Home Secretary could reassure me that that is so. However, even if such a reassurance is given, clause 8(3) does not cover tribunals or, if it were to be given power, a Select Committee. Under schedule 1 persons holding office under the Crown have a duty to provide information, and presumably they will escape prosecution under the Official Secrets Act, but this immunity does not extend to BT or Post Office employees who now work for private employers. Why should the conditions be different for the commissioner and the tribunal?

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Is there not yet another objection to this subsection, namely, that the duty to provide information or documents arises only if it is required—that is, if it is asked for — and does not provide immunity in the event of a public servant volunteering it?

Mr. Golding: The hon. Gentleman will have a chance to speak to his excellent amendment later. However, I shall refer to it now. My next sentence would have been that clause 8(3), which covers information to the commissioner on request, does not cover those cases where the employee wishes to give unsolicited information. This is indeed a very important question. BT and Post Office employees ought to be able freely to pass on information which worries them, yet it ought to be passed to somebody who, without holding direct responsibility, is totally safe from a security point of view. That means the commissioner, the tribunal or, if our proposals are accepted, the Select Committee and the complaints commissioner.

I would emphasise most strongly to the Home Secretary that it would be better if BT and Post Office employees, whom I represent, who are very troubled and disturbed about what they see, could go to the commissioner or to the tribunal rather than leak information to the newspapers in the hope that something will happen.

When people come to me asking what they should do in those circumstances, I would much rather be able to tell them that there is someone whom they can tell who is absolutely safe from the point of view of the security of the realm than to have to tell them that there is nothing that they can do, knowing that they will then be tempted to ring the Daily Express, the Daily Mail, The Guardian or The Observer. From the point of view of security, the Home Secretary would do well to think hard about this practical point.

8.30 pm

So far I have dealt only with the Official Secrets Act, but it is also important that no internal disciplinary action should be taken against any BT employee who gives information. At present, the Bill does not cover that and the Home Secretary should consider it carefully. Under paragraph 4(2) of schedule 1 the tribunal is forbidden to disclose any information given to it without the consent of the person disclosing it, but BT and Post Office employees may regard that as insufficient protection because by the act of communicating, whether by letter or in some other way, their views on particular instances of telephone tapping they may not only have committed a breach of the Official Secrets Act but have acted in a way detrimental to the business and thus be subject to internal disciplinary proceedings. Just as no prosecution under the Official Secrets Act should be permitted, so no internal disciplinary proceedings should be permitted in these circumstances.

On Second Reading I asked in an intervention:

"Can the Home Secretary tell us whether employees working for public telephone operators will be able to give evidence to the tribunal about unauthorised telephone tapping without risking prosecution under the Official Secrets Act 1911? If employees cannot give such evidence, are we not to depend on official sources only for what are the facts of the situation?"

The Home Secretary replied:

"I am perfectly satisfied that the tribunal will have full powers to take whatever evidence is necessary in relation to a particular case. I do not believe that there will be any inhibition of the kind that the hon. Gentleman mentions." — [Official Report, 12 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 164.]

It is not the ability to take evidence that is the question. The point is the ability to give evidence without fear of reprisals either under the Official Secrets Act or under internal disciplinary codes. That is very important indeed.

I ask the Secretary of State to consider these matters very carefully. I hope that we shall get a good response today. I should make it clear that in a matter as serious as this I would not press the precise wording of a particular amendment or seek to divide the Committee on the matter. It is not an issue of great party principle. It is, however, a matter of great practical consequence.

Before the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) jumps up again, I wish to deal with the background to this group of amendments and to say something about the hon. Gentleman's own proposals. New clause 3 recognises the importance of giving members of the security forces the opportunity to initiate complaints. It is essential that anyone who believes that something is going on unlawfully should be able to take the evidence to a person who is completely safe from the security point of view.

This group of amendments seeks to deal with a very difficult problem — how to ensure that Ministers and others are not encouraged to break the law because they act in complete secrecy and can rely on the fact that those who know about or stumble across the activities in question will baulk at the consequences of disclosure. That is the nub of the matter. At present, there is a great deal of discontent. We know that there is discontent in MI5, and I find it among employees of BT because on occasion —I do not wish to exaggerate this—they believe that things are not quite right and they want to be able to tell someone.

It is no answer to say that BT employees can go to the management of BT, because the management is not interested and will simply say that it is the business of the Home Office. It is equally pointless to tell employees of BT or MI5 that the right person to approach is the Home Secretary, because the Home Secretary is seen to be responsible for these activities and the people undertaking them may well be carrying them out in his name, so he is certainly the wrong person with whom to have a chat about what is going on.

There must be an independent person to whom people can go. Frankly, I am not fussy whether it is the commissioner, the tribunal or a complaints commissioner, but there must be an independent person to whom people can express their unease about the apparent unlawfulness of what is happening in their sphere of activity. I believe that this will also act as a check on the Home Secretary and his officials and on MI5, making them more accountable. If they know that there is a possibility of people operating in the field going to an independent person with responsibility for the oversight of telephone tapping, they will be more careful about keeping within the law. That is human nature. It is not, however, the major point to which I wish to draw attention.

The essential point is this. Despite my earlier comments, I believe that Post Office employees are covered as Crown employees, but it is vital that all BT employees should be exempt from any threat under the Official Secrets Act or internal disciplinary procedures if they give evidence, solicited or unsolicited, to the commissioner, the tribunal or any other responsible body.

Sir Edward Gardner: I wish to speak to new clause 3 which stands in my name and those of my right hon. and hon. Friends.

The new clause seeks to give the security services what I believe many people on both sides of the Committee would agree are badly needed facilities—the means to make a complaint or to express dissatisfaction about what is happening within the service. It hardly needs to be said that secrecy is the ace weapon of the secret service, giving the security services the same advantages of stealth and surprise on which the sinister people — terrorists, dangerous criminals and those involved in subversion— also rely.

The trouble with secrecy, of course, is that in the wrong hands, and handled irresponsibly, it can be a weapon that backfires. In those circumstances, the people who will suffer are the people who should not be touched by the secret services, and civil liberty itself can, indeed, as we know, be put in danger.

It would in my view, and I am sure in the view of all hon. Members, be quite unrealistic to suppose that any service or any group of people could ever be looked upon as being free from the risk of having in their number those who might misconduct themselves or abuse or misuse privilege and authority. When this happens, if it does happen, the question is the very question that new clause 3 attempts to answer: what happens if a member of the security services discovers, believes or, indeed, is certain that a colleague in the service is, in the words of new clause 3, abusing the authority which has been given to him? To whom does this discontented, dissatisfied or possibly very alarmed member of MI5, for example, turn? At the moment, there does not appear to be anyone. There is no channel through which he can put a complaint. There is no one to whom he can say "I feel that something is going wrong in the service, and I want to have it investigated and put right." There is no oversight, no independent person standing either inside or outside the service who can undertake the very responsible and, I believe, very necessary task of making up his mind whether something is going wrong.

[Sir Edward Gardner]

As to the case of Michael Bettaney, an MI5 officer who was recently the subject of a criminal investigation and ultimate conviction, this man, it seems, when he was dissatisfied turned, or tried to turn, to the KGB. A colleague who was working with him, a Miss Miranda Ingram, has said, or at least certainly has written in New Society, that she knew Bettaney well, and if Bettaney had had someone to whom he could have talked in confidence, in her view, from what she knew of the man and the circumstances, it was unlikely that he would have done what he did.

May I ask the Committee also to consider the case of Sir Roger Hollis. My hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) referred to this case earlier in the debate, and I do not want to repeat what he said. It is important to remember that not only was Sir Roger Hollis the director-general of the service MI5, but ultimately he became the target of suspicion of officers in that service who found themselves impotent when they tried to express their dissatisfaction and uncertainty about what Sir Roger Hollis was doing because they believed — rightly or wrongly—that he was the man who was the mole, who was in fact working with the KGB. When the colleagues of Sir Roger Hollis — and this seems to me wholly pertinent to the question of the proposal contained in new clause 3 that there should be a complaints commissioner to whom members of the secret service should be able to turn—tried to make known their suspicions, they had ultimately to send one of their number to No. 10 Downing street. He tried to see the Prime Minister and ultimately he was fortunate in being able to consult the secretary of the Cabinet of the day, Lord Hunt of Tanworth, and from that, of course, as we all know, flowed the inquiry into the various events which have given rise to the suspicions.

If there had been, as I submit to the Committee that there certainly ought to be, a complaints commissioner standing outside the security services, then there would be no reason, and certainly no excuse, for someone like Miss Massiter to turn to the media to try to get relief. It is the absence of someone to whom the dissatisfied officer in MI5 or the security services can turn that leaves what I believe is an alarming gap in the procedures that ought to be available within the secret service.

The support that is being given, I understand — though looking round the Chamber would not be the best evidence of it—to new clause 3 is substantial and wide and covers both sides of the Committee, I am happy to say. I understand, for example, that the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees), a former Labour Home Secretary, and the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan), a former Home Secretary and a former Prime Minister, both have indicated their support for new clause 3 and the intention which it proclaims of the appointment by the Prime Minister of a complaints commissioner. The complaints commissioner would first investigate any complaint, he would then have to decide whether the complaint was one of substance and was sufficiently serious to justify a report, and he would then have to report, as new clause 3 makes quite clear, to the relevant Secretary of State. His duties—and this has been pointed out during the course of the debate—would be wholly different, separate and distinguishable from the duties of the commissioner who is now known as the judicial monitor. His duties would be those which at present are being fulfilled by no one in MI5.

There is an alternative to the solution which is set out in new clause 3, and I recognise that. The alternative is a reorganisation of the administration within MI5. It would be a managerial solution. Attempts should be made by the management to see that when complaints are made they are heard and investigated, and conclusions are reached which would be for the benefit of the service. I do not for one moment have the least confidence in that alternative being a remedy for the specific difficulties that we are facing at present through the absence of a proper channel for complaint.

In America, the CIA and the FBI were both troubled —and grievously troubled—by the sort of problems that we in this country have found affecting MI5. In America, they tried to resolve those problems by administrative reform, by bringing in what one might call managerial solutions, and they failed. And what did they do, having failed? They appointed an inspector general within an oversight system of the kind that is proposed by new clause 3. In Canada, people were troubled, as they had been in America and we have been here, by the problem of no proper channel for complaint. They tried to bring in the alternative of a managerial solution. They, too, failed. What did they do? They appointed an inspector general of the kind that is proposed by the new clause, under the title of a complaints commissioner. I am told that in both America and Canada they call him an ombudsman. I do not mind what they call him provided that we have one.

There were suspicions in the case of Sir Roger Hollis, there was the case of Michael Bettaney and the film of Miss Massiter. If anyone believes that we have seen the last of those troubles, he is deceiving himself. Those troubles and problems are so serious and so fundamentally affect the future security and efficiency of our security services that they must be faced by the Government. I believe that my new clause contains the proper and effective solution. If my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary cannot say that it is the right solution, I hope that he will at least undertake to look again at the problem so that at some later stage we may have the opportunity of reconsidering all these difficulties and bringing them to a proper and satisfactory conclusion.

Mr. Maclennan: I support new clause 3, spoken to by the hon. and learned Member for Fylde (Sir E. Gardner) with eloquence and cogency. It would be difficult to resist the force of what he said about the present situation and the inadequacies of the routes available to those within the secret service who are concerned, rightly or wrongly, that there has been some fault or activity that they believe is reprehensible, dangerous or wrong.

The hon. and learned Gentleman made a positive case extremely well. I have tried hard to think what conceivable arguments the Government might try to apply against it. The strongest argument that they could dredge up is that the new clause would be ineffective because it would be difficult for an outsider to have total access to the workings of the machine that would enable an effective examination to take place. In the case of Sir Roger Hollis, it was possible for channels to be blocked, or at least it was alleged that that happened. There is no guarantee that an outsider, given the most far-reaching powers, would be able to unblock such channels or would not be stopped by the battlement deliberately put in the way by someone obstructive in a hierarchy where it is possible to block communications.

However, that argument of ineffectiveness does not demolish the hon. and learned Gentleman's case. I suspect that the complaints that arise from time to time flow from an incomplete appreciation of the picture by someone in the service who is capable of seeing it only from that corner from which he views those things, a part of the whole. All that is needed is an outside, independent person to say, "I have looked at the situation in the round and I think that what has happened is justified and was done for good reasons." Then many of the problems might disappear.

I think that the hon. and learned Gentleman has in mind someone of the highest authority and experience and of the utmost probity and reliability to be in such a role. Therefore, there is no possible security argument that could be deployed against the hon. and learned Gentleman's case.

Sir Edward Gardner: The person who would be eligible for such an appointment by the Prime Minister would, as the new clause says, be someone who holds or has held high public office.

Mr. Maclennan: I have no doubt that suitable names spring to mind.

Even if the new clause does not altogether deal with the problem, which has occurred repeatedly—the hon. and learned Gentleman cited the examples of the Bettaney, Hollis and Massiter cases—we must try to do something to improve the situation. It may not be the perfect remedy, but at least it does not carry within it any seeds of the destruction of the service. It is not such a radical proposal that it need cause fluttering in the dovecots of those who have a professional involvement in security matters and to whom "outside intervention" of any sort would certainly seem unusual. It should not necessarily be unwelcome.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I should like to speak to amendment No. 88, which is in my name.

I also support in broad terms new clause 3 argued so persuasively by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fylde (Sir E. Gardner) and the point made by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan).

However, I do not want to range as widely as my hon. and learned Friend because I should like to confine my attention to the scope of the Bill. We are seeking to determine a good system for investigating complaints about the misuse of the interception of telephones and postal communications. That is the prime purpose of the Bill. The inevitable truth is that those who know most about the abuses are those who are employed either in the public service or by the relevant agencies of the public service. For the most part, they are covered either by the Official Secrets Act or by restrictive covenants in their contracts of employment. Consequently, they cannot go to the commissioner with a complaint without exposing themselves either to prosecution under the Act or perhaps to disciplinary procedure arising from a breach of their contract of employment.

It is perfectly true that subsection (3) gives unlimited protection, but that protection exists only when the commissioner requires disclosure of information or production of documents. It does not exist when somebody wishes to volunteer either one or the other. It is in the public interest that members of the security services, Crown employees of one kind or another, employees of BT or the Post Office, should be able to go to the commissioner if they have reasonable grounds to suppose that an offence is being committed under clause 1 or that there has been a contravention of clauses 2 to 6, and that they should be able to do this without exposing themselves to legal sanctions.

There are three things which make this desirable. First, this is a way whereby abuses will be discovered and the existence of the sanction will itself be a further restraint and check on abuses. That is the first advantage.

Secondly, these are matters that should be brought to the attention of the public. Furthermore, this will act as a safeguard for discontented members of the security services. If they do not have a safe quarter to which they can turn, they will be dissatisfied and discontented.

Mr. Golding: I am not sure that it is a matter of bringing it to the attention of the public. The attraction of the amendment for me is that it is taken to somebody who is going to examine it in private. These are not matters, speaking for myself, about which we want public discussion. I have been appalled at the naming of Harry Newton as an MI5 agent without possibility of proof or disproof. We do not want discussion of these matters in public, either because of the individuals involved or because of the security of the realm or wanting to fight crime. What is needed is access to somebody in private who is able to act on one's behalf.

Mr. Hogg: The rebuke is well taken and the hon. Gentleman is quite right. To use President Reagan's words, I mis-spoke myself. The point I am making is that it is desirable that there should be a body to which discontented members of the security services can turn. It is the fact of disclosure to that body and then an independent and private inquiry that will do so much to reduce discontent within the secret service and elsewhere.

The third point is that, if there is not this particular safety valve, people will undoubtedly turn to the press and there will be a whole series of scare stories, which would be in nobody's interest.

Accordingly, I am in favour of some means whereby members of the security service, the Post Office and BT who fear there may have been an offence or a contravention can pass on this information without exposing themselves to legal action.

Mr. Brittan: The debate covers two separate but related aspects of the Bill. The first is the anxieties initially expressed by the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) about the position whereby the staff of BT or the Post Office had information which they were afraid to disclose for fear that they would be guilty of an offence under the Official Secrets Act.

I would not wish those staff to be inhibited in any way by such a concern. The only reason why I cannot advise the Committee to accept this amendment is that I believe that they need not be inhibited by any such concern under the provisions of the Bill together with the general law as it stands. I can certainly assure the Committee that if I were not of that view I would be extremely sympathetic to the belief that it is necessary to do something about it.

[Mr. Brittan]

I have no desire to prevent those with legitimate grounds for making a complaint or anxieties to express through the proper channel from doing so.

To explain why I think that it is not necessary for there to be any provision other than what stands on the face of the Bill it is necessary once again to make the distinction I made at an earlier stage, in our deliberations on another amendment, between the various institutions and the various things that may go wrong. I will deal first with the aspect that has been the main subject of this part of the debate and the anxiety expressed by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett)—that is, breaches of the law; matters which become offences under clause 1 but which have not been offences until now.

I am advised that, if a telecommunications or Post Office employee were, like any other member of the public in a similar position, to make a complaint to the police—which would be the proper avenue for dealing with breaches of the law—he would not be in breach of section 2 of the Official Secrets Act.

I should explain—this relates perhaps to some of the earlier debates rather than to this one—that it is my intention to issue guidelines to the police, as I said on Second Reading, as to how they should discharge the new function of investigating breaches of the law constituted by this newly created offence. The police will have a new task and they might require assistance from outside their own ranks to investigate matters which previously had not been subject to their scrutiny. Someone who makes a complaint to the police about a breach of the law will not be liable to prosecution under the Official Secrets Act.

We must also consider impropriety, which is within the ambit of the commissioner and the tribunal. I do not want anyone to be inhibited by the fear of prosecution under section 2 of the Official Secrets Act.

Hon. Members have mentioned clause 8(3), which imposes a duty on all concerned to disclose to the commissioner such documents or information as he may require to enable him to carry out his functions. My hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) made a distinction between information sought by the commissioner and information volunteered by those who believe that their information is relevant to the commissioner's task. It will be for the commissioner to determine how he formulates his requirement for information and documents.

There is little doubt that those requirements will be expressed — this is the Government's intention — in general terms and be directed to the Ministers or senior persons concerned and so will apply to all subordinate staff. Anyone in possession of information which he thinks is relevant to the commissioner, even if he has not been asked for it, would be authorised to disclose it, and therefore not be guilty of an offence under section 2. If there were any doubt, the person need only tell the commissioner that he is in possession of relevant information or documents and the commissioner will ensure that his requirement is framed, or reframed, in terms which cover those circumstances. It is inconceivable that that would not be done.

Although I sympathise with the anxieties of hon. Members on both sides, I do not believe that an amendment is necessary because the Bill, with the general law, is couched in terms which will have the desired effect.

Mr. Golding: The Minister has been helpful and I thank him. However, I am still unclear about why the provision is different for the commissioner and for the tribunal. Have I missed the explanation?

Mr. Brittan: The tribunal's position is different. The commissioner is concerned with interception in general terms, with the whole operation of the system and perhaps with impropriety in the broader sense. The tribunal is concerned with a narrower question. It must decide whether official interception has taken place — a relatively simple matter—and whether it should have taken place in the sense of the Secretary of State acting reasonably in applying the criteria when he issues the warrant. For those purposes, the information relates to the material presented to the Secretary of State. That material will not emanate from Post Office or telecommunications employees. The tribunal's task therefore differs from the commissioner's task. It is almost impossible to conceive of circumstances in which the particular protection of the tribunal as opposed to that of the commissioner is called for.

Mr. Golding: The Home Secretary might find it difficult to envisage such circumstances, but what harm is there in the Home Secretary making it absolutely clear that, if such circumstances arose, the same cover would apply to tribunals as applies to commissioners? Because there is doubt in the minds of BT staff, and possibly Post Office staff, what do we have to lose by making it absolutely certain in the Bill that BT and Post Office employees can give evidence to the tribunal, if they wish, without fear of prosecution under the Official Secrets Act? In many ways, it would be simpler if the Home Secretary, who has been so helpful in the matter of the commissioner, at the very least said, "I shall look at this aspect again before Report" rather than shut the door.

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for accepting what I said about complaints about the police. I beg him not to fail to appreciate that, just because the police are not mentioned, they are the most important part of the matter. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman also for accepting that the coverage effectively deals with the commissioner.

I do not believe, for the reasons that I have given, that there is a problem in relation to the tribunal, but I shall be happy to consider the hon. Gentleman's points further. As presently advised, it would be wrong for me to give the impression that a further gap needs to be filled. I shall certainly consider the hon. Gentleman's point.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fylde (Sir E. Gardner) referred to wider matters. They are very much wider matters. The Bill relates to interception, so it is inevitable that my hon. and learned Friend's new clause should refer to complaints about interceptions. Many, if not most, of the complaints mentioned in the various examples given by my hon. and learned Friend either do not primarily relate to interception or do not relate to interception at all. It would be a curious remedy therefore to set up a complaints system that would deal with the problems which have been identified, rightly or wrongly, by my hon. and learned Friend and would confine itself to the interception of communications. It would plainly be impossible for this legislation to do anything other than confine itself to the interception of communications.

I hope that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fylde will not feel that, apart from any other considerations, the necessity of giving so narrow a remit to the commissioner makes it inappropriate for the legislation to contain such a provision.

Sir Edward Gardner rose——

Mr. Brittan: I think that I shall be dealing with the broader point to which my hon. and learned Friend intends to refer.

Sir Edward Gardner: I was going to point out that I was very much aware that some of my examples were merely illustrative of the need for a person to investigate complaints. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will bear in mind that the Massiter film dealt with alleged unlawful and wrongful interceptions.

9.15 pm

Mr. Brittan: Perhaps my hon. and learned Friend would be good enough to peruse at his leisure my speech on Second Reading. He will find that I dealt seriatim with the various allegations, of which the allegations in relation to interception — which were the subject of Lord Bridge's report—were only a part. Therefore, the very example that my hon. and learned Friend gives appears to illustrate that this would be an ineffective remedy even if a remedy of this kind were appropriate for the security services.

I thought that my hon. and learned Friend was going to chide me with not dealing with the broader considerations that he raised. However, he was charitable enough to anticipate that I might go on to do so. Of course, I share and understand his concern and that of other hon. Members about the necessity for those in the security services to be able adequately to discharge their feelings of resentment, discontent, inadequacy as to their seniors' conduct or even a feeling that something more serious had gone wrong. It is important that there should be a proper way in which they can do so. However, there is a risk that, because there have been one or two cases such as those mentioned, wrong conclusions may be reached.

I do not accept that it necessarily follows that a person who has subsequently gone very seriously wrong would not have done so if there had been a person on whose shoulders he could lean. It is very easy, for charitable or other reasons, to make such assertions. Even if we were inclined to go down that path, we would be reluctant to impose so great a degree of confidence in an institution as to assume that it could avert a person in that frame of mind from committing offences. There is a risk that topical examples lead us to reach the wrong conclusions.

The experience of a disciplined service in which those who feel that something has gone wrong need a vehicle for expressing their discontent is not unique to the security services. Indeed, it is not unique to them for the position to be such that disclosure of information by disaffected persons would be damaging to the country. An obvious example is the armed forces of the Crown, where many people in both the lower and more senior positions are properly and necessarily equipped with material information of a highly secret nature.

I do not think that it would be suggested that we should have an ombudsman in that area of activity. It is appropriate to consider in the Civil Service as a whole what the proper channel of complaint should be. Most people who have been involved in these matters, whether in the Civil Service, armed forces or the security services, would feel that it is a proper function of senior management to organise itself so that there is a machinery whereby persons lower down can ventilate complaints with confidence that they will be properly investigated.

It is necessary that that should happen in any organisation — the so-called managerial solution, on which my hon. and learned Friend looked with an unnecessarily critical gaze—but we are talking not only about a large organisation but one where there is ministerial responsibility and oversight. I said on Second Reading that I regarded the discharge of that responsibility as one of my most important tasks; that I wished to make certain in my mind that the director-general and his senior colleagues so organised the security service that it was possible, and active encouragement was given, for complaints to be made.

I have discussed that matter with the new director-general and I propose to continue discussing it so as to satisfy myself that, within the security service, the problem is adequately understood and properly dealt with. That is the right approach. It is reasonable to have a system in which one is alert to the problem but in which the responsibility for dealing with it is put on the professional head of the service, under the superintendence of the Minister to whom he is responsible.

That is the proper approach to these matters and we should not be diverted from it because of an example, or even a couple of examples, where it is asserted, but cannot be proved, that the alternative approach commended in the amendment would have prevented serious matters that did occur.

I assure hon. Members, from the point of view of the director-general and myself, that I regard the provision of proper machinery in the security service for the ventilation of complaints of all kinds as a matter of great importance. The Committee owes a debt of gratitude to my hon. and learned Friend for giving us the opportunity to make the position on that absolutely clear.

Mr. Golding: It must be a sign of the times that the Home Secretary is far more critical of amendments standing in the names of his hon. Friends than he is of anything that we on these Benches say. I thank him for his positive approach to the problems that the members of my union face. I say that with the proviso that we shall almost certainly table a new clause on Report.

Mr. Brittan: The hon. Gentleman must not add to what I said. I expressed sympathy, but I gave no undertaking.

Mr. Golding: I am mystified. I simply thanked the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his positive approach. I shall read with wonderment the Official Report of what I must have said that has caused him so much concern. I am glad that the right hon. and learned Gentleman rose, because I am encouraged to examine every dot and comma of his reply. In other words, I shall examine far more carefully than I might otherwise have done the position that he adopted.

Until the Home Secretary rose to interrupt me, I was positively grateful to him for what he said about the commissioner and about access to the police. In view of his intervention, I am not sure whether he is withdrawing some of what he said earlier.

Mr. Norris: Get on with it.

Mr. Golding: Any Conservative Member who tells me at 9.25 in the evening to "Get on with it" cannot have had as much experience of my speeches as, for example, the Government Whip. We are debating a matter that is most important to me. It will not be dealt with by Conservative Members, who come in out of the cold late in the debate and make comments from a sedentary position.

We are not satisfied with the position regarding the tribunals, and we shall certainly table a new clause for consideration on Report. I am not sure whether the Government should not give protection to British Telecom and Post Office employees in respect of information which tribunals may request from them. If the Government are saying that they cannot envisage tribunals asking for evidence, they should make it clear in the Bill that tribunals do not have the right to ask for information. It is wrong for the Government to create a position which will give tribunals the power to ask BT and Post Office personnel to give information relating to their duties which is covered by the Official Secrets Act without at the same time making it absolutely clear in the Bill that there will be no breach of the Act if the employees respond to that request. The Home Secretary cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Brittan: The hon. Gentleman is doing both himself and me less than justice. I said that I would consider his point carefully. If he wishes me to do so, I shall do so. However, if he misrepresents what I said, it makes it difficult to do so in the same spirit.

Mr. Golding: I should have thought that the Home Secretary would consider my point despite what I say. I should have thought that, acting in a judicial manner, he would not say to me, "If you are hard on me, I shall consider the matter differently from the way that I would consider it if you said nice things to me." The Home Secretary must consider the matter carefully.

I put two separate points to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. Under the Bill, will the tribunal have power to ask BT and Post Office staff about matters relating to their official duties? If the answer is yes, he must give protection to those employees. If the answer is no, he must make it absolutely clear to the tribunal that it cannot ask them about such matters. It must be one way or the other. That is my point.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment, although I am not satisfied——

The Second Deputy Chairman (Sir Paul Dean): Order. Before the hon. Gentleman does that, another hon. Member wishes to make a contribution.

9.30 pm

Sir Edward Gardner: I am bound to say to my right hon. and learned Friend that my faith in the efficacy of the proposal in new clause 3 has in no way been undermined by anything that he has proposed by way of an alternative managerial solution. I am anxious, as I hope every member of the Committee is, to give the idea contained in new clause 3 the opportunity of living on and, I hope, a more successful day.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) wish to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. Golding: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I beg to move amendment No. 142, in page 7, line 31, leave out 'Subject to subsection (8) below'.

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 143, in page 7, line 33, at end insert

'together with a statement as to whether any matter has been excluded from that copy in pursuance of subsection (8) below.'.

Mr. Hogg: This is part of the process which provides greater safeguards for the citizens. Under clause 8(4) the procedure is for the tribunal to report to the commissioner. The commissioner investigates and considers and then, in time, reports to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister is under a duty to provide a copy of the annual report made by the commissioner, but it is clear and necessary that the Prime Minister should have the power to delete material which is prejudicial to the national security. It seems to me, and I hope that it will seem so to my hon. and learned Friend, that if that power is exercised, the fact that that material has been excluded should be contained in the report. It is additional information which I feel the House should have.

Mr. Waddington: The Government welcome the approach adopted in these amendments and will be glad to see them incorporated in the Bill. The commissioner's report must meet two requirements. It must be frank, and the commissioner must not in any way be inhibited in what he thinks is appropriate formally to draw to the Prime Minister's attention. He therefore may wish to comment on matters of the greatest secrecy. It is therefore also necessary that before the report is published such passages should be deleted. If that were not possible, the report could not serve the purpose which it is intended to serve.

The Government like these amendments because they, as it were, round off that arrangement. They ensure that the Prime Minister makes a statement if any changes have been made, so that Parliament is informed of the fact of deletions, but is not, of course, given any indication as to their content. These are welcome additions to the Bill. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for moving the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 143, in page 7, line 33, at end insert

'together with a statement as to whether any matter has been excluded from that copy in pursuance of subsection (8) below.'. —[Mr. Douglas Hogg.]

Clause 8, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I beg to move amendment No. 109, in page 8, line 2, after 'shall', insert

'except as authorised by a direction given in pursuance of subsection (1A) below'.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to consider amendment No. 110, in page 8, line 8, after 'persons', insert—

'(1A) a direction as mentioned in subsection (1) above may be given by a court or tribunal if that court or tribunal is satisfied whether on application or otherwise that a failure to give such a direction would seriously prejudice the rights of one or more of the parties to the proceedings there before it.

In the event of such a direction being given no matter given as evidence pursuant to that direction shall be published in any written publication available to the public or to broadcast except as authorised by direction made under subsection (1B) below.

(1B) If the court or tribunal which makes such a direction as is mentioned in subsection (1B) above is satisfied that the effect of subsection (1B) is to impose a substantial and unreasonable restriction upon the reporting of the proceedings and that it is in the public interest to remove or relax the restriction it may direct that that subsection shall not apply to such matter as is specified in the direction.

(1C) If any matter is published or broadcast in contravention of subsection (1A) of this section, the following persons, namely——

(a) in the case of a publication in a newspaper or periodical, any proprietor, any editor and any publisher of the newspaper or periodical;

(b) in the case of any other publication, the person who publishes it; and

(c) in the case of a broadcast, any body corporate which transmits or provides the programme in which the broadcast is made and any person having functions in relation to the programme corresponding to those of an editor of a newspaper, shall be guilty of an offence and liable on

(i) summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or both;

(ii) on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 7 years or to a fine or both.

(1D) In this section—

"a broadcast" means a broadcast by wireless telegraphy of sound or visual images intended for general reception, and cognate expressions shall be construed accordingly;

"written publication" includes a film, a sound track and any other record in permanent form but does not include an indictment or other document prepared for use in particular legal proceedings.'.

Mr. Hogg: I take the view that these are important amendments. As I understand it, the effect of clause 9 as it stands is that in no legal proceedings other than those mentioned in clause 9(4) may evidence be adduced to the effect that an offence has been committed under clause 1 or that the warrant is in existence. That is a broad power. It is a statutory prohibition on the admission of evidence in court.

The first question that I must ask my hon. and learned Friend is whether at the moment there is any statutory bar on the admission of evidence relating to the issue of warrants or the identity of persons to whom the warrant has been issued. So far as I am aware, there is no such statutory bar. I feel sure that the Committee would appreciate my hon. and learned Friend's guidance. There is of course always the residual power of the judge to exclude, but I am not aware of the exclusion being used in circumstances such as these.

If I am right in thinking that there is at present no statutory bar, the Government are going beyond what was said in paragraph 7 of the White Paper, which stated that it was not the purpose of the Bill to extend the law beyond the existing custom and practice. If we introduce an exclusion rule which does not exist at present, we shall indeed go beyond present custom and practice.

The purpose of the amendment is to admit evidence of the kind to which I have referred but which is now excluded in certain circumstances. There must be, and there is, a general presumption in favour of the admission of relevant evidence. I do not mean a legal presumption —there is in fact a legal rule—but every member of the Committee will accept that as a general rule relevant evidence should be admitted to courts. Sometimes it is necessary to impose restraints on the publication of matters before a court. Sometimes that is justified. However, as a general rule, I am in favour of relevant evidence being admitted before a court.

One must recognise that the exclusion of relevant evidence can often cause real prejudice. That is a general proposition. May I test it by example? If I suggest an example, my hon. and learned Friend can always say that the example is a fanciful one, that such a case would be unlikely to arise, or that such evidence would perhaps be admitted or would not be relevant. However, I would like to test the proposition by considering two or three examples.

First, let us take the example of a libel case. A newspaper alleges of a Minister or a specific official that he has acted in a repressive, unreasonable or dictatorial way. That would seem to be a defamatory observation to make of any Minister or official. The Minister or official sues the newspaper for libel. The newspaper has in its possession evidence to show that the Minister or official had connived at, instigated or otherwise been a party to an unlawful interception or an interception which contravened clause 2 and the consequential clauses. Is it to be said that, in libel proceedings, a newspaper is not able to adduce evidence to show that an offence has indeed been committed under clause 1, or alternatively that the Minister or official has connived at a breach of, for example, clause 2? That is an extraordinary proposition. It does not seem right at all. That is one example of a case in which the interests of justice and of the parties involved require the admission of that class of evidence.

Let us take another example. An employee of British Telecom unlawfully intercepts a telephonic communication. That employee is of course committing an offence under clause 1. He is therefore dismissed. He then goes to the industrial tribunal and claims that he has been dismissed unfairly. However, the reason why he was dismissed is that he had been interfering with telephonic communications, which is an offence under clause 1. Is his employer to be prevented by the Bill from adducing evidence to that effect or cross-examining on that matter?

For a third example, let us take the case of a Post Office worker. Quite frequently—I mean no disrespect to the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) —members of the postal service interfere unlawfully with the mail, for a variety of reasons. That happens in a significant number of cases every year, and could be an offence under clause 1. The Post Office dismisses that employee, and the employee goes to the industrial tribunal alleging unfair dismissal. The reason for his dismissal was an offence under clause 1. Is the Post Office to be prevented from adducing evidence, or cross-examining, to the effect that there has been an offence under clause 1? The answer must be no. Nevertheless, all of the cases that I have outlined are covered by the Bill in its present form and would prevent justice from being done. That is why it is a serious matter.

[Mr. Hogg]

I am aware that deeply sensitive issues must be involved in the material that might be put before courts. I have therefore put down the presumption that such evidence will not be admitted. That is the starting point. I have then incorporated the proviso that such evidence may be admitted if refusal to admit it "would seriously prejudice the rights of one or more of the parties to the proceedings".

We therefore start from the presumption—which my hon. and learned Friend the Minister would favour—that the evidence is inadmissible, and say that it must be admitted if the judge or tribunal gives a direction in the interests of justice. Even then I am prepared to accept my hon. and learned Friend's anxiety, because I have provided that the material should not be published unless the tribunal or judge thinks that it is in the national interest to do so.

I regard this as a modest means of dealing with the problem. A bar is likely to cause grave injustice, and I am anxious about its appearance in a statute presented by my hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. Waddington: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising interesting issues. There is no statutory bar on evidence being adduced on the existence of warrants, so there is no bar on questions being asked.

My hon. Friend said that the Government are now trying to do what they said in the White Paper they were not trying to do. With respect to my hon. Friend, he is wrong. He is obviously reading paragraph 7 of the White Paper which says that the Government are not seeking, through the introduction of the Bill, to broaden the scope of existing practices in the interception of communications. Paragraph 7 could not be read as referring to questions about the law such as my hon. Friend asked.

My hon. Friend's amendments are based on the assumption that the problem is that the courts will not be able to reveal publicly that in which there is a public interest. That is not the problem or, if it is, it pales into insignificance as compared with the real one, which is how we can afford to finish up with a system in which a rogue is enabled to discover the evidence which is available against him. We have to have a system under which a person does not learn, by bringing proceedings, what evidence there is against him. It would be absurd if, having constructed a tribunal to hear complaints, but under a special procedure which does not allow the complainant to know the evidence available against him, the complainant was able to go to a court of law and bring proceedings for the sole purpose of discovering that which he had no hope of discovering from the tribunal.

The Committee has already considered the tribunal for which special procedures are set out in schedule 1 which prevent the tribunal from revealing to one party information that it has received from another. This is absolutely vital, otherwise a person would be able to take an application to the tribunal and thereby discover whether a warrant was in existence in his name. The whole system would collapse.

9.45 pm

Precisely the same point arises over court proceedings. The circumstances are different but the principle is the same. Somebody should not be able to discover whether a warrant is to be directed against him just by mounting proceedings. These amendments do not mean that in any such proceedings evidence about interception would necessarily be presented. However, they are based on two assumptions: first, that it is known that there is such evidence to give, which in itself is unacceptable; secondly, that both parties might be involved in any consideration of whether or not a direction should be given, and, if it were, would be privy to what was presented as a result.

It does not take a great deal of imagination to conceive of circumstances in which an ingenious litigant would discover grounds with which he might expect to persuade the court that it was in his interests that evidence which he believed to be in the hands of the authorities and which he believed to be the result of interception was essential to secure his rights. Merely to start down this road means that the existence of a warrant may have to be confirmed or denied. This in itself would go too far and would prejudice the very confidentiality upon which the effectiveness of authorised interceptions so crucially depends.

My hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) referred to the possibility of a Minister conniving at unlawful tapping and of a newspaper having evidence of it, with the Minister suing the newspaper and the newspaper therefore being put at a disadvantage. As I understand it, in those circumstances there would be no difficulty whatsoever because the Minister would have committed a crime under clause 1. My hon. Friend will see that, according to clause 9(3), subsection (1) does not apply to a relevant offence, and "relevant offence" means, among other things, as provided in subsection (4)(a).

"an offence under Section 1"

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My hon. and learned Friend does me an injustice, because I thought of that one as well. If he cares to look at subsection (3) he will see that "Subsection (1) does not apply in relation to proceedings for a relevant offence."

A libel case does not constitute proceedings for a relevant offence within the meaning of the clause.

Mr. Waddington: I do not really follow what my hon. Friend is saying. I am referring to clause 9(4) which contains a definition of "relevant offence".

Mr. Hogg: With respect to my hon. and learned Friend, that is perfectly true, but subsection (4) is dependent upon subsection (3).

Mr. Waddington: I shall look into that point when I have a little more time, but my advice is that if a Minister were guilty of a crime because an offence had been committed under subsection (1), the first part of clause 9(1) would not come into play. However, I shall take advice on that point and will write to my hon. Friend if he is correct in assuming that the explanation I have given is incorrect. One has to address one's mind to the main problem: that if one sets up a tribunal which prevents a man from finding out whether he has been properly intercepted, one cannot finish up with that man being able, by bringing proceedings in court, to obtain the information which he failed to obtain from the tribunal. One has to face up to that difficulty.

Mr. Hogg: I wish to make three brief points. First, my hon. and learned Friend the Minister must accept that he is extending the scope of the law in that there is at present no statutory bar to exclude such evidence and in future there will be such a bar.

Secondly, my hon. and learned Friend did not deal with the points that I made about unfair dismissal, and it is clear that in the two cases that I mentioned the employer would be at a substantial disadvantage as a result of the Bill.

Thirdly, we must accept that if the Bill is enacted in its present form injustice will be done to parties. As a general proposition, I am prepared to accept that the evidence should not be introduced, but I want a residual power to introduce it in some circumstances.

Having said that, I recognise that I am not about to persuade my hon. and learned Friend——

Mr. Maclennan: Will the hon. Gentleman allow others to comment before he seeks leave to withdraw the amendment?

Mr. Hogg: I am happy to oblige the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Maclennan: The hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) has done the House a great service by raising this issue, which has given rise to considerable anxiety. The whole of clause 9, with which the amendment seeks to deal, has been commented on most adversely by Justice, the British branch of the International Commission of Jurists, as being oppressive and going beyond what is necessary to confine the judicial remedy to the tribunal.

Clause 9 takes away a right which was previously enjoyed and does not need to be removed for the Minister to achieve his aim. I understand the argument that it is undesirable and, indeed, impossible to set up a tribunal and to allow a remedy through the High Court to proceed in parallel, but that is not the point to which the main thrust of clause 9 relates. In fact, it will preclude the possibility of a line of examination or cross-examination being pursued which may arise in the course of some quite different matter.

The circumstances of the Malone case spring to mind in this regard. If these provisions go through in their present form the circumstances of a case of that kind may never come to light again. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman has sufficient troops here to force a Division on the matter, but I sincerely hope that the issue that the hon. Member for Grantham has very properly raised will receive very careful consideration by the legal luminaries in another place.

Mr. Waddington: Perhaps I may reply to the last point. The hon. Gentleman suggests that if the new procedure had been in existence the Malone case would never have come to light. But once the Bill becomes law there need never be such a case again because a person such as Mr. Malone will have a remedy. He will be able to go to the tribunal.

Mr. Maclennan: With respect, the Minister misses the point. Mr. Malone would never have known that his telephone had been tapped if it had not been revealed in the course of examination of a policeman's notebook that something had been going on, leading Mr. Malone and his counsel to suspect that interception had taken place. We are men of the world. We appreciate how difficult it is to identify whether telephone tapping or any other form of interception has taken place and that it is only in circumstances of that kind that it will ever come to light. In reality, although in theory Mr. Malone might have a remedy, he would never know that he needed to exercise it.

Mr. Waddington: Surely this is nonsense. If Malone or his advisers had suspicions that his telephone was being tapped, in the old days one would look through a policeman's notebook to ascertain whether there was some evidence of it there. Under the new regime, he would be able to go to the tribunal.

Mr. Maclennan: With respect to the Minister, they did not have any knowledge or suspicion that this was taking place. It was only because the matter came out in cross-examination that it was followed up at all. I think that the Minister will find that this matter arouses anxiety in another place, and I have no doubt that it will have to be pursued.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 9 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 10

INTERPRETATION

Amendment made: No. 118, in page 9, line 37, at end insert—

'(3) For the purposes of this Act conduct which constitutes or, if it took place in the United Kingdom, would constitute one or more offences shall be regarded as serious crime if, and only if—

(a) it involves the use of violence, results in substantial financial gain or is conduct by a large number of persons in pursuit of a common purpose; or

(b) the offence or one of the offences is an offence for which a person who has attained the age of twenty-one and has no previous convictions could reasonably be expected to be sentenced to imprisonment for a term of three years or more.'.—[Mr. Waddington.]

Clause 10, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 11 and 12 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

OFFENCE OF DISCLOSURE

'A person who intentionally discloses a communication intercepted in the course of its transmission by post or by means of a public telecommunications system shall be guilty of an offence unless such disclosure is made—

(a) with the consent of the individual to or by whom the communication is sent;

(b) for the purposes connected with the maintenance or provision of postal or public telecommunications services;

(c) for the purposes in respect of which the Secretary of State has issued a warrant under section 2 below;

(d) to the Tribunal or to the Commissioner or to the Select Committee;

(e) in proceedings in respect of an offence under this Act;

(f) in the public interest to disclose evidence that a grave offence had been committed.'.—[Mr. McWilliam.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. McWilliam: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I do not wish to detain the Committee for long. I have no doubt that the Minister will pray in aid schedule 2. Several problems arise here. It seems to us that disclosure is a far more heinous crime than interception. Many people have to intercept communications in the course of their duties. If they disclose something to another person that is a different matter. Indeed, during the debates on what are now the Telecommunications Act 1984 and the British Telecommunications Act 1981, this was a preoccupation of hon. Members. Given that disclosure is the real crime —and I submit that the real crime is that someone who has gained information from interception discloses it to a third party — the Bill as drafted seems to us to be inadequate, which has led to the tabling of new clause 5.

The proposed new section 45(2) to the 1984 Act, as set out in schedule 2, says that control should be lifted from people who make "any disclosure which is made for the prevention or detection of crime or for the purposes of any criminal proceedings".

Any detection which is made under warrant is also covered by the Bill. The only assumption that can be made is that this must be a let-out for disclosures other than those that are made under the proposed subsection (1). Indeed, it is made clear in subsections (2)(a) and (c) that the same kind of let-out exists in terms of national security.

It is not part of the Opposition's case that we shall make life easier for criminals or for those who would jeopardise national security. However, we are concerned that the Bill should not contain a catch-all provision. Therefore, we have tabled new clause 5, which is perfectly straightforward. It imports the principle of schedule 2 to the main body of the Bill, but does not import the let-out that has been built into schedule 2. Therefore, I commend it to the House.

Mr. Norris: I should like to draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to paragraph (f) of his new clause because I, too, proposed a new clause—new clause 6—which was not selected, but which was virtually identical to his——

Committee report Progress.

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Interception of Communications Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Bill again considered in Committee.

Question again proposed, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Norris: I should like to ask the hon. Gentleman this question. I believe that it is important enough to ask if only because many of the amendments that have been withdrawn during the Committee stage will be debated at length in another place. Does the hon. Gentleman not think that by adding the words "to disclose evidence" and thereafter in paragraph (f), in other words, by trying to define what is meant by the public interest, he vitiates the purpose of adding that important paragraph?

Subsection (2)(a), as set out in schedule 2, covers the point that the hon. Gentleman is making. It states that any person who makes such a disclosure would be exempt from the provisions of schedule 2. I have sought to make the point that the most important areas of public interest are where a crime may not have been committed but where, none the less, it is in the genuine public interest that matters be disclosed. Will the hon. Gentleman address himself to that point?

"for the prevention or detection of crime"

Mr. McWilliam: I am grateful for that intervention.

We are trying to clarify the law as it is proposed. New clause 5 with paragraph (f) in it would entirely meet the point raised by the hon. Gentleman. It is an important point, and we must all bear it in mind. The difficulty is that the proposed subsection (2)(a) is too broad, whereas paragraph (f) of new clause 5 is narrow enough to impose a reasonable constraint upon the Executive, but broad enough to meet the hon. Gentleman's point. That was the intention behind drafting the new clause in this way. When we did so, we were minded of the new clause which the hon. Gentleman had tabled. It is not our intention to be partisan about this matter. We are trying to protect the people and at the same time allow the security services the access to information which they need. That is the entire import of new clause 5 — to prevent the sweeping suggestion in schedule 2 and to import the main point into the body of the Bill.

Mr. Waddington: The Government accept that it is essential to secure proper protection of material intercepted by warrant. That is what clause 6 is all about. The improper disclosure of intercepted material is already covered by various statutory provisions. The first is, of course, section 2 of the Official Secrets Act. It covers improper disclosure by those in the Crown service, which includes the police, and it is also expressly applied to the staff of the Post Office through the Post Office Act 1969 and to the operators of public telecommunications systems through the Telecommunications Act 1984. Its application is therefore comprehensive over possible possession of intercepted material.

The telecommunications side is additionally covered by section 45 of the Telecommunications Act 1984, which, as the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam) said, is amended by schedule 2. The hon. Gentleman complains about the wording of subsection (2) of that section. I suggest that his criticism is misconceived. Subsection (2)(a) follows the scheme of the Data Protection Act, under which, as the hon. Gentleman knows, a person may disclose matters to the police even though the police do not appear in his registration particularly as somebody to whom he may disclose data. Therefore, I suggest that it is entirely proper that a similar scheme should be found in this Bill.

Mr. McWilliam: I intervene merely to point out that we opposed that section because we did not think it was sufficiently tightly drawn. Therefore, it is entirely consistent with the argument that we are now putting that this provision is not sufficiently tightly drawn.

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Gentleman is clearly entitled to make that point, but it is not going to get us very far tonight because we, obviously, were satisfied with the Data Protection Act or we would not have presented it to the House. We shall have to agree to disagree on that.

Given the fact that the Data Protection Act is now on the statute book the hon. Gentleman must not be surprised to find that in this Bill we have followed exactly the same scheme for the disclosure of information.

On the postal side the provisions are rather older, being contained in telegraph legislation of the last century, the provisions in question making it an offence for a post office official to disclose the contents of any message entrusted to the Post Office for the purpose of transmission to any person.

In addition to these offences, there are two other considerations to be borne in mind. First, the arrangements which must be established under clause 6 and which the commissioner keeps under continuing review deal comprehensively with the safeguarding of intercepted material. Thus, at a stage short of the involvement of the criminal law there are arrangements to ensure that the material is properly looked after. The Secretary of State is obliged by clause 6 to address his mind to these arrangements when he issues warrants.

Secondly, as a matter of practice in the Crown service as well as in the Post Office and for public telecommunications operators there are codes of conduct covering a wide range of things, including the proper handling of material obtained during the course of people's duties. Breach of these codes can in appropriate circumstances lead to dismissal.

Therefore, there are a number of pieces of legislation which bear on these matters, there is the new protection provided in schedule 2 and there is the scheme in clause 6 of the Bill. These, taken together, I would submit, meet any mischief such as that suggested by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. McWilliam: I would not wish to delay the Committee by pushing this clause to a Division. I cannot say that I am entirely satisfied with the Minister's reply. It may well be that we shall seek to return to the matter at a later stage. At this stage, however, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule 1

The Tribunal

Mr. Dubs: I beg to move amendment No. 121, in page 11, leave out lines 4 to 6.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 122, in page 11, line 4, leave out from 'members' to end of line 6.

No. 123, in page 11, line 4, leave out 'each' and insert 'one of whom holds or has held a high judicial office and two others'.

Mr. Dubs: There is a principle in life in Britain: when in doubt about starting any particular set-up, one brings on the lawyers. I am not particularly attacking lawyers. All that I am seeking to do in amendments Nos. 121 and 122 is to end the monopoly of lawyers—in other words, to end the requirement that only people with a legal qualification can be members of the tribunal. That would not stop Ministers appointing lawyers, but they would not be obliged to do so.

Amendment No. 121 gives the Minister discretion to appoint more or less than five members of the tribunal. The amendments are simple and I hope that the Minister is sympathetic to them.

Mr. Maclennan: Amendment No. 123 is in part motivated by the considerations which led the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) to move his amendment. It recognises that the Government think that the tribunal should have a quasi-judicial role, that it should therefore be presided over by a judge, and that a majority of tribunal members should have a legal background.

Other experience and expertise, in addition to legal expertise, might be of value to the tribunal. Technical expertise such as that offered by hon. Members who have participated in the debate might be useful. A tribunal consisting solely of people with legal expertise might be a little confining. I hope that the Minister agrees that greater flexibility is required.

Mr. Waddington: Only yesterday we decided through a Government amendment that the tribunal would act as the High Court would act on hearing an application for a judicial review. The tribunal will have a quasi-judicial role and it is therefore appropriate that lawyers should discharge its functions. I say that not because lawyers alone are able to reach balanced judgments, but because legal training is particularly desirable for members of the tribunal.

We do not say that only legal qualifications are needed. The tribunal must comprise people with wide experience and proven maturity of judgment. We stick to the view that tribunal members should be lawyers but that they should not just be lawyers. The Government intend the tribunal to include in its membership people with a wide experience of affairs. That should give some comfort to hon. Members. We do not think it necessary that the tribunal should include someone who has held high judicial office. I hope that the amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. Dubs: I am not convinced, but I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule 1 agreed to.

Section substituted for section 45 of 1984 Act

Mr. Maclennan: I beg to move amendment No. 126, in page 13, leave out lines 6 to 8.

Without my amendment, the schedule could drive a coach and horses through the Bill. It would permit the official telephone tapper to reveal the content of any intercepted conversation to prevent or detect crime, however minor, and to give evidence at any trial of that content.

The schedule is not restricted to simple metering—that is, information about the destination and duration of calls. The amendment would ensure that the use made of any intercepted material has to be covered by the Bill so that all the safeguards apply.

If an intercepted message is disclosed in a manner not authorised by clause 1, an offence would be committed. The amendment takes out matters which should be covered by warrant in sub-paragraph (b) and permits information about metering to be disclosed on the order of a court.

However, the contents of intercepted conversations can be dealt with only under clause 9. I hope that the Minister will undertake to give some thought to my points.

10.15 pm

Mr. Waddington: The key point is that there is a fundamental difference between the disclosure of the contents of a communication and the disclosure of so-called metering information. That is why metering is dealt with separately from interception. Intercepted material does not, in the natural course of events, come into the hands of the person intercepting, but metering information is information that is properly held by a telecommunications operator in the course of running his business. Meter check printers, which record metering information, are used in a wide variety of cirumstances, principally when there is a query about a person's bill.

There is no doubt that the disclosure of metering information other than for the purposes of operating the telephone system gives rise to sensitive issues and that there should be a clear statutory basis for such disclosure which sets out the grounds on which it is permissible. The Bill as drafted does this. Nor is there any doubt that access to such information can be of great assistance in the prevention and detection of crime, or in the interests of national security.

It is important to realise that nothing in these provisions requires a telecommunications operator to disclose metering information. Such operators are simply permitted to do so in circumstances which are defined in a way that closely follows the precedent of the Data Protection Act 1984. The comparison between the disclosure of personal data under that Act and the disclosure of metering information is much closer than the comparison between interception and metering.

British Telecom already has procedures in which disclosures of metering information for the investigation of serious crime must be approved at a senior level in its headquarters. To ensure compliance with the requirements of section 45 of the Telecommunications Act as amended by schedule 2, I have no doubt that BT and other public telecommunications operators will adopt appropriate procedures to ensure that metering information is disclosed only in appropriate circumstances. The Government believe that the procedures in schedule 2 are appropriate in all the circumstances and that this amendment should, therefore, be rejected.

Mr. Maclennan: I am grateful to the Minister for that explanation, which I shall study carefully before deciding whether to return to the matter. In the circumstances, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, with amendments; as amended to be considered tomorrow, and to be printed. [Bill 123.]

Road Traffic (Northern Ireland)

10.18 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Chris Patten): I beg to move,

That the draft Road Traffic (Type Approval) (Northern Ireland) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 18th February, be approved.

The order provides for the introduction of national type approval arrangements for motor vehicles in Northern Ireland by extending the powers of the Department of the Environment under the Road Traffic Order (Northern Ireland) 1981. The arrangements envisaged would be broadly similar to those that have been in force in Great Britain since 1978.

The provisions have been urged on the Government by a number of hon. Members, including the right hon. Members for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) and for South Down (Mr. Powell). The hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) has given this subject his usual scholarly attention. I am sorry we have not been able to bring the order forward before.

Type approval is the process under which a vehicle or vehicle part is submitted, usually by a manufacturer, for testing against objective standards of design, construction and environmental protection. Once that vehicle or vehicle part has been approved as meeting the standard or standards in question, individual vehicles or vehicle parts produced in conformity with the approved type can be certified as meeting the standard without further testing.

The order will enable regulations to be made listing the standards with which vehicles must comply before they can first be licensed in Northern Ireland. The intention would be initially to make regulations apply only to cars and certain dual-purpose vehicles. For the time being they would not extend to goods vehicles. In their scope, the regulations would cover all the requirements in the construction and use regulations and lighting regulations. They would be precisely the same as those in Great Britain, which are largely based on standards set in EEC directives or regulations issued by the Economic Commission for Europe—a United Nations body.

Hon. Members may ask why type approval is considered necessary if motor vehicle standards are already laid down in the construction and use regulations and lighting regulations. The main point is that there is no means of checking that vehicles comply with the requirements of those regulations. Therefore it is possible to license a vehicle that is not in compliance with the regulations.

While the vast majority of new vehicles in Northern Ireland were supplied either from manufacturing plants or import concessionaires in Great Britain, where national type approval is already operated, this distinction was not important. However, with the growth from 1982 of imports direct from the Republic of Ireland and continental Europe—a point to which right hon. and hon. Members have drawn our attention since 1982—there was less assurance that imported cars complied with the requirements.

Purchasers of non-complying vehicles therefore face the possibility of prosecution for infringement of the construction and use regulations. This type approval order will help overcome that problem by enabling other type approval arrangements to be introduced. The draft order therefore represents a consumer protection as well as a road safety measure.

The draft order closely follows corresponding legislation in Great Britain. Indeed, it is very closely modelled on the Road Traffic Act 1972 and the amending Act of 1974. In essence it provides for the establishment of type approval requirements by the Department which, if met by a particular model, will result in the issue of a type approval certificate. In turn it enables manufacturers to issue certificates of conformity for individual vehicles.

I draw the attention of hon. Members to the provisions of the inserted article 31*(d)*(iii) which would enable the Department to make regulations making the first licensing of a vehicle conditional upon its being type approved.

Since most new vehicles will continue to come into Northern Ireland from Great Britain, and as it is proposed to apply exactly the same requirements as those in Great Britain, arrangements will be made to accept type approval issued in Great Britain as applying in Northern Ireland, and vice versa. In practice, since vehicle manufacture in Northern Ireland is negligible, most, if not all, applications for national type approval will be dealt with in Great Britain by the Department of Transport, which has facilities for testing and inspection and the issue of approval certificates.

However, against the possibility that an application for approval would be made in Northern Ireland, arrangements would be made for the Department of Transport to act as agents for testing and inspection. That would mean that there would be no need to provide separate testing and inspection facilities in Northern Ireland.

When the draft order was considered by the Northern Ireland Assembly, the position of personal imports was raised. I wish to make it clear that regulations made under this order will not be retrospective and that those who purchased imports through independent dealers have no cause for concern. The regulations would, as in Great Britain — we are being entirely consistent — exempt vehicles that qualify as personal imports from the requirement to produce type approval documentation.

I appreciate that importation in bulk by parallel importers will fall outside the scope of that exemption and that, unless they can obtain the necessary documentation, their business will be adversely affected. That point was put to me forcibly by the Independent Car Importers Association, which sought the withdrawal of the draft order.

However, as hon. Members may know, the Department of Transport and the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders have agreed a code of practice under which a parallel importer can apply to a manufacturer or to his accredited representative in Great Britain for the type approval certification needed to enable the imported vehicle to be first licensed in Great Britain.

Under the code, that certification will be issued provided that the vehicle was built in conformity with an approved type or can be converted so as to comply. It is proposed that steps shall be taken to extend these arrangements to vehicles imported into Northern Ireland.

That being the case, the order should proceed, given that it offers substantially increased protection to motorists in Northern Ireland and should enhance road safety. I therefore commend the order to the House.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): My party welcomes the order, though it has been a long time coming. Its history goes back a considerable time, for the Government were being asked, not only by the motor agents in Northern Ireland but by my party—notably by the party's leader, my right hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux), and my right hon. Friend the Member for South Down (Mr. Powell)—as far back as early 1982 to do something about the matter.

It would seem that the problem arose, as the Minister said, because of a shift in the economic advantages of importing vehicles. Apparently the manufacturers cut the prices of the vehicles that they supplied to the Irish Republic because of the levels of car tax and VAT pertaining in the Republic. That meant that if one could avoid the tax, the vehicle was much cheaper in Northern Ireland, taking into account the sum actually charged by the manufacturer of the vehicle.

In addition, the taxation policy on the collection of VAT was being altered in a way which rendered it even more beneficial to those who could import cars in large numbers, and it so happened that the Republic's assemblers of vehicles were protected by the Treaty of Rome from imports which were similar to vehicles being assembled in the Republic.

To add to the burden on the folk in Northern Ireland, they were in great difficulty when it came to exporting vehicles to the Republic, because only registered exporters could send vehicles south of the border. Thus, it came down to being, for financial and trade reasons, a one-way street, and that bore heavily on those who were the traditional suppliers of cars and other vehicles in Northern Ireland.

The VAT arrangements in the Republic apparently gave a time lag which at one stage enabled the importer to get his cars in and have them sold—not necessarily even in Northern Ireland but possibly in Great Britain—before they had to pay the VAT that was payable on the cars.

There was, therefore, a considerable flood of cars coming across the border in early 1982 and for 12 months thereafter. It is hard now to say exactly how many were coming in. So many were at the game—those who were buying as individuals and those who were importing in quite large numbers—that nobody really knows the true numbers.

The trade suspects that several thousand were coming across the frontier. However, I wonder, if that were the case, where all those cars went to. It is clear that they did not stop in Northern Ireland. One suspects that quite a few went straight out through Larne harbour to Stranraer, and goodness knows where they are now in Great Britain.

In a Treasury parliamentary answer on 30 April 1982, my right hon. Friend the Member for South Down was told that five vehicles had been imported in October 1981 and that by March 1982 the number had risen to 442, a considerable number of vehicles for a population of 1·5 million. It is alleged that at that time, of all the Ford vehicles sold, two thirds were imports, and that more than half of the Mazdas sold were imports. At least a quarter of all cars sold in Northern Ireland were the grey imports from the Republic. After years, the position eased because of pricing and tax changes in the Republic. By June 1983, the figure was between 5 and 10 per cent., or even lower.

[Mr. William Ross]

There is no doubt that those who engaged in the importation of those vehicles were doing well and therefore, we should not be surprised that the independent parallel importers object to the regulations. Although at first sight those people appeared to be good for consumers, they were not good for the Province or consumers in the long run. The importers and sellers invested little, there were few jobs and little back-up if anything went wrong.

The regulations have taken a long time to come to the House. On 27 May 1982 my right hon. Friend the Member for South Down received an answer from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport to the effect that he would try to introduce the regulations. I understand that at that time it was expected to take about nine months. When nine months extends into three years, one wonders how long it will take to get the legislation through the House.

By 1 July 1982 we had been told in answer to a further question that the Government intended to introduce the legislation as soon as possible. By September 1982 the Department said that there were 100 prosecutions for the use of those vehicles pending. Perhaps the Minister would tell us what happened to them. From his remarks we know, but we would like it put clearly on the record. By 20 December 1982 Department of the Environment officials were saying that they hoped that the matter would be debated in the House about the end of 1983. That is more than a year ago.

By 31 December we had been told that officials were working on the necessary legislation, and the proposals were eventually referred to the Assembly. Now, three years after the matter was first raised, we have the regulations on the Floor of the House, where they could have been a long time ago.

We have only ourselves to blame. If the type approval regulations had been embodied in United Kingdom legislation rather than in Great Britain legislation, we would not be here tonight and we could all go home an hour or so sooner. The Minister made that point even better when he pointed out that the work done in Great Britain by the Minister of Transport is the deciding factor, and that the Northern Ireland Office would only pick up a rubber stamp and agree to accept the findings of the Great Britain authorities. It has taken far too long to get the regulations to the House. I hope that the cars are better constructed than the Orlit houses were, because we are running into severe problems with them.

Despite the long delay, the Government have taken many measures, some of which were helpful, but all of which were certainly delaying tactics. The helpful measures were the use of the construction and use regulations to make threats to those who were buying imports. It was widespread in the news media of Northern Ireland that they might not be able to use their vehicles. There were the prosecutions, but they did not appear to come to much, and the changes in the tax and pricing arrangements by the manufacturers and the Dublin Government, which affected the economics of the importation of vehicles from the Republic.

The legislation is widely welcomed and long awaited. It has been dragged slowly inch by inch—millimetre by millimetre, one should say nowadays — out of the Department. It is the best way to deal with the problem.

I am glad that the efforts of my right hon. and hon. Friends have been brought to a successful conclusion. It shows that when Ulster has a just case and the matter is pressed home in the House, it can be brought to a successful conclusion. This is one of many successful conclusions during my years in the House. It also exposes the nonsense that is often about in Northern Ireland, that because there are only a few Members from Northern Ireland in the House they can never get anything done. We have got it done. It has been a long, slow process but it has been brought to a welcome conclusion. The fact that it has encourages us all to redouble our efforts for Northern Ireland's just case in other directions.

My right hon. and hon. Friends fought the battle to a successful conclusion. We hope that in the future the Minister will listen to us rather more readily and act a great deal more speedily, and then we can all get home a great deal earlier.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): The hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) referred to what he saw as the delay in bringing forward this draft order to the House. The Minister will want to respond to that. I understand that during the Assembly process, when we were considering the draft order, it was said that his Department had experienced some anxiety about the welding of two vehicles that had been imported into Northern Ireland — the Mazda 323 and the Toyota Starlight. The Department was worried about what might happen if there were a collision. If the anxiety was as great as we were told, I wonder why the legislation did not come forward somewhat faster.

It is to some extent a comfort to the Minister to recognise that the burden of complaint by Members in the House centred around the fact that the legislation did not come earlier. That shows that the substance of the order is generally accepted by Members in the House.

The essence of the order is to ensure an acceptable standard of vehicle. I note that in the communications from the motoring organisations, the RAC and the AA give a warm welcome to the order, as does the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents.

There is a difference of opinion between the two organisations involved in the selling of cars. The Motor Agents Association as one would expect, is in favour of the draft order, whereas the motor importers seem to be fighting strenuously to the last. We can, of course, understand their anxiety even if we do not altogether share it. However, the general view of those of us in the Northern Ireland Assembly who have studied the draft order is that the independent view expressed by those with an interest in road safety should be taken more seriously than the views of those who have a vested interest, although that is no reason to ignore anyone's views.

When the Minister refers to import controls and says that personal imports are exempt, what thought has he given to the fact that it will be relatively easy for anyone who is so minded to carry out a relay system by personally importing cars from the Republic of Ireland into Northern Ireland? To what extent will personal imports be limited? Will someone who is travelling from the Republic to Northern Ireland once a day, week, month or year be subject to a restriction on the number of personal imports that he can bring into Northern Ireland, and from Northern Ireland into the rest of the United Kingdom?

Is it a fact that the price of vehicles in Northern Ireland could change fairly radically? A number of Northern Ireland citizens are expressing this fear. The Northern Ireland Car Importers Association has suggested that car prices in Northern Ireland will be increased if competition is stifled. It will be helpful if the Minister will express a view on the substance of the association's claims.

In common with the hon. Member for Londonderry, East and many in Northern Ireland, I welcome this measure, even though it is late in appearing before us. I do not want to delay its passage further.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): I find myself somewhat weirdly reminded by the order and the debate of Sir Robert Peel, the corn laws and the potato famine. The House will recall that Sir Robert was always intending to do something about the corn laws. When there was a potato famine in Northern Ireland—it had nothing to do with the corn laws and it would not have been alleviated by their repeal—he seized upon that event and, without arguing too nicely the logical relationship between the two, put forward the famine as a reason for repeal. It was one which no decent person could resist in co-operating with the proposed legislation, which he desired strongly upon other grounds.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) has generously recalled, I was one of those who were in correspondence with the Minister's predecessor three years ago about certain difficulties which were arising both for consumers and the trade in Northern Ireland as a result of imports from the Irish Republic. In the subsequent year or two, and for various reasons, the majority of which my hon. Friend touched upon, the problem put itself right. However, in the course of the examination of it, the fact that Northern Ireland was destitute of type approval legislation came to attention, and properly the Minister's predecessor recognised that this was something which should be put right. Certainly we should have some law in Northern Ireland in this respect, and we should always have had it, as on the mainland. It is welcome that the omission is now being made good. I thought that it should be recorded that the connection between the happy event occurring tonight and the difficulties of the year 1982 is anything but direct.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): It is always a pleasure to take up the remarks of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), who managed to deliver a small but pertinent history lesson in the course of discussing the order.

The Minister referred to consumer protection and road safety and the order seems to marry the two issues. The Opposition have noted that the purpose of the order is to ensure that new vehicles offered for sale are constructed to accepted international standards. We take on board the comment of the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) that the order has been some time coming. The right hon. Member for South Down described how it came to the attention of the Government in 1982. Nevertheless, we now have it. It offers protection and tries to guarantee to purchasers that vehicles, whatever their country of origin, comply fully with the requirements of road traffic law.

There was some severe criticism from the Independent Car Importers Association, which was worried about free trade in the European Community, in case the order would be in breach of the treaty of Rome, that it might increase the price of vehicles to consumers, about redundancies and about the possibility of inflated prices. Those anxieties were communicated to the Government through the Assembly, and the Environment Select Committee asked that the Government chat to the Independent Car Importers Association again. That happened and, through the Minister, the Government took cognisance of the association's views. There were further discussions.

A memorandum in the file that has been prepared by the Department of the Environment answers some of the criticisms. One paragraph of the memorandum states:

"If members of the Car Importers Association import vehicles which do not have type approval and wish to continue to sell those vehicles they will probably incur expenditure in arranging for type approval; whether those costs are passed on to the purchaser is a matter for the importer."

The Opposition have followed this debate with some care. The speeches have not lost any of their lucidity in their brevity. The Minister carefully said what the order was about. We offer our support for it, as do the other parties in the House.

Mr. Chris Patten: I shall try to be as brief as others have been, even if I cannot manage to be so lucid.

The hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) referred to the delay since a certain amount of dignified pressure was applied to my distinguished predecessor, now the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport, in 1982. There are several reasons for the delay on this important matter, and I do not believe that we can be accused of being too dilatory. It was necessary to engage in some fairly protracted consultations to try to satisfy — not wholly successfully I must admit — the conflicting interests in this issue. There has also been a great deal of Northern Ireland legislation in the past couple of years, as right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House will know. Some has been regarded as having higher priority than this, not least by the parliamentary draftsman. Nevertheless, I am sorry that we have not been able to act before. None of us is perfect, but at least we have the order before us now.

The hon. Member for Londonderry, East asked about prosecutions. The users of imported vehicles which do not conform to the construction and use regulations and/ or the lighting regulations are not being prosecuted, mainly because it is thought that the purchasers of imported vehicles would find it difficult or impossible to obtain information on whether their cars conformed to each of the relevant provisions of the construction, use and lighting regulations. For example, vehicles imported from or built for sale in the Republic of Ireland might not carry the appropriate markings to demonstrate compliance. The implementation of the order will substantially remove the need for future prosecution of this type.

Mr. William Ross: I apologise for interrupting the Minister, but I am curious about whether he had a word with the insurance companies. If somebody who has bought a vehicle which does not comply with the type regulations has an accident resulting from a fault, what will happen about his insurance?

Mr. Patten: If such an accident has already happened, as the legislation is not retrospective the driver of the vehicle will be in no difficulty after the legislation is passed. To get the vehicle licensed, the purchaser will have to go to the centre at Coleraine, and since his warranty will not show that type approval has been granted he will be unable to get a licence for the vehicle. I very much hope that such a situation will not arise.

The hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) asked whether somebody purchasing cars in the Republic and bringing considerable numbers into Northern Ireland would or would not satisfy the conditions for genuine personal imports. Personal imports have to satisfy fairly clear conditions. The vehicle must have been purchased outside the United Kingdom for the personal use of the individual importing it, or for his dependants. Secondly, the vehicle has to be shown to have been used by that individual or his dependants on roads outside the United Kingdom before it was imported. Thirdly, the vehicle has to be imported solely for personal use in the United Kingdom. Finally, the individual importing the vehicle has to show that he intends at the time when the vehicle is imported to remain in the United Kingdom for not less than 12 months from that time.

The second point raised by the hon. Member for Belfast, East related to car prices. I do not believe that car prices should be affected by the order. While the cost of type approval can be substantial, it is minimised when costs are spread over a long production run. Therefore, the introduction of type approval should not lead to increased prices. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be comforted by that fact. A recent House of Lords study of the European Commission's proposals on car pricing showed that car prices are determined by a complex series of factors; for example, the policies of individual Governments, price control, taxation policy, exchange rates and so on.

The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), who deserves much of the credit for this order, reminded us of the 19th century and in particular of Robert Peel. Putting recent controversy on one side, I think he demonstrated that Robert Peel was indeed a very proper Tory.

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) referred to the importance of the order both in terms of consumer protection and in terms of the improvement of road safety. It was doubtless for those reasons that, as the hon. Member for Belfast, East pointed out, the draft order was not only approved and accepted enthusiastically by the Assembly but was supported by the Automobile Association, the Royal Automobile Club and the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents. Following their support, I hope that the order will be supported by the House and that in doing so the House will recognise how much we owe to those right hon. and hon. Members representing Northern Ireland constituencies who have laboured in this particular vineyard and brought forth this particular crop.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Road Traffic (Type Approval) (Northern Ireland) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 18th February, be approved.

AGRICULTURAL TRAINING BOARD BILL [MONEY]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Agricultural Training Board Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any increase attributable to that Act in the sums so payable under any other enactment—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

RATING AND VALUATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 79(5) (Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

That the draft Docks and Harbours (Rateable Values) (Scotland) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 18th March, be approved—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

Question agreed to.

RESERVE FORCES (SAFEGUARD OF EMPLOYMENT) BILL [Lords]

Resolved,

That in respect of the Reserve Forces (Safeguard of Employment) Bill [Lords], Notices of Amendments, new Clauses and new Schedules to be moved in Committee may be accepted by the Clerks at the Table before the Bill has been read a second time.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS MEMBERS' FUND

Resolved,

That in pursuance of section 2 of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1939, Sir Geoffrey Finsberg be appointed a Managing Trustee of the House of Commons Members' Fund in the room of the late Sir Anthony Berry.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

PARLIAMENTARY CONTRIBUTORY PENSIONS FUND

Resolved,

That in pursuance of section 1 of the Parliamentary and Other Pensions Act 1972, Mr. Peter Hordern be appointed a Managing Trustee of the Parliamentary Contributory Pensions Fund in the room of the late Sir Anthony Berry.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

Public Service (Morale)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

10.55 pm

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): Last weekend, the Sunday Telegraph quoted Mr. Keith Hall of the Institution of Professional Civil Servants at the Agricultural and Food Research Council Letcombe laboratory in my constituency as saying that

"scientists are leaving the service because they are so unhappy with the way it is now being run. Morale is very low, and some people moving from here to other establishments know that their jobs might be at risk".

I was not thinking of Letcombe when I first applied three months ago to raise on the Adjournment the matter of morale in the public service. Nor do I have in mind exclusively the thousands of scientists and scientific staff working in the public sector in my constituency at Harwell, at the Rutherford laboratory, at the Royal College of Military Science at Shrivenham and just over the constituency border at Oxford university and the Culham laboratories. Rather, I want to consider the state of morale in the public service in its widest aspects. I want to look at the situation of all those in the civil employment of the Government, working in what economists describe as the non-market sector. Here I am thinking of all the hundreds of thousands of central Government civil and scientific servants and the employees of health authorities and local authorities, including teachers—in short, all the hundreds of thousands of people who make up such a large proportion of our constituents.

Let the Letcombe story, however, serve as an illustration of my theme because it illustrates the issues very well. In a nutshell, the closure of the Letcombe laboratory, which I did not criticise or oppose, came about as a result of a reappraisal by Government and their agencies of the costs and benefits of a whole line of policy — in this case, that of the public provision of agricultural research, especially in the production of cereals. What has happened—a fact which the Sunday Telegraph failed to mention in its criticism of the closure — is that Dow, a private sector firm engaged in agricultural research, has bought the Letcombe site and proposes to expand there.

At Letcombe we see the particular manifestation of a general phenomenon, that of Government deliberately reducing the commitments of the non-market public service to make room—quite literally in the case of Letcombe — for the expansion of market-oriented business, chiefly in the private sector. That is a strategy which I and all Conservative Members support and which has the approval of some of the saner Labour Members, not to mention the alliance—at least when it is turning its tough rather than its tender face towards the electorate. Moreover, it is at least arguable that the strategy was approved by the country in 1979 and 1983 when this revision of the role of Government was the fundamental issue in two general elections.

At the heart of the matter is the fact that the nation, or at least the major part of it, seems to have arrived at lower expectations of what can be achieved through the agency of Government and hence of the public service. Moreover, in all the activities of the public sector it is looking for the closer relationship between costs and benefits that is experienced under market disciplines and by the use of managerial techniques developed in the private sector.

For those employed in the public sector, this change has had profound implications. I wish to spell out just three of those which I consider to be most important.

First, the Government's efforts to create the conditions for a market-led British economic renaissance through tax cuts and the reduction of public borrowing has had a powerful impact on public sector employment. Between 1979 and 1984, the number employed by central Government fell from 732,000 to 617,000, and in local government the number fell by a similar but lesser order. As a result of these changes, whose implementation, it must be admitted, has involved an inescapable arbitrariness, the work loads on individuals have undoubtedly increased, promotion prospects have been reduced and at the same time in many areas the scope and interest of the work has diminished.

As to wages and salaries, the position is more complicated, because so much depends upon the choice of a base year for comparisons. Undoubtedly some sections of the public service have seen real cuts — I think particularly of university teachers — while for most, including school teachers, the real value of their incomes has at least been sustained since 1979. Broadly, however, the picture seems to me to be one of a movement from an historic pattern, which lasted until the late 1950s, of relatively low salaries in the public sector bound up with greater job security, through a period in the 1960s and early 1970s when public service salaries rose relative to the private sector, but with no loss of job security, to a trend since the mid-1970s back towards the original pattern. While no doubt this is a more sustainable position, the return to it has certainly disturbed the exaggerated expectations built up in previous years.

There is a second implication of the new approach, the effects of the programme of privatisation and "contractorisation", together with the introduction of new management techniques which emphasise direct responsibility and accountability.

By the end of the 1980s, privatisation, coupled with the growth of trading funds in the public sector and the reduction of direct labour, will have removed hundreds of thousands of public employees from what they have often felt to be the security and stability of the public service to the perceived insecurity and risks of the market place. Within the central Civil Service, in the Health Service and, as we see, in the current teachers' dispute, there is a new emphasis on stronger line management and on performance, and this new emphasis is also disturbing traditional hierarchies and exposing the public service to unfamiliar and disturbing pressures.

Then there are the implications of the Government's efforts to promote a revived enterprise culture. This emphasis on the role and value of the wealth-creating entrepreneur is bound to have some impact on the self-regard of public servants and the esteem in which they are held by society at large.

Here we are in the difficult realm of psychology, and sometimes irrational psychology at that. Nevertheless, it is a real question what conclusions a public servant, whether in Whitehall, county hall, in the schools, in hospitals or in government laboratories, should draw from the idea—perhaps it is a caricature—that what matters most is the creation of new wealth by go-getting risk takers buying and selling in the market place.

Does this mean, some ask, that the rest of us are parasites? From the ethical point of view, does it mean that caring is less important than wealth creation? From the economic point of view, does it mean that the creation of wealth can be dissociated from the provision of those external public goods which sustain the framework of the market place and facilitate its workings? If one of the causes of the British disease is a culture hostile to enterprise, does this mean that the values imparted or reinforced in our schools and universities are wrong—that our teachers have the wrong values?

These are all good questions, and I dare say that all hon. Members are finding that they are questions which in one way or another are being asked with growing insistence every time we open our postbag or visit offices and schools in our constituencies.

It is these questions, this experience, which have prompted me to raise on the Adjournment the problem of morale in the public service. That there is a problem no one could doubt, although I guess that my analysis of its origins may be more controversial. What we can and should do about it is yet another matter.

For my part, I do not believe that the answer lies in an abandonment of the more rigorous approach to the purposes and cost-effectiveness of the public service that has prevailed since 1979 — or was it 1976? The diminished expectations of what can be achieved by Government and their servants, and the greater emphasis on value for money: those are not only welcomed by most of our people, including most public servants, but they represent a historical shift paralleled by trends in other advanced industrial countries of the First world.

The truth is that throughout the West we have come to the end of an exceptional period of some 40 years in which exaggerated hopes were placed in Government. We hoped for ever-expanding economic progress and for ever-rising standards of welfare and popular education. To secure those goods, we put our faith in a public administration growing in numbers, remuneration and prestige. After 40 years of that, we have everywhere in the West reached a more realistic sense of the limits of what Government can do. We know that the public service cannot create wealth directly and that it frequently consumes more than it produces. We know that in health and education more does not necessarily mean better. In all that, it follows that a Government with more modest aims implies a public service of more modest dimensions, receiving more modest rewards, and playing a generally more humble role in the scheme of things.

Therefore, the solution of the problem of morale in the public service does not lie in more pay or greater numbers. Rather, I believe that it lies in the more difficult and less tangible area of psychology to which I referred when I spoke about the implications for the public service of the attempt to rebuild an "enterprise culture" in Britain. The Government—my party—are right to perceive at the heart of our economic difficulties a problem of values. It is true that mid-20th century Britain—the Britain which wound up the empire and developed the welfare state—was a Britain that placed too much emphasis on distributing wealth rather than creating it.

However, I fear that in pursuing a cure based upon that diagnosis we may have narrowed our focus excessively and even perhaps lost something of that balance that is required in all things. Britain is, and will remain, a country in which the values of an enterprise culture must flourish alongside other values that are not necessarily opposed to them—the values of caring, healing, teaching and the pursuit of knowledge for its own sake. The Conservative party is, and must remain, a party in which the values of the businessman run in harness with the tradition of public service.

In conclusion, I return to Letcombe. In spite of the regrettable actions currently being undertaken by civil servants and teachers, from my experience of that closure I would say that the core of the ethos of public service —that willingness to put the wider interest first—still exists. The people concerned at Letcombe could and did understand the need for reduction and rationalisation, although in some cases it took place at the expense of their private interests. Many, indeed probably most, public servants understand the need for radical changes if Britain is to break out of her deep-rooted pattern of relative economic decline. However, that appreciation will be sustained only if as a Government and as a party we continue for our part to show our appreciation of the vital role in Britain's future of a committed and well-motivated public service.

11.8 pm

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) on his wide-ranging and elegant speech, which deserves a better reply than he will get from me. It will be worth study by people who are concerned with the public service. The subject that he raises is of high importance. However, as he acknowledged, it covers a vast area. In a 30-minute debate it is difficult to deal adequately with the range of the subject.

As my hon. Friend acknowledged, the public service embraces over 5 million employees. Roughly one in five of the working population is employed full time or part time in the armed forces, the National Health Service, by local authorities, in the education service and the universities, and in the Civil Service. It is only the Civil Service for which I have particular and direct responsibilities, although I well recognise the importance of high morale in every area of the public service and at every level within it.

My hon. Friend referred to a few specific cases, and particularly to the Letcombe laboratory, which closed as from 31 March this year. I understand that the work that was being carried out at Letcombe will be maintained following the merger with Rothamsted. Indeed, the intention is that it should be strengthened by putting it alongside a wide range of related scientific disciplines and field experiments. I think that the comments made by the IPCS representative, to which my hon. Friend referred, were unduly exaggerated, taking account of the particular circumstances. I was, of course, delighted to hear from my hon. Friend that the site has now been taken over and is to be used. I hope that it will offer employment to people in the locality.

My hon. Friend also referred to the Royal Military College of Science at Shrivenham. I must be one of the few people who have never been in the armed forces but have nevertheless done a course at Shrivenham on atomic energy. While I was there I also visited the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority establishment in Harwell, so I have many connections with the area of the country from which my hon. Friend comes.

Shrivenham has seen changes. It has moved towards the teaching staff being privatised by a contractual arrangement with the Cranfield Institute of Technology. From what I hear, that is going extremely well.

We need to remember that across the whole field of our public service we have some areas which have a quite remarkable worldwide reputation for scientific excellence. I mentioned Harwell a moment ago, which certainly would fall into that category. One sees a major and significant role in the years ahead for those parts of the public service.

We acknowledge the problems and difficulties of recent years, but looking particularly at the Civil Service, and thinking of the time when I, as a very junior member of the scientific and engineering parts of the Civil Service between 1944 and 1963, was occupied with technical matters, I see that enormous changes having taken place. These have occurred not least over the last six years, when a very determined effort has been made by the Government,—as was recognised by my hon. Friend—to change the patterns of thinking within the Civil Service, which had over the years developed a remarkable facility for carrying out the duties placed upon it by this Parliament and by the Executive, sometimes in such a way that the carrying out of the task or function appeared to be the absolute aim, without real concern for the costs of the operation. One of the great contributions which has come from my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and, particularly, from Lord Rayner, who aided her very much in the early years of her Government, has been in getting a much greater awareness of the need for cost-effectiveness in the operations within the public service, just as the discipline of the bottom line in private industry imposes that discipline on people in the private sector.

The changes that we have seen—and my hon. Friend mentioned privatisation, which at least in part has led to the reduction in numbers in the Civil Service, to which he referred, although most of that reduction has come from improved efficiency within the service—have brought a great deal of uncertainty, problems for management and understandable concern among the staff. Inevitably, morale has been affected. More effort must be made to achieve better communications and to improve management skills.

Good communications between management and staff have traditionally received too little attention within the Civil Service. But Departments have now identified them as a priority. Much is being done with welcome innovations in the communications methods and media used.

Effective communications can help civil servants understand how their work is used, why changes in procedures and methods are necessary, and how they will be affected by changes. In industry, studies show that the increased understanding that goes with better communications results in increased productivity, fewer industrial disputes, and better customer relations. We set similar targets within the Civil Service.

Individual Departments have carried out their own scrutinies of internal communications. Last year the Cabinet Office and Treasury commissioned a major study by specialist consultants of communications between management and staff across the whole of the Civil Service. The consultants are now completing their report and I look forward to seeing what improvements they recommend.

Centrally, we have tried to emphasise the importance attached to good communications in other ways: for example, by initiating a new series of newsletters for distribution to managers throughout the Civil Service; by circulating to a network of communications contacts in Departments examples of good practice, from both the public and private sectors; and by organising seminars and training courses for Civil Service managers at senior levels. Much greater emphasis is being put on management techniques and skills.

In the past, management information on, for example, pay or conditions of service often came to the staff via trade union channels rather than directly from management. It is no wonder that its presentation sometimes left much to be desired. Now management has better accepted, and is better carrying out, its essential task of keeping individual members of staff properly informed. I hope that it is also becoming more responsive to suggestions and ideas about improving the efficiency and effectiveness of the work done. Good management requires genuine two-way communications. This in turn helps keep morale high.

Of all parts of the public service, the Civil Service attracts the most unfair and ill-informed criticism generally, and particularly in the popular press. Yet the Civil Service does essential work for the community. It discharges tasks given it by Parliament and the Executive with a dedication and spirit of service which deserves high commendation.

It is a pity that some Civil Service union leaders are seeking to manipulate the staff of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise to inconvenience the public to attract publicity for their pay claim. It is unfortunate that on a day when this matter is being raised in such a broad and generous spirit in relation to the whole of the public service, some trade union leaders should behave so cynically by urging their members to disrupt holiday traffic over the bank holiday weekend.

It is not appropriate to discuss pay tonight. It is better that private talks and negotiations continue. I hope that a settlement of the present dispute within the Civil Service will be reached. Plans for strikes and disruptive action by the unions concerned are inappropriate at this time.

The Government believe that pay levels must be such as to recruit, retain and motivate sufficient staff of the quality needed to carry out the work asked of them. That approach has determined our attitude in the pay negotiations in recent years. Recruitment is generally satisfactory, although there are some problem areas—for example, among scientists, engineers, accountants, personal secretaries in London and executive officers, although it is worth noting that a much higher proportion of the new entrants to the executive officer grade are graduates than was the case in past years. I am delighted that recruitment of administrative trainees into the Civil Service—the high flyers for the future—was much more satisfactory in 1984 than in some other recent years.

The Civil Service competes with other employers in the public and private sectors, and so it should. I do not believe that the Civil Service should have some prior claim on the best talent, but it would be a bad and sad day if the Civil Service did not continue to attract people of high ability and great dedication. I share my hon. Friend's concern about the over-sharp distinction which is sometimes made between the public service and the private sector, as though one were good and the other were bad, and as though in some way, because the private sector was wealth creating and the public service was wealth consuming, one was superior to the other. That is a totally mistaken view.

Of course we must do just what my hon. Friend suggested. We must get the balance right, encouraging the enterprise culture, which must develop and expand if we are to get the jobs and the prosperity to which we all look forward, but doing so in a way that does not demean or detract from the essential contribution that must come from the great areas of public service within our society. If this debate has done no more than assert again the importance of the private and public sectors and the partnership and proper balance between them, it will have been well worth while.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-three minutes past Eleven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

Planning Applications (Representations)

1. Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proposals he has for facilitating representations on applications for planning permission by the owners or occupiers of contiguous land.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Chris Patten): I recently introduced a neighbour notification scheme in Northern Ireland. Under this scheme the occupiers of land adjoining a site which is the subject of a planning application are notified of that application and given the opportunity of making representations before the application is decided.

Mr. Powell: Will the Minister do his best to ensure that this welcome and desirable reform is given statutory force as soon as practicable, especially in the light of his disclosure last night that there is a bottleneck in the draftsmanship department of the Northern Ireland Office?

Mr. Patten: I shall certainly ensure that we get ahead and provide a statutory base as soon as possible. We are talking about an interim scheme. Work on the amending Order in Council has begun, but we will obviously want widely to consult right hon. and hon. Members about the precise terms of the legislation.

Mr. William Ross: Do the new notification procedures which the Minister mentioned cover the farming community and tenants of dwellinghouses, and, in particular, the tenants of Housing Executive dwellings?

Mr. Patten: For very good reasons the procedures cover occupiers rather than owners.

Mr. Peter Robinson: Is my hon. Friend the Minister, like me, encouraged to hear the right hon. Member for South Down, (Mr. Powell) welcoming a measure introduced at the behest of the Northern Ireland Assembly? Will my hon. Friend go one step further and consider site notification?

Mr. Patten: As my hon. Friend knows, we are also looking at site notification and experimenting in that direction. As for encouragement, I am always encouraged by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell).

Mr. Alexander: Is there not an anomaly in the general law here? Is it not true that if someone is refused planning permission for his own property he can appeal, but that if something horrendous is happening next door, such as the erection of a fish and chip shop or a petrol station, he has no right of appeal? Should not the new provisions being applied to Northern Ireland be extended to the general law in this country?

Mr. Patten: We are also considering the whole question of third party appeals. It is often the case that the things that we do in Northern Ireland could well be transplanted elsewhere.

Security

2. Mr. Molyneaux asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the security situation in Northern Ireland.

10. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the current security situation.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Hurd): Since I last answered questions in the House on 7 March, one soldier, two police officers and one civilian have died in incidents arising from the security situation in the Province, making a total of four. As the House will be aware, two of these deaths occurred yesterday morning when a car bomb exploded outside Newry courthouse. The Provisional IRA has claimed responsibility for all these brutal murders. The House will want to join me in expressing abhorrence and extending deep sympathy to the families of all who have died.

So far this year a total of 120 people have been charged with serious offences, including 15 with murder and 11 with attempted murder; and 54 weapons, 2,160 rounds of ammunition and 3 lb of explosives have been recovered.

Mr. Molyneaux: May I join the Secretary of State in his condemnation of yesterday's atrocity and in extending our sympathy to the bereaved? As it is human nature to slip into predictable routines, could certain individuals be given the duty of alerting their colleagues to the dangers of following fixed patterns? Those individuals could perhaps regard it as their task to suggest variations in those routines.

Mr. Hurd: It is certainly a principle of good security policy that that policy and its procedures should be varied and kept under review. There are a number of legitimate questions arising out of what happened yesterday that need investigation.

Mr. Proctor: The whole House will wish to join in the sentiments expressed by my right hon. Friend. Will he confirm that the SAS and other undercover security forces are active in the frontier area, and that those forces will be increased in and around Newry and South Armagh in the light of yesterday's events?

Mr. Hurd: I can confirm that the General Officer Commanding has at his disposal in Northern Ireland specialist Army units which he deploys to meet operational needs throughout the Province. My hon. Friend will understand why it would not be sensible for me to go further than that.

Mr. Nicholson: I join the Secretary of State and my right hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) in offering sympathy to those who have been bereaved. Yesterday saw the death of the 10th member of the RUC to be murdered in my constituency in the past five weeks, and a civilian was also murdered. Will the Secretary of State assure the House that he will give further consideration to more security measures in the Newry area, which in the past nine months has been the subject of continuous bombings and murder attacks? We appear to be getting nowhere, despite all the assurances. However, will the right hon. Gentleman assure me, the House and my constituents that a firm security policy will be adopted and maintained in the Newry area?

Mr. Hurd: There is a firm security policy, but I share the hon. Gentleman's feelings of outrage about what has been going on in his constituency. As I said to the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux), I agree that security policy and the emphasis on deployment in different parts of the Province need to be constantly examined and should be examined again in the light of what happened yesterday.

Rev. William McCrea: Does the Secretary of State agree with Ulster Members that the present security policy has been proved to be a failure, and that it ensures only that the constituents of the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Nicholson) and other hon. Members are put into coffins--the coffins of good Ulster, decent British citizens?

Mr. Hurd: That is not a worthy comment at this time. I do not believe that the security policy has failed. It is given a high priority and attention, as must be right in the circumstances of the Province, and we defend it robustly against attacks and criticisms, as is also our duty. The hon. Gentleman makes no constructive suggestion. I am always open, as are the Chief Constable and the General Officer Commanding, to constructive suggestions, particularly from elected representatives in Northern Ireland.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: On the general background to the security situation in Northern Ireland, and acknowledging that, from time to time, it is perceived to be in the national interest that we should humbug the Americans, will the Secretary of State constantly recall the old wartime adage "Careless talk costs lives", and realise that words that are seen to be flannel in other contexts can be misunderstood in certain different places, with disastrous consequences?

Mr. Hurd: I have spent a large part of the last week or so trying to explain in the United States of America the complexities of the situation in Northern Ireland and Ireland, and trying to discourage the idea that there is a single key that will turn a single lock and solve the problem.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: I welcome the condemnation of terrorist outrages by the Catholic hierarchy and the splendid statements of Catholic priests, which are so seldom publicised. Is my right hon. Friend aware that many Catholics on both sides of the water would be grateful if we could have an end to all equivocation in these matters, and an appeal from the Catholic church to Catholics to join security forces and replace those Catholics who have been murdered doing their duty?

Mr. Hurd: It is desirable that representatives of all Churches should underline to those who listen to them that the role of the security forces in Northern Ireland is basically to protect the simplest human right of all—the right of the citizen to go about his daily lawful occasions in peace and security.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: May I be associated with the Secretary of State's sentiments about yesterday's atrocities? Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the allegations of torture by Paul Caruana, held under the Prevention of Terrorism Act, have a dramatic effect on the minority community and their feelings about the security forces? I do not expect the Secretary of State to comment today on the details of the case, but will he guarantee that the detailed questions asked by Amnesty International will be answered in time?

Mr. Hurd: Mr. Caruana's allegations are being fully investigated through the normal procedures. An investigation has been conducted by the RUC complaints and discipline branch. Its report was forwarded to the Director of Public Prosecutions, who decided, after careful examination of all the evidence, including the medical evidence, that the prosecution of any of those involved was not warranted. The RUC is now following the usual procedures and submitting its report to the Police Complaints Board for consideration.

Dr. Mawhinney: In the widely reported discussions which my right hon. Friend is having with Irish Ministers about security in the Province and the possibility of a consultative role for Irish Ministers, is he also discussing the possibility of a consultative role for himself and his colleagues in security arrangements in the Republic, particularly in areas close to the border?

Mr. Hurd: We discuss all aspects of security co-operation with the authorities in the Republic. That discussion continued under different Irish and British Governments long before the current dialogue with the Irish Government stemming from the recent Chequers communiqué. I agree that in practice — in terms of money, arms, explosives and policing — our security effort depends to a considerable extent for its effectiveness on a matching effort by the Republic.

Mr. Archer: I do not ask the right hon. Gentleman to comment on the facts of the Caruana case, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) referred, but will he declare clearly that the rule of law is one and indivisible and that it cannot be preserved by invoking Satan to cast out Satan? Will he assure the House that the report by the Police Complaints Board will be made public? Will he then make a statement to the House on the recommendations in the Bennett report and to what extent they have been implemented?

Mr. Hurd: The security forces—both the police and the Army—in Northern Ireland operate under the rule of law. That is what distinguishes them from an army of occupation operating under military law. The normal procedures of investigation, and review of that investigation, by independent bodies—the DPP and the Police Complaints Board — are being followed in the Caruana case. The Bennett report has often been discussed in the House and everyone agrees that the situation has markedly improved in recent years. The case will continue to be followed through in accordance with the usual procedures.

Broadcasting Authorities

3. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he last met the broadcasting authorities in Northern Ireland; and what subjects were discussed.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Nicholas Scott): My right hon. Friend would not expect to have formal meetings with the broadcasting authorities, which are not responsible to him. However, he met both the BBC's Northern Ireland governor and the IBA's national member for Northern Ireland socially during February.

Mr. Bruinvels: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. When he next meets representatives of the BBC and ITV, will he convey to them the worrying anxiety felt throughout Britain and Northern Ireland about the filming of IRA funerals at which rifles are fired? Is my hon. Friend aware that it is grossly offensive and thoroughly unhelpful? People are sickened when the BBC interviews IRA terrorists who threaten our country. Should not both the broadcasting authorities respond more actively and responsibly?

Mr. Scott: I recognise the widespread offence that is caused by the televising of funerals which are turned into propaganda exercises by the paramilitaries. However, it would be wrong for the Government to try to prohibit the reporting by the media of such funerals. The media must use their own editorial judgment about such matters, just as the security forces have to use their judgment on the ground when paramilitary displays take place at such funerals. I am sure that those responsible will have noted my hon. Friend's remarks.

Mr. McCusker: Will the Minister also discuss with the authorities in Northern Ireland the disquiet felt by my colleagues and I and many others about the investigative follow-up by the BBC in the aftermath of a number of sensitive security issues? I believe that that has virtually prejudiced any prospect of a police or UDR man getting a fair hearing or a fair trial in any subsequent action.

If the authorities in Northern Ireland deny what I am saying, perhaps the Minister will ask them why they refused to give me a transcript of one particular incident?

Mr. Scott: If the hon. Gentleman would care to write to me about that incident, we shall see whether there is an opportunity to raise it. The best way to handle these matters is for elected representatives and members of the public to make their views known direct to the broadcasting authorities.

Unemployment

4. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to reduce unemployment in the Province.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Dr. Rhodes Boyson): I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave yesterday to his written question.

Mr. Parry: Is not the Government's record on unemployment in the Province absolutely disgraceful? When the Government took power in June 1979 there were 59,600 people unemployed in the Province. In February this year the number had risen to 122,157—an increase from 10·3 to 21·2 per cent. Does the Minister agree that the additional 6p tax on cigarettes announced in the Budget will lead to further job losses in the tobacco industry in the Province?

Dr. Boyson: The rate of unemployment in Northern Ireland was increasing before 1979, when the Labour Government were in power, and that applies also to Great Britain. However, no one here welcomes unemployment in Northern Ireland any more than does the hon. Gentleman. Between 1960 and 1983 unemployment rose by 84,000, but the actual drop in the number of people employed was only 6,000. Therefore, 78,000 were accounted for by increased personnel in the Province, a birth rate 50 per cent. higher than in Great Britain and women wishing to return to work——

Mr. Canavan: That has nothing to do with it.

Dr. Boyson: The hon. Gentleman may say that, but if he speaks to the parents in the Province he will find that they notice when they have more children.

The actual increase in the rate of unemployment has decreased tremendously in recent years and we all look forward to the time when employment increases. In 1982 unemployment was increasing by 1,100 a month, in 1983 by 600 a month and last year by only 200 a month. However, between July and December last year there was an increase in employment in the Province of 4,100.

Mr. Beggs: Does the Minister agree that it is important that new products should be found to create new job opportunities in Northern Ireland? Is he aware that Antrim Creameries in Ballynure has successfully produced a new product which it wishes to market as a cheese spread? However, under present food labelling regulations, because it has a fat content of less than 10 per cent., the product cannot be marketed as such. Will the Minister endeavour to have the food labelling regulations changed as quickly as possible so that new jobs can be created?

Dr. Boyson: I agree that it is vital to find new products to replace those lost with the decline of the old industries. I shall investigate the matter of Antrim Creameries. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I know from a recent visit, the Milk Marketing Board is active in that area and products from the MMB and farms in Northern Ireland are being sold throughout the world.

Mr. Warren: Is my hon. Friend aware that I am the chairman of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, which recently had two opportunities to visit Northern Ireland to study industrial and commercial development? Is he further aware of how impressed we were with the efficiency and enterprise of all workers in the Province? Does he accept that while there may be a lot of nuts in Noraid trying to make the Province as dangerous a place as New York city, Ulster is certainly a good place in which to invest?

Dr. Boyson: I am sure that hon. Members in all parts of the House will agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren). Twice he has been to the Province with the members of that Select Committee, and I have had the privilege of meeting him and his fellow members on each occasion. Undoubtedly, employers in Ulster, and employers from outside who have invested there, pay tribute to the conscientiousness and reliability of the members of both communities working in the factories of Northern Ireland. The more that that can be made known in Britain and throughout the world, the better. We must do our best to build up tourism in that beautiful Province. Great opportunities exist there. Hon. Members who take all possible steps to publicise the advantages of Northern Ireland, in relation to sport and in many other ways, do a great service to the Province.

Mr. Hume: The Minister will be aware of the parliamentary answer that he gave me last week containing the unemployment figures for each of the 17 constituencies in Northern Ireland. Has he noted that the two constituencies whose unemployment figures exceed all others are Foyle and Belfast, West? Does he draw any political conclusions from that, for example, about the relationship between the rate of unemployment and violence? Does he agree that special attention should be given to the unemployment problems of those constituencies? Why is his Department making cuts in the valuable work of the youth and community workshop in Derry?

Dr. Boyson: The answer to the second part of that supplementary question is that we have cut back only where all the places have not been filled. The figures show that 77 vacancies exist in the Foyle area. It is highly expensive to have places in community and other centres involved in youth programmes that are not filled. We are relating demand to supply.

The answer to the first part is that I am aware of the high rates of unemployment in Belfast, West and in Foyle. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that I have been concerned to assist with the continuance of employment, for example, at Molins and at other works. Clearly, a decline in violence would help to bring other employers in. I am making arrangements to meet people in May from West Belfast, including priests and the bishop of the area, to see what can be done by way of co-operation between the Government, trade unions, employers and the people of the area to improve employment prospects.

Rev. William McCrea: Is the Minister aware that a certain hypocrisy is shown by Opposition Members when we debate unemployment, in that the creation of jobs is not encouraged when leading members of the Labour party associate with members of Sinn Fein and the Provisional IRA, who are blasting jobs out of existence in the Province?

Dr. Boyson: There is a degree of truth in that, although many Opposition Members would not agree. To invite members of Sinn Fein to this House and to speak to them here undermines the whole issue of confidence in the Province. Nor is it helpful to the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Bell: Her Majesty's official Opposition will not be distracted by the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea), and I assure him and the House that, as we have said on many occasions, the Opposition have no truck with and do not support violence in any form. It is hypocritical of the hon. Gentleman to seek to distract attention from the important issue of unemployment.

With the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren), I compliment the efficiency and enterprise of the workers of Ulster. I spent yesterday with trade unionists and industrialists there. Does the Minister share the widespread feeling that I found yesterday that Northern Ireland is a low-wage, unemployment economy? If so, does he acquiesce in it? If not, what steps does he propose to change that sentiment, which is abroad in the province?

Dr. Boyson: I am sure that every hon. Member welcomes the hon. Gentleman's frank statement about Sinn Fein and violence in the Province. I welcome the hon. Gentleman's agreement with my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren). The Government do not lay down the wages that are paid throughout the economy — that is done by agreement between employers and workers. It is difficult for employers and employees to have a high-wage economy in view of the fact that firms in Northern Ireland have to compete with firms in Southern Ireland, which are near the increasing markets of Europe and because of the costs of energy and transport. I share the hon. Gentleman's desire that we should develop full employment with good wages and good conditions in factories to encourage other people to come to the Province.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Shorter questions may lead to shorter answers.

Short Brothers, Belfast

5. Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has any plans to meet representatives of Short Brothers, Belfast.

Mr. Hurd: I have no immediate plans to meet representatives of Shorts, but I keep in regular contact with the chairman of the company.

Mr. Ross: Should not the right hon. Gentleman change his mind and meet representatives of Shorts to receive the congratulations of workers and management because the Government have finally followed the American military establishment and the commercial world in ordering a high-quality product from Shorts? Will the right hon. Gentleman encourage the management of Shorts to ensure future high quality work by continuing to engage a large number of young apprentices and giving them the proper training that is required to keep the firm in the forefront of this technology?

Mr. Hurd: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I was delighted that the contract for the RAF trainer went to Shorts. I was especially delighted because there was no need for any special pleading or special subsidy in that regard. [Interruption.] I can tell the House from certain knowledge that the contract was clearly awarded on merit, simply because Shorts beat the competition. I agree with the hon. Gentleman's point about apprentices. Since becoming Secretary of State, one of the most heartening sights that I have seen is the apprentice shop at Shorts. I have seen how engineers of the future from both communities in the Province are working together.

Mr. Stephen Ross: The words of the Secretary of State are slightly hard to swallow for one who was involved with one of the three other contenders for the contract. I remind the right hon. Gentleman that the wings for the Short 330 and 360 are made in my constituency, where there is unemployment of 17·3 per cent. When the right hon. Gentleman sees Sir Philip Foreman—I congratulate him on his success—will he remind him that any crumbs from his table will be gratefully received in the Isle of Wight?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman is a graceful loser. We have unemployment of between 21 and 22 per cent.

Mr. Peter Robinson: Does the right hon. Gentleman not think it strange that the Liberal party spokesman for Northern Ireland has done his best to ensure that Northern Ireland does not get jobs for the Shorts aircraft industry? Does he further agree that the best encouragement that can be given to the work force at Shorts is for him to announce that the will not proceed with the privatisation of the company?

Mr. Hurd: I do not agree with the hon. Member's last point. If Shorts could be successfully privatised—this is still an "if"—that would be a considerable tonic for the private sector in Northern Ireland. It certainly was unfortunate that the official Liberal and Labour party spokesmen seemed to be against the fact that Shorts won this defence contract. That does not in any way diminish our pleasure.

Mr. Archer: In order not to mar a joyful and, I should have thought, unanimous occasion, will the right hon. Gentleman, if he meets representatives of Shorts, extend to them the warm congratulations of those on the Labour Benches on the successful outcome of the Tucano project? Will he assure them that the Government will not, by any doctrinaire privatisation manoeuvres, destroy the company's successful progress, dismember the enterprise and endanger the employment of those who work there?

Mr. Hurd: There will be nothing doctrinaire in our approach. I am delighted that the right hon. and learned Gentleman and the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) rejoice in Shorts' success.

Maze Prison (Special Category Prisoners)

6. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many special category prisoners remain in Her Majesty's prison, Maze, or elsewhere; and how many prisoners are held at the Secretary of State's pleasure.

Mr. Scott: There are 162 special category prisoners, all of whom are in Maze compound prison. Sixty-one persons are currently detained at the pleasure of the Secretary of State.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Will the Northern Ireland Office seek the fullest possible particulars of the extent to which prisoners convicted of terrorism do or do not return to paramilitary activity afterwards? In the light of such particulars, will the Secretary of State review the position of the young offenders held at his pleasure?

Mr. Scott: We are engaged now in the procedure of reviewing all those serving indeterminate sentences, as the appropriate time in their sentence is reached. The prisoners have the chance to put in written representations, and their cases are eventually discussed by a life sentence review board before being considered by Ministers. Already under that procedure 10 young prisoners have had dates fixed for their release, as well as three life sentence prisoners. That procedure will continue.

My hon. Friend has put his finger on a very important matter. In coming to these decisions, the possibility of re-offence, and thus the safety of the public, has to be at the forefront of our minds.

Mr. Hume: The Minister is no doubt aware that the process that he mentioned for the setting of release dates for young prisoners held at the pleasure of the Secretary of State has been welcomed by representatives of all sides of the community. In the light of that, will he do his best to speed up the process?

Mr. Scott: We have to consider each of the cases very carefully on its merits, bearing in mind the time that the person has served, the degree of involvement in the original crime, and the behaviour of the prisoner while in prison. The final, and in many ways the paramount, consideration has to be the likelihood of re-offence.

SDLP (Security Forces)

7. Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has recently discussed with leaders of the Social Democratic and Labour Party their attitude towards the security forces in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: I have had a number of recent discussions on security issues with representatives of the Social Democratic and Labour party. I have made clear in particular my hope that the constitutional representatives of the minority community will take full advantage of the various opportunities that exist at local and provincial level to make their views known on policing matters to the Royal Ulster Constabulary.

Dr. Mawhinney: Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is unlikely to be a stable security position in Northern Ireland while the minority community neither supports nor even recognises the security forces, and if that view is also the reflected view of the leaders of the Social Democratic and Labour party? Will my right hon. Friend encourage the SDLP, if it wishes to be viewed as a constitutional party, and if its members wish to be viewed as constitutional politicians, to offer its support and recognition to the security forces? Then we could discuss other matters which are of security interest to it and to the Province.

Mr. Hurd: It is true that many members of the minority community serve in and fully support the security forces, as the casualty figures show. I agree with my hon. Friend that it is highly desirable that the representatives of the minority community should, in word and in deed, make their criticisms where they think criticisms are justified but, having done that, should join in understanding and proclaiming the fact that the security forces exist to protect the rights of the citizen, Catholic and Protestant, throughout Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hume: Will the Secretary of State, in replying to questions about the SDLP from the hon. Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney), take account of the well-known antipathy of that hon. Member to the SDLP and his well-known capacity for distorting the views and attitudes of that party? Will the Secretary of State tell his hon. Friend to find out what the position is before putting forward his views on our position with regard to the security forces and before making definitive statements in this House?

I remind the Secretary of State of what I have said very often — that we fully support the security forces in impartially seeking out anybody who commits a crime in Northern Ireland. We have said that repeatedly, but we have gone on to mention the sort of community confidence that is required to deal with the security situation in Northern Ireland. It must be the community confidence that applies in every democratic society. It must be based on consensus about government, which is the basis of order in any democratic society.

Mr. Hurd: I thought that my hon. Friend's question was helpful in intention and in effect. I am familiar with the attitude displayed by the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume). I hope that he will encourage his friends in Northern Ireland to take advantage of the opportunities which exist, and other opportunities which might be brought into existence inside the Province, to express their views in groups and places where those views can have influence.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the SDLP would also enhance its constitutional status if it were to take part in the workings of the Assembly and express those constitutional views there?

Mr. Hurd: Indeed, I wish that that were possible.

Mr. William Ross: Despite the words of the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume), is the Secretary of State not aware that the perception in Northern Ireland is that the SDLP does not support the security forces? Does that not lead to a situation in which that evident lack of support means that people whom the SDLP claims to represent are unwilling to come forward to give evidence in cases of murder, even when those murdered are leaving mass?

Mr. Hurd: I hope that everybody in Northern Ireland, regardless of community, will encourage people who are witnesses of crime or have evidence that could lead to the prosecution and conviction of criminals, to come forward without fear.

Mr. Hirst: Notwithstanding the views of the SDLP, may I ask my right hon. Friend whether he is satisfied with the levels of overtime currently being worked by members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary?

Mr. Hurd: I am sure that my hon. Friend will understand this. It is a mistake, which is quite often made in Northern Ireland, to suppose that overtime is a measure of the effectiveness of the police force. Indeed, too much overtime is obviously not a sign of a healthy and effective force. A much better measure of police activity is the man hours worked. I am glad to be able to tell the House that the figures for the year just ended show that police man hours worked in Northern Ireland were up to 23·8 million in 1984-85 compared with 23·3 million in 1983-84—a substantial increase.

A26 (Antrim-Ballymena)

8. Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he is in a position to report on the progress of the public inquiry into the proposed dualling of the A26 between Antrim and Ballymena.

Mr. Chris Patten: The inquiry closed on 19 March this year, and I now await the inspector's report.

Mr. Forsythe: Because the inquiry has lasted considerably longer than the three days confidently predicted by the Department at the outset, will the Minister now look at ways of compensating objectors because of the additional legal costs involved, bearing in mind that the delays were caused by the Department in the presentation of its evidence and, on some occasions, by the non-presentation of its evidence?

Mr. Patten: I realise that the length of the inquiry—I think that in all it sat for 16 days over a couple of months—raised certain problems. We shall consider as rapidly as we can any claims as soon as we have received the inspector's report.

Ancillary Health Workers

9. Mr. Randall asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will indicate the number of ancillary workers currently employed by the Eastern Health and Social Services Board in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: At the end of last year 6,451 ancillary workers were employed by the Eastern Health and Social Services Board.

Mr. Randall: Will the Minister confirm that the Eastern Health and Social Services Board budget has been slashed by the Government to the tune of £4·6 million? Will he tell the House what that will mean in terms of job losses? Is the hon. Gentleman aware that if we get the 600 job losses that have been speculated about in various newspaper reports, that will mean the cancellation of new services, a reduction of beds and longer waiting lists? Would that not be regarded as a serious blow to the people of Northern Ireland?

Mr. Patten: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman's question is based on something that is not true. The budget of the Eastern Health and Social Services Board will be going up next year, on the figures for this year. Therefore, I am afraid that what the hon. Gentleman referred to cannot qualify as a cut.

Youth Training

11. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many youngsters leaving the youth training programme go on to full-time employment.

Dr. Boyson: Since the youth training programme began in 1982, 9,552—53·3 per cent.—of the young people who have left the programme went directly into employment and 393—2 per cent.—returned to full-time education. The figures for the last six months were 2,768—55·8 per cent. and 164—3 per cent. Information is collected only with regard to trainees' immediate destinations on leaving the programme, so those who experienced any delay in entering full-time employment are not included in the employment figures.

Mr. Nellist: Is that answer not a warning to young school leavers in Northern Ireland that the Government's youth training programme there has about the same success rate as the programme in the rest of Britain and offers no real future for young people? Why does the Minister not propose a real training programme, on trade union rates of pay, with an allowance of at least £55, and a guarantee of a job at the end? Does the Minister accept that the fall by a third in manufacturing employment under the present Government in the past six years, to a level that is half the real rate of unemployment in Northern Ireland, shows that the Government do not care for the youth of Northern Ireland and cannot offer them a future?

Dr. Boyson: Over 16,000 young people and adults are in training in Northern Ireland, out of a population of 1·5 million. That shows how concerned the Government are about the matter. Three out of five of those who join the youth training programme either obtain employment immediately afterwards or embark on higher education. That shows that the programme is a great advantage to those who take part in it.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Thurnham asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 April.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend is travelling to south-east Asia for an official visit.

Mr. Thurnham: Tomorrow is the end of the tax year. Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that there will be no special Easter eggs for any over-zealous tax inspectors who take too many second looks at the books of small business men?

Mr. Biffen: I can happily give that assurance. There is no question of tax inspectors being offered bonuses for increasing tax revenue from small businesses.

Mr. Hattersley: The Leader of the House will know that yesterday, after they had fixed their rates, many shire counties discovered that the rate support grant was again to be cut from the level of which they had previously been notified. What advice are the Government giving those counties about how they should accommodate the new cuts?

Mr. Biffen: It has always been made clear, and local authorities have always understood, that the initial RSG figure given to them by the Department is an estimate and is subject to change in the light of council spending plans.

Mr. Hattersley: I hope that that carefully prepared answer will be gleefully accepted in the shire counties which are to be penalised. Apart from that answer, which the right hon. Gentleman read with such precision, can he comment on the absurdity of rate legislation which, simply because the GLC has fixed a rate lower than the statutory maximum, requires cuts in shire county allocation? The figure for Lancashire has fallen by £4·2 million, the figure for Cleveland by £1·3 million and that for Kent by £3·25 million. How will the right hon. Gentleman explain to those counties that their grant is to be cut simply because the GLC has levied a rate lower than that which the Government anticipated?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman describes a set of situations on which I cannot confidently comment—[HON. MEMBERS:"Oh."] I will commit the great solecism in this House of refusing to comment on what I cannot comment on accurately. There is no doubt that the shire counties will contrast their own prudent financial management with what is happening in many other areas of the country, including that covered by the GLC.

Mr. Hattersley: The right hon. Gentleman fails to grasp the essential point. What he describes as prudent financial management in the shire counties has resulted in the shire counties receiving further cuts in RSG.

Mr. Biffen: I have indicated to the right hon. Gentleman that I will not follow him down that path because I am not certain of my ground.

Mr. Greenway: Is my right hon. Friend aware that I understand that to save overtime, no searcher dogs were used in the VIP departure lounge at Heathrow today before the departure of the Prime Minister to the far east? Will he look into this, bearing in mind the fact that the country is concerned about the Prime Minister's security above all things and would not mind paying for the overtime required?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend is right to underline the great national concern that our leaders and the Prime Minister should always have the utmost security in their movements when undertaking national duties, but I have no doubt that the necessary standards have been fulfilled.

Mr. Steel: Although the Lord Privy Seal is right not to comment with confidence, or even without confidence, on the detailed figures of the cuts imposed on local authorities, how does he expect local government officials or elected members to cope with the constantly changing barriers against which the Government place them?

Mr. Biffen: The right hon. Gentleman must know that the rate support grant figures are always issued on a provisional basis. On this occasion they have been revised, and revisions must be expected.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: Will my right hon. Friend take time during the recess to consult his right hon. Friends on what new initiatives the Government might take to patch up our quarrel with Argentina, bearing in mind that the conflict started nearly three and a half years ago? Does he agree that, while it is all too easy for both countries to blame each other, there would be considerable long-term benefits for Britain and the Falkland Islands in having proper diplomatic and commercial links with Argentina and its new democratic Government? Would that not be in the interests of the long-term future of the region?

Mr. Biffen: I accept that it must be in our ultimate interests to restore satisfactory relationships with Argentina, but that will be the consequence of a detailed and closely argued process of negotiation. We are at the beginning of that now, and we shall have to fight our corner.

Q2. Mr. Canavan asked the Prime Minister what are her official engagements for 4 April.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave a few moments ago.

Mr. Canavan: Is it just coincidence that almost every time I hit the jackpot at Prime Minister's Question Time she does a bunk to the far east or somewhere else? In the Prime Minister's absence, will the Leader of the House ensure that approporiate Government action is taken to compensate Scottish football fans after the Government's intervention to switch the venue of the Scotland-England football international from Wembley to Hampden? Will they compensate the Scottish football fans, including some of my constituents, who have spent hundreds of pounds in non-refundable deposits for hotel bookings in London, only to discover that the great dictatorial referee in Downing street has blown the whistle and moved the goal posts from London to Glasgow?

Mr. Biffen: I have a lively sympathy with the hon. Gentleman with regard to his discovery that I am here to answer his questions rather than the Prime Minister. I no more wish to answer his question than he wishes to ask it of me, but we are chained together by circumstance. As I am sure he will realise, my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for sport asked the Football Association to reconsider the date of the international. The change in the venue was a judgment of the Football Association and the Scottish Football Association. But I have left the worse news until last. Although there is much sympathy, there is no question of the Government accepting any liability such as the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Q3. Mr. Hirst asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 April.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hirst: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, at its conference in Inverness last weekend, the Liberal party voted to remove all United States bases from Britain? Does he agree that this is yet another example of a glaring inconsistency in the policy of the alliance on a critical issue? Apart from offering sympathy to the Social Democratic party for its curious bedfellows, will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to reaffirm the Government's support for the other Alliance—NATO—which is the ultimate guarantor of the peace and security of British people?

Mr. Biffen: I am happy to affirm the Government's commitment to the NATO Alliance and to say that all parties which affirm their support for NATO cannot have it both ways. They cannot want the Alliance and its nuclear implications, but deny that Alliance the nuclear bases.

Mr. MacKenzie: Will the Leader of the House answer more sympathetically the question put to him by my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan)? If the Government so arrange sporting fixtures that it will cost sporting fans a great deal of money, and if they take the responsibility for changing the dates, they must take some responsibility for compensating those people for the many hundreds of pounds that they have lost. We will not have this. The Government must take either one line or the other.

Mr. Biffen: The right hon. Gentleman is advancing a most contentious proposition: that the Government should undertake financial responsibilities and liabilities in this instance. This would be a major policy departure. It is simply not on.

Q4. Mr. Pawsey asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 April.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Pawsey: Is my right hon. Friend aware that there are many Conservative Members who, since 1979, have been urging rate reform? Is he further aware that we very much welcome the initiative of our right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in this matter? However, can he say when a fairer system that will better reflect people's ability to pay will come before the House? Indeed, will it come during the lifetime of this Parliament?

Mr. Biffen: That would be a fairly fundamental reply to let slip out on a Thursday morning before we depart for Easter. I accept at once the good wishes that my hon. Friend conveys, but this is a very tangled problem and the sooner it can be dispatched the better. However, it would be just as well if we got the answer right rather than produced it quickly.

Q7. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 April.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Mackay: Will my right hon. Friend find some time today further to consider the newspaper report in last Sunday's Observer about substantial ballot-rigging in the Transport and General Workers Union, which apparently led to the election of Mr. Ron Todd as the general secretary? Will he reflect upon the fact that our trade union legislation which passed through the House last year, is very important in the light of this ballot-rigging, and will he further reflect that no Labour party spokesman has condemned this action, taken by one of its major paymasters?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has very generously asked me to do not much more than reflect, and I am very happy to reflect on all the various aspects of the issue that he mentioned. I join him in saying that I believe it underlines the considerable importance that we might attach to the postal ballot provisions in our recent trade union legislation.

Ms. Harman: Why have the Government, against the advice of their own quango, Playboard, made massive cuts in urban programme funding for holiday play schemes? Does the right hon. Gentleman not realise that without safe, constructive play, school holidays for many children will spell boredom and that for many parents, particularly working parents, they involve the worry that, instead of playing safely, their children might end up either in hospital or the juvenile court? Will he reinstate these important funds?

Mr. Biffen: I have no authority to reinstate these programmes, but I shall of course draw the attention of the relevant Secretary of State to the point made by the hon. Lady. However, I suspect that these and all other public spending provisions have to be carefully assessed against need and value for money.

Q9. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 April.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Did the First Lord of the Treasury, for whom my right hon. Friend is replying, know of—I cannot believe that she can have approved of—the discontinuance of the £10 paid every year since the reign of Henry VII by the Exchequer to a certain university—not mine? Should not a Tory Government cherish harmless anomalies and pleasant traditions?

Mr. Biffen: I must admit that that is not even a technical knock-out. I have been floored in round one. I have not the faintest idea of what it is to which my hon.

Friend refers. I know that it is of national significance, otherwise the words would not be on his lips. I shall see that my right hon. Friend is informed of it the moment that she returns from the far east.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the right hon. Gentleman care to tell the House how many right hon. or hon. Members have had their phones tapped since the Prime Minister was elected in 1979?

Mr. Biffen: I did not hear the question.

Mr. Banks: Clearly there would be little point in tapping the right hon. Gentleman's telephone. I asked him whether he could tell us how many hon. Members have had their telephones tapped since 1979.

Mr. Biffen: As I understand it, undertakings have been given in the House by previous Prime Ministers, and have since been reinforced, that no hon. Members have had their telephones tapped.

Mr. Flannery: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will have noticed that my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) and I have been here throughout Question Time, including Northern Ireland Question Time, but we did not reach the highly topical question on political discussions on Northern Ireland. A considerable number of hon. Members who had not tabled any questions were called more than once. We waited and stayed behind precisely for those highly political questions. They were not reached because hon. Members who had not tabled questions, and others, were called many times.

Mr. Speaker: There is always a difficult balance to strike, but the hon. Gentleman is well aware of the fact that I seek to balance questions between Northern Ireland Members and those from the rest of the United Kingdom. I am sorry that we did not get as far as the hon. Gentleman's question. If he had risen on question No. 6 he would probably have got in, but he did not do so. His question was No. 17.

Business of the House

10.32 am

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): Will the Leader of the House state the business for the week after the recess?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for the first week after the Adjournment will be as follows:

MONDAY 15 APRIL—Second Reading of the Surrogacy Arrangements Bill.

Remaining stages of the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill.

Proceedings on the Reserve Forces (Safeguard of Employment) Bill [Lords], which is a consolidation measure.

TUESDAY 16 APRIL — Second Reading of the Prosecution of Offences Bill [Lords].

Motions on the Police (Anonymous, Repetitious etc Complaints) Regulations, the Police (Complaints) (Mandatory Referrals etc) Regulations, and on the Police (Complaints) (Informal Resolution) Regulations.

WEDNESDAY 17 APRIL — Conclusion of remaining stages of the Interception of Communications Bill.

Motion relating to the Wireless and Telegraphy (Broadcast Licence Charges and Exemption) (Amendment) Regulations.

THURSDAY 18 APRIL—Remaining stages of the Social Security Bill.

FRIDAY 19 APRIL—Private Members' Bills.

MONDAY 22 APRIL — Opposition day (10th allotted day).

Mr. Hattersley: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman three specific questions? First, he knows very well that there is increasing concern on both sides of the House about the mounting tragedy in South Africa. Are we soon to have a debate on that subject?

Secondly, the right hon. Gentleman knows that last night the Prime Minister announced, through a written answer, additional powers that Ministers are taking to influence the career of civil servants whom those Ministers designate as subversives or security risks. Clearly that statement ought to have been made to the House and been subject to questions in the House. May we have a statement on the subject next week?

Thirdly, are we to have a debate on this week's several White Papers on employment? If the Government intend to preserve the pretence that those documents are anything other than Conservative propaganda financed out of the taxes, there has to be a debate so that the implications of the Government's policy can be examined.

Mr. Biffen: With regard to the general foreign affairs situation, which of course will encompass South Africa, it is my hope that we shall very shortly have a debate on that topic.

The powers announced by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister yesterday are derived from a report by the Security Commission in 1981 and the definition of subversion is that recommended by the Security Commission. Of course, we will look at this matter through the usual channels, as requested.

Finally, as will be evident, I have provided no time for an employment debate in the week of our return. Thereafter we will see how we go, but there will be plenty of economic debates related to the Budget and doubtless it could be incorporated in one of them.

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): On Tuesday's business on the Second Reading of the Prosecution of Offences Bill, will my right hon. Friend pass on to the Home Secretary the hope that he will make it clear during his speech that the Government do not intend to reinstate the clause defeated in the House of Lords about the right of the prosecution to appeal to the Court of Appeal in sentence matters?

Mr. Biffen: This is a contentious issue, but of course I will pass on to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary the point that my right hon. and learned Friend made.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): Has the Leader of the House seen early-day motion 558, which draws attention to the unacceptable and improper cash offer made by Political Research and Communication International Limited on behalf of Lead Manufacturers Limited to pay the travelling expenses to Sweden of the Select Committee on the Environment?

[That this House strongly deprecates the action of Political Research and Communication International Limited in offering to bear the travelling expenses of the Environment Committee so that the Committee can examine an advanced system for disposing of radioactive waste in Sweden; and considers that this offer by a financially interested party is, or may be seen as, an attempt improperly to influence and subvert the Committee.]

This is an important matter involving a commercially motivated attempt to influence the work of a Select Committee and the activities of a PR firm of which an hon. Member of the House is chairman. Will the Leader of the House, bearing in mind his special responsibilities to the House as a whole, arrange for an early debate or statement so that the issues raised can be fully explored and rules of conduct properly established for the future?

Mr. Biffen: The right hon. Gentleman raises an evidently serious point. I am sure that the whole House would agree that it would be improper for any Select Committee conducting an independent inquiry on behalf of the House to accept funding from an interested private party. Any further action arising on this matter would be for the Liaison Committee to consider in the first instance. Perhaps we may see how matters proceed from there.

Mr. Gerrard Neale (Cornwall, North): In view of the fact that interminable delays are suffered in public inquiries, and, in particular, in view of the extraordinary and lamentable decision by a Committee of both Houses yesterday to overrule the decision of a public inquiry on the Okehampton bypass, will my hon. Friend consider providing time for a debate in the near future to enable the House to consider how the public inquiry system can be reviewed so as to give all parties a full and fair chance of presenting their case but at the same time enable an early end date to such inquiries which also include the granting of planning consent to be set?

Mr. Biffen: The Government will now study the Joint Committee's report and consider what can best be done. In the meantime. I will bear in mind what my hon. Friend has just said.

Mr Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): Does the Leader of the House recall that after the last general election many hon. Members on both sides of the House were concerned about the methods and procedures of the Boundary Commission, exemplified in a small way — but it emphasised the daftness of it—by the silly names that were given to some constituencies? I have raised the matter on a number of occasions and quite properly, my suggestion that there should be an inquiry was guided to the Home Secretary. It was put to me that it might be a good subject for a Select Committee of the House. However that may be, it is now two years since the general election; the boundary setting was done badly; the procedures were often much too short. Can something be done about it? Nothing much needs to be done for about 10 years, but something ought to be done because there is concern.

Mr. Biffen: I have every sympathy with that observation. The time honoured and civic traditions of Oswestry are now extinct and have been replaced by a mere geographic abstraction called Shropshire, North. Many right hon. and hon. Members must feel exactly the same way. If I had the constituency title that the right hon. Gentleman has, I would bear it very heavily. However, I shall look into the matter and see what further progress can be made.

Mr. Ian Lloyd (Havant): My right hon. Friend will be aware that it is nearly four months, if not more, since the Computer Sub-Committee undertook a wide-ranging survey of the information technology needs of Parliament and, with the unanimous support of the House of Commons (Services) Committee, presented a report containing specific recommendations about what should be done. Is anything to be done, or will the report simply lurk in a pigeon hole for ever?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly be in touch with my hon. Friend, and I hope that I can give him some assistance.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): How long does the right hon. Gentleman expect Wednesday's motion on the broadcast licence fee to last? Would not a one and a half hour debate on such an important subject be inappropriate? I understand that under the Social Security Bll, which will be disussed on Thursday, the Government propose to introduce some of the national insurance contribution changes presaged in the Budget. If that is so, will the right hon. Gentleman guarantee that those amendments will be tabled by the Government on Monday 15 April?

Mr. Biffen: With regard to the hon. Gentleman's second point, I take at once the force of what he says and shall see what can be done. He asked about Wednesday's business, but it is not in my gift to say when one item of business will conclude and the next begin. However, such decisions on licence fees have previously been resolved in 90 minutes.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the business that he has announced for the week after the Easter break — short as it is — is relatively light and not terribly important? I hope to be in my place then, but that will not be true of all hon. Members after the Easter break. Will my right hon. Friend consider sending our right hon. Friend the Prime Minister a message, supported by the whole Cabinet, suggesting that she might like to take a few days off on her return from the far east, and perhaps go to the Mediterranean, to some nice quiet spot beside a golf course?

Mr. Biffen: I am not sure what would happen to me if I conveyed the second part of that message. But I have a message for my hon. Friend, and that is, that for my hon. Friend to describe the surrogacy legislation, the Second Reading of the Prosecution of Offences Bill and the Interception of Communications Bill as falling into a somewhat second league category shows that he has fallen slightly below his normally acute vision.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): Did the Leader of the House pluck up the courage to have a word with the Prime Minister before she left about the need for a debate, or at least a statement, on star wars? She went to the United States and recklessly pledged our support for that, although research costing $26 billion is involved. When the Prime Minister returns from her tour of the far east, she will no doubt make a statement boasting about what she has achieved there, and highlighting the opening of a dam that was built with money given by the Labour Government. It cost just over £100 million. That will merit a statement from the Dispatch Box, but $26 billion which could have been gone on much-needed aid for the far east will be spent without even any mention of it being made in the House.

Mr. Biffen: Governments come and go, but taxpayers are the constant factor. They supply the public funds, whether that money is spent, overseas or at home. However, I shall of course draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Gentleman's point.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): My right hon. Friend will be aware that since before Christmas right hon. and hon. Members have been subjected to organised lobbying campaigns in relation to badger baiting, the possible extension of VAT, the taxation of pensions, the limited list, tuition fees and so on. Most of that lobbying has been carried out courtesy of a word processor. Members of Parliament have received threatening letters from, for example, the Roche drug company. Has not the time come for a debate to be held on the nature of the lobbying of Members of Parliament and the manner in which it is carried out, as well as on how we should respond to such organised campaigns?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend raises a point of widespread interest to the House. We have to learn to live with this, but I am not sure that we would make living with it that much easier if we shared our collective agonies with each other in a debate.

Mr. Alf Dubs (Battersea): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that his approach tends to be that when requests are made to him either too meekly or too aggressively he resists them? Therefore, will he take note of the fact that I am trying to steer a middle course in asking him yet again what the chances are of having a debate on the Commission for Racial Equality report on immigration control procedures?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman is being terribly moderate. I did not think that he was a great devotee of the middle of the road. Doubtless he, like me, holds to heart Aneurin Bevan's strictures on the subject. There is no likelihood of an early debate on the topic, but I shall continue to bear in mind the hon. Gentleman's claims.

Mr. J. F. Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): Is my right hon. Friend aware that since the security arrangements for admission into the House have been tightened there have been outside long queues of parties coming into the House? I am particularly concerned about the effect that this has on children, the elderly and the disabled in bad weather. Could he find time for an early debate on this matter to discuss other ways of admitting visitors to the House?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend raises a matter that gives concern to a considerable number of hon. Members, and causes inconvenience for a number of constituents. However, I suggest that, in the first instance, my hon. Friend elaborates his complaints so that they can be considered by the Services Committee.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Following the Government's panic actions to keep blameless Scottish football supporters away from London, may we expect urgent steps to protect the population from young Conservative hooligans?

Mr. Biffen: There must be some sharp rejoinder that buries that subject once and for all, but I regret to say that I cannot think of it.

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): Over the Easter recess, will my right hon. Friend look at the way in which the work of Select Committees is being persistently held up by the dog-in-the-manger attitude of the alliance in not allowing the replacement of members on Select Committees?

Mr. Biffen: I take note of what my hon. Friend says. I know that it causes deep concern among the Chairmen of the Select Committees.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): In arranging the parliamentary business, has the Leader of the House been discussing with the Prime Minister the appointment of peers announced in the newspapers today? In view of the immense talent on the Government Benches, why have no Conservative Members been elevated to the other House? Does not the fear of consequent by-elections and the Government's knowledge that they will be defeated at such by-elections mean that they are not willing to risk them?

Mr. Biffen: These are always matters that lie in the eye of the beholder. I looked at the list, and I thought what a fascinating social change it showed, when the Labour Benches in the House of Lords are being stuffed with stockbrokers and merchant bankers.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the concern that I have felt since November that the House is sitting later and later into the night, and in correspondence and questions I have asked my right hon. Friend whether he will consider looking at Standing Order No. 2 and bringing in morning sittings. On Tuesday 16 April, there is the Prosecution of Offences Bill and other Bills, which will certainly go on late into the night as usual. Therefore, will my right hon. Friend look favourably at the possibility of morning sittings, at least experimentally?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend is already a noted Member after but a few months' service. However, I have been here long enough to remember morning sittings, and, although they were hilarious for the small number of hon. Members who took part in the proceedings, hardly anybody turned up, hardly any business of substance was transacted, and the whole thing crumbled into farce.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there is great anxiety in Scotland about the delay of the announcement of the result of the unnecessary review of Scottish lowland airport policy? I am told, in a little letter from the Secretary of State for Transport today, that, like many other important Scottish announcements, this is to be made by means of a written answer so that we shall not be able to question him. I do not want to delay the announcement any further, but should not the Leader of the House arrange for the Secretary of State for Transport to make an oral statement to the House today so that we can question him?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly pass that request to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend arrange for the Minister responsible for sport to come to the House immediately after the recess to make a statement about sporting fixtures? Will he ask the Minister to include in that statement the challenge by six British girl jockeys of six American girl jockeys to a race at York on 14 June? Will he be backing the British fillies all the way?

Mr. Biffen: That question would be more appropriately directed to the Minister responsible for sport. I shall explain to him the virtues of going to see my hon. Friend after the recess.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Will the Leader of the House tear himself away from the subject of jockeys and turn his attention to the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority at Risley and the sacking by Exclusive Cleaners of the cleaning staff who refused to accept a wage cut?

Will the right hon. Gentleman examine in particular the security aspect, because the trade unions claim that normal security procedures are being weakened to allow temporary staff in? Will he explain to the Secretary of State for the Environment that the company has cleaning contracts for the Houses of Parliament? Despite the firm being a massive contributor to the Conservative party, will he consider removing the contract from the firm?

Mr. Biffen: I shall try to moderate my reply, despite the sententious terms of the question. I shall draw attention to what has been said. The hon. Gentleman might seek to raise the matter on the Adjournment since it seems that its wider ventilation would be of advantage.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): When the Prime Minister returns in a fortnight's time from the far east, will the Leader of the House ensure that her statement describes in particular her visit to Sri Lanka a week today? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that for a large minority of the population there the visit will be seen as condoning President Jayawardene's policy of virtual extermination of the Tamil-speaking peoples of the north-eastern provinces, his ban on opposition public meetings and his recent lengthy detention of opposition and trade union leaders? Will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that the Prime Minister's statement deals with those matters?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman has formally identified himself with the Tamil cause in Sri Lanka. I shall draw the Prime Minister's attention to his comments.

Sir John Wells (Maidstone): Can my right hon. Friend offer an early debate on alternative medicine which was debated in the other place recently? Is he aware of the great national interest in the subject, and has he heard about the recently formed council? Does he agree that views from all parts of the House on this important topic should be voiced?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly bear in mind my hon. Friend's pertinent point, but we are moving to a time of the year when time is tight, particularly in view of the Finance Bill. However, I shall consider my hon. Friend's request.

PETITION

Transport Services

10.54 am

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I beg to ask leave to present a petition from the Walsall metropolitan borough council which is strongly opposed to the Transport Bill. The petition states that the proposals in the Bill would cause tremendous damage to existing passenger transport provision, and that is certainly so in the West Midlands.

The petition concludes:

> Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House reject any legislation to implement the proposals of the White Paper on buses and the Transport Bill and commit itself instead to the further development of an integrated local rail and bus network under direct control of locally elected representatives.

I totally agree with the sentiments expressed in the petition. It gives me much pleasure to present it to the House.

To lie upon the Table.

Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers (Newark)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Donald Thompson.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Since the start of the debate has been somewhat delayed, I suggest that the hon. Member for Newark (Mr. Alexander) and the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) split the time left for their two debates, so that the first debate will end just after 11.25 am.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): On 25 June last year I was advised by Lord Trefgarne in a letter that it was proposed to close Newark's static workshops of the royal Electricial and Mechanical Engineers with a loss of 193 posts in Newark. This is part of a much larger review and my comments relate to the Newark closure only.

I very much regret the way in which this has been done. Leaving aside for a moment the lack of consultation with those most intimately involved—the men and women who work there—I find it astonishing that proposals of this nature and magnitude were taken without any statement or debate on the Floor of the House. Until this moment, I have been unable to make any meaningful representations to a Minister in this Chamber. I was able to make a protest to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House when requesting a debate on this subject during Business Questions.

My astonishment and regret have been shared by the workers at the workshops who find it incredible that their Member of Parliament could not raise a matter of such fundamental importance — namely, a decision by a Government Department to close their workshop — unless he was fortunate in the ballot for an Adjournment debate, which I have been. Such a debate has been refused many times before today.

This regret has been compounded by the tactics of my political opponents in my constituency who have milked the matter for all it is worth. The Labour party on the Newark district council proposed a motion of no confidence in me because I had not been able to raise the matter here. I received an unpleasant letter from the district secretary of the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers who, after a meeting of his members, wrote:

> "I was instructed to write a letter to yourself voicing their criticism and disgust at your total lack of practical help where it matters—in the Commons."

That sort of offensive stuff and party political capital being made out of a difficult position may be par for the course for the individuals concerned, but it is unfair that I should have been put in the position where this is publicly stated.

Before the proposals were announced on 25 June, I understand that there had been no prior consultation with the work force. They had been given no opportunity to explain to those conducting the review the importance of their work, the skills they exercise and the hardship that the closure would bring to them and their families. Yet the REME workshops are the fourth largest employer of labour in the town of Newark.

Newark's unemployment is high—at the last count 14·7 per cent. in the Newark travel-to-work area. Of that, 16·8 per cent. is male unemployment. Therefore, the proposal, if implemented, will be disastrous for those involved. There was clearly no thought of the effect on the unemployment situation when the proposals were formulated, and I regret that very much. The decision was an enormous shock to all concerned. The proposal is that the work force can get work at the Old Dalby workshops, which are in a different county and easily an hour's drive away, each way, when the weather and the road conditions are good. That is not practical for most people, and in bad weather it will mean three hours added to a person's working day. It will prohibit most women with families from even contemplating the move.

The people involved are not clerks or semi-skilled manual workers; the work done is the repair of Clansman radios. The workshop has been certified to the same standards as are applied to civilian contractors who manufacture or repair equipment for the services. I understand that it is the only unit in the country to be so certified.

The work force must be specially trained, and the training takes up to four years. Emergencies often occur. The vastly increased travel to work requirement would mean that it would not be possible for those travelling those distances to carry out emergency work or to do short notice priority work. The local technical college is geared to meet this specialist training requirement. That would be lost if the proposals were put into practice.

Nor would it be wise to have all this work done at one location and at one workshop. If there were a fire or other disaster at the Old Dalby works, no other place would have the expertise and equipment to do the necessary emergency work. In any event, why should the work be transferred from an area of high unemployment such as Newark to a prosperous area such as Old Dalby in Leicestershire?

If there had to be rationalisation, it would have been more equitable to bring the work to an area of high unemployment rather than to take it away. It has all been so unfair. Newark may have a high unemployment rate, but it can offer excellent transport access, which Old Dalby cannot. We are in a prime communications position, virtually on the A1 and on the east coast main rail line. REME makes sense at Newark. It does not make sense to move it away.

We shall be told that money will be saved. In relation to some of the other closures, that may be the case, but I have seen no figures to show that closing Newark will save money. There are 193 people involved and redundancy and unemployment benefit will follow if the closure takes place. Even if some jobs are taken up at Old Dalby, there will be relocation costs.

If there will be savings—I dispute that there will be—we should be told precisely what they are and how they are made up before the decision to close is implemented. At present, we do not have that information.

I submit that there are no proper grounds on which the proposal should be implemented. From the point of view of the skills that will be lost if No. 33 central workshop closes and of ease of communications, and from the taxpayers' point of view and, not least, from that of the many loyal workers there, these workshops should not be closed. It will be a crying shame if they are, and I urge the Minister not to allow it to happen.

11.4 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. John Lee): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Newark (Mr. Alexander) on securing this Adjournment debate. I am grateful to him for providing me with this opportunity to explain—more fully perhaps than in earlier answers given in the House—the reasons that have led us to reduce the Army's overall static workshop capacity and, thus, to the closure of No. 33 central workshop at Newark.

Before dealing with the specific issues raised by my hon. Friend, I want the House to be clear about three points of principle which underlie our decision, announced last December, to proceed with the measures that we proposed in June 1984. The first and paramount point of principle is that we have a duty to the taxpayer to see that defence funds are spent only on essential defence needs and are spent in the most cost-effective manner. The review of the REME static workshops in 1982 showed that, overall, we had substantially more capacity than our operational needs could really justify—nearly 20 per cent. more at that time. Recognising that some reduction was thus inevitable, we allowed some slimming of the work force through not replacing many of those who left it in the normal course of events. But this is not an economic answer in the long term, because it merely converts the over-capacity problem into one of under-utilised capital assets.

Plainly, retaining excess capacity is not efficient; but nor is it efficient to retain under-utilised facilites, since that just pushes up the overhead costs of the operation. We really have to reduce overheads, and this means concentrating our programmed base repair activities into fewer, better designed, and better located workshops.

The Army, and the other services too, for that matter, should not be retaining in-house workshop capacity to do work that can be done quite satisfactorily, and less expensively, by industry or the motor trade—provided this involves no operational penalty. We have looked closely at the scope we have for putting out to contract repair work on—for the most part—what we call "commercial equivalent" equipments. Since these tend to be equipments such as Landrovers or hydraulic vehicle jacks, which are more readily replaced off the shelf, it is less vital that they are repaired by the Army. By having these repairs or overhauls performed under competitive contract, we can save money where the private sector is able to give a more cost-effective service because it can spread its overheads across both its military and its commerical work load.

Having started the study of the REME static workshop organisation in 1981, we found it necessary to recast its terms of reference in early 1982, following the report of the Public Accounts Committee "Repair of B Vehicle Assemblies". This widened the scope of the review quite substantially; moreover, the review team's main report was in turn followed by subsidiary studies dealing with separate functional and geographical problems, with the result that the full report was not considered by the Army Board until June 1983.

The submission to Ministers in July 1983 proposed reductions at a number of base and command workshops and the closure of No. 33 central workshop at Newark and No. 38 central workshop at Chilwell. It also envisaged doubling the amount of base repair work put out to contract. The combined effect of these measures would eliminate the 20 per cent. over-capacity in static workshops, redress the imbalance of trades and skills between workshops and allow significant savings in manpower, capital expenditure and running costs.

Ministers asked for further research to validate the proposed enhancements at certain workshops and for examination in greater depth of the potential for increased repair by contract. The final proposals, summarised in the consultative memorandum referred to in my answer of 28 June 1984 to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, South (Viscount Cranborne), involved the same closures, a raising of contract repair to 36 per cent. of the base repair load, and net manpower reductions of 504 posts on the 1 December 1984 strength figures and 1,071 posts on the 1 January 1983 strength figures.

The benefits that we expected from restructuring the static workshops along these lines were not only a tauter and more cost-effective organisation, but one that would still be able to fulfil its operational tasks quickly and competently and residual workshops that would be well sited to perform their respective roles in both the United Kingdom and in Germany. The proposals assumed less backloading of armoured vehicles from BAOR for repair in the United Kingdom, but a compensating increase in the number of B vehicle assemblies to be backloaded for this purpose, since this was more economical and less operationally undesirable.

The Ministry of Defence recognised the far-reaching nature of these proposals, and especially the consequence for a large number of its employees. It therefore made every effort to ensure that ample time was afforded for consultation with the work force and its trade union representatives. Indeed, the initial period for such consultation was twice extended at the trade unions' request. Furthermore, various delegations and representations were received by Ministers and their officials well after the 1 October conclusion of the formal consultation period, and delegations continue to be seen. My noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces visited Newark on 26 November 1984. The decision that we announced on 10 December was therefore taken after full consideration of all the points that had been made to us during the consultation phase.

Let me now turn to the specific points made by my hon. Friend and contained in the petition from Newark town council.

The consequences for Newark of the closure of 33 central workshop REME are fully appreciated by Ministers, not least because they have been underlined very clearly both in various written representations and by the delegation which accompanied my hon. Friend when he visited my noble Friend on 17 October 1984.

I can also assure the House that the economic implications of the rundown of the REME organisation as a whole have been considered most carefully, and that the decision arrived at provides the optimum solution for increasing the effectiveness of repair support for the Army within the resources available to us.

I am very conscious of the disappointment that will be felt by the people of Newark—not to mention the work force itself—as a result of the closure of 33 central workshop. The fact remains that the Army as a whole now finds itself with more base repair capacity than it can justifiably retain. Wherever the ensuing closures or reductions were effected, our employees and the local community would be certain to question it, and to remonstrate with us accordingly. But the Ministry of Defence, having identified excess capacity and the inefficiencies that that would produce, is bound to look for the most cost-effective way to put the problem right for the longer term, even if it involves unpalatable decisions. At least in this instance many of our people will, we hope, feel able to apply for jobs in 35 central workshop at Old Dalby—which I think must mean that this closure will prove to have much less of a profound effect than might otherwise have been the case.

A number of points relate to questions of cost. The costs estimate supplied with the consultative document that I mentioned earlier—an expanded version of which has been passed to the trade unions—has been queried by various parties. It has been observed that there is no figure for redundancy compensation in our estimates. Redundancy costs are excluded from all Government investment appraisals, in conformity with Treasury instructions.

Some doubt has also been expressed about the validity of estimates for the transfer of existing plant from Chilwell and Newark to other workshops. Our estimates were based on the best available information at the time they were made, bearing in mind that detailed on-site studies of, for instance, new workshop layout, were not possible before the conclusion of consultations. Moreover, I think there has been inadequate recognition of the fact that much existing plant is now nearing the end of its economic life. The costs of maintaining and repairing it in the future would mean that its transport to the appropriate new location would not really be a sound investment—and, of course, some new plant for the surviving locations has already been in the pipeline for a considerable time.

Another area questioned is our costing of future repair by contract. It should not be forgotten that REME has quite a lot of experience in this field already—contracting out repair work is not a novel practice. Our estimates for this have aimed to be conservative, since we clearly did not wish to be accused later of having viewed the problem through rose-tinted spectacles. However, we would expect that, as the level of repair work put to contract rises, so will the competition to tender. That in turn should lead to keener pricing. Additionally, firms undertaking this kind of work will see it as being more regular and more plentiful, and therefore deserving of their investment in improving their plant which, in due course, will help to reduce their overheads. It will remain our responsibility, naturally, to ensure that the quality of repair work produced under contract remains fully acceptable to the armed services.

I am sorry if this has been a disappointing reply for my hon. Friend. No one could have done more than he has for Newark's retention, and I am sorry to hear of some of the personal criticisms that he has suffered in this regard. They are wholly unfounded and unwarranted. But it would be wrong of me to suggest in any way that the decision will be changed. I hope that I have been able to explain to the House the reasons for our decision.

Primary Education (Scotland)

11.13 am

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the subject of primary education in rural Scotland. It is a considerable change from the last subject, and those following the debate from the Public Gallery must be wondering what on earth is going on.

I hope that the Minister will take the opportunity to give a clear statement of the Government's policy on village schools throughout Scotland. I say that because there is widespread belief that the Scottish Education Department has abdicated all responsibility for policy and guidance in that field, and that local education authorities have been left to muddle through in the context of Government spending cuts and the general upheaval that is going on in Scottish education at present.

I shall resist the temptation to go into the case for an independent review of teachers' pay and conditions in this debate, except perhaps to say that I have not yet met anyone in my constituency or elsewhere who supports the Secretary of State for Scotland's refusal to settle the dispute by setting up an independent review.

Many of us hoped that the recent fall in pupil numbers in Scotland would be used as an opportunity to raise standards in schools, but instead the Government have chosen to use falling rolls as an excuse to slash funds for education in Scotland. Indeed, I understand that in 1980-81 the Secretary of State for Scotland specifically told the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, during the course of the rate support grant negotiations in that year, that more primary schools should be closed.

When regional and islands councils are compelled to cut their budgets, as they have been by the Government, it is, I suppose, inevitable that they see small peripheral services such as village schools as convenient targets for cuts. That is what has been happening in rural Scotland, and all over Scotland. Between 1980 and 1984, no fewer than 102 primary schools were closed in Scotland, and councils of all political complexions have been considering the closure of village schools.

The independent councillors in the Western Isles and Highland region were at it last year. The Tories in Tayside and Lothian region were taking steps to close rural primary schools. The Labour council in Fife is seeking to close schools. The Liberal chairman of the Borders region education committee has the most ambitious scheme of all, with a hit list of 25 village schools.

I notice that the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) is here. I know that he is concerned about the closures, as well he ought to be, because many of his constituents, including myself, are involved. I hope that we make some headway on the issue during the debate. I put it to the hon. Member, and to his friend, councillor Tom Burnham, a Liberal councillor in the Borders region, and to the Minister, that the whole principle of community-based primary education is now under threat in the Borders region. That could be repeated elsewhere in Scotland. It has been suggested that no fewer than a quarter of the total number of primary schools in the Borders region could be subject to review, and that is a matter of acute concern.

Policies in different areas are varying wildly. Some authorities are seeking to close schools with 50 pupils; others are retaining schools with as few as 10 children in them. I stress that I am a passionate believer in local democracy and local decision making, but since the whole matter is inspired by Government spending cuts, I believe that the Government have a duty at least to express a view on how those cuts should be applied.

There is a place for Government guidance on policies which have national implications, and I put it to the Minister that the Secretary of State for Scotland has a duty to take an interest in village schools, not only in the context of national education policy but in the context of the need for a national rural social policy.

We in the Labour party are currently working on rural policy for the next Government, but for the time being a Conservative Government are in power, and people in rural Scotland are entitled to know the Government's thoughts on the matter. As he approaches the subject, I hope that the Minister will not object to me, as a Catholic, reminding him that John Knox wrote in 1570 that "there should be a school in every parish" in Scotland. So the Minister is attacking principles that run very deep.

I want to illustrate the state of alarm and despondency that has been caused in rural areas in Scotland by the closure threats before I go on to analyse the case for preserving and developing community-based primary education.

In my constituency of East Lothian, four village schools, at Dirleton, East Saltoun, Humbie and Whitekirk, all came under threat of closure last year. Obviously, that threat had a disruptive effect on everybody concerned. Long-term planning and development had to be abandoned in the face of the immediate threat. The children, teachers and parents faced six months of uncertainty while they considered their position and put their case to Lothian regional council. Initially, the two smallest communities thought that they could not possibly resist a decision taken by big brother in Edinburgh, but we got our act together. We demonstrated that the parents and the wider community supported their local primary schools. We proved that those villages could and would sustain adequate pupil numbers to justify at least a single teacher school and, thanks to the steadfast support of the Labour group on Lothian regional council, those schools were saved.

However, that was neither the beginning nor the end of the story. One of those four schools had had to go through the same review procedure one year previously, and there is no guarantee that those schools will not face another closure threat next year. That constant atmosphere of crisis is bad for the education of the children and bad for the confidence of the teachers and parents. The time has come for a clear policy to resolve the issue on a permanent basis.

I have strong personal feelings on the subject. My own five-year-old son recently started his education in the village school at Hutton in Berwickshire, represented by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire. That school was threatened with closure last year and the Borders regional council is now putting us through the mill again. That council's current proposals could mean that my son will be made to move to four different schools in the course of eight years of his primary education. That demonstrates the disruptive effect of uncertainty and closures in rural primary education on my own son. I hope that the House will understand why I feel particularly concerned about what is going on in that region and, indeed, in other regions.

I now refer to the detailed case for community-based primary schools in rural areas. The real case for closures is usually based on financial considerations, although the argument is usually dressed up in educational jargon. However, even the economic case for closures is deceptive. There may be a short-term gain from shutting a village school and selling the building, but at the end of the day the local education authority is still responsible for educating the same number of children. On top of that, it will have to face a permanent commitment to substantial and rising additional transport costs. That has a knock-on effect on educational considerations because extended journeys to school for young children are bound to have an effect on their concentration and ability to make progress in school. One of the proposals currently under consideration in the borders could mean that some primary school pupils in the Lammermuir area in my constituency will face 50-minute journeys every morning and evening on their way to and from primary school. That is when the roads are not blocked by snow, as they frequently are in winter. That illustrates the extreme nature of some of the proposals that are being considered.

The economic case for closures is debatable, but the community case for retaining village schools is overwhelming. It is related to the glaring need for a positive rural social policy, and has to be seen against the background of the disastrous effect of the Government's free market economic policies in rural Scotland. We know what is happening to village shops, village telephone kiosks, bus services and small businesses throughout rural Scotland. The local school is a vital component in any community. It is a focus for community activity. It helps to encourage children to identify with their home neighbourhood. The closure of the school can be a mortal blow to a fragile village community.

Apart from anything else, the lack of a local primary school has been shown to deter young families from staying in a village, which does permanent damage to the social structure and economy of that community. I can think of examples in my constituency of two comparable villages. In one village the school has been closed and it has turned into a sleepy village to which people retire. In the other village, the school has been kept open, and it now supports a mixed and active community.

However, the economic and community considerations are side issues. The real priority must be the quality of education for children. It seems to be fashionable for educational bureaucrats to run down small schools, but that attitude is not shared by teachers or parents of children at village schools in Scotland. There are certain disadvantages when a single teacher has to cope with the full range of primary 1-7 in one school, in what is in effect an extended composite class. However, there are also well substantiated advantages in the environment of a rural village school. The idea that schools with fewer than three teachers were a bad thing originated in the Plowden report of 1967, but the report failed to substantiate that case. Lady Plowden herself put the following question in a letter to The Times in 1978:

"Is it right to take the heart out of a community by taking away the children, Pied Piper like, thus losing the bond which is created within and between families through a common interest in the school, involving parents and even grandparents, which is both socially and educationally desirable?"

No doubt the Minister will have heard of Rural Forum, the umbrella organisation that represents the whole range of Scottish rural organisations, including trade unions, women's institutes, farmers and even landowners. Rural Forum held a conference on rural schools last month in Edinburgh, at which the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire spoke. The clear message from that conference was that the educational benefits of village schools far outweighed the disadvantage. What are those advantages? Small pupil numbers make it possible to adopt a more flexible approach to teaching. Project work is a feature in those schools, and in that sort of extended family environment it has been shown that children develop social skills much more readily, learning to share the attention of the teacher. Older children develop a sense of responsibility towards the younger children. All in all, experience has shown that the system can work well. I have spoken to most of the secondary school heads in my constituency about the matter, and all of them without exception have confirmed that children from the smaller primary schools perform at least as well as those from bigger schools when they go on to the secondary school.

I accept that there is no room for complacency about the quality of education in small schools. I should like to see developments related to the special circumstances of rural schools. There is something to be said for clustering schools and sharing teachers and equipment, as has been done in some other areas. It is obvious that teachers who will have to deal with mixed age classes in a rural environment probably need special training. There is scope for developing parental involvement in those schools. Of course, we should continue to learn from the experience gained elsewhere, whether in England, Wales or further afield in places such as Sweden or Finland where people have been working on the subject.

I stress that I am not saying that every tiny rural school must be retained regardless of all the circumstances. Where a school roll has collapsed irrevocably below 15, it is obviously sensible to review the situation, although I would tend to concentrate on the possibility of attracting more young families into such an area as part of a broader rural development policy rather than taking the negative approach of closing the school and therefore shutting down the community.

There is something awfully final about a school closure. Closed village schools are never reopened, so the crop of closures that is now under consideration in Scotland could have permanent and serious effects on the neighbourhoods concerned. It is worth mentioning that the most recent figures published by the Scottish Office show a rise in projected primary school rolls in Scotland, so we must stop and think before the process goes any further.

Above all, there must be a genuine and credible consultation process directly involving parents and the wider community. People have no confidence in the present consultation procedure. At present the regional or islands council concerned is the combined prosecutor, judge and jury in the consultation process on the future of rural schools. Until 1981 the Secretary of State for Scotland had to sanction the closure of any school, but section 23(6A) of the Education (Scotland) Act 1981 and the associated regulations mean that local authorities can close schools that are within five miles of the alternative school without ministerial approval. That is despite the fact that the journeys for many pupils may be much longer than five miles in places where such amalgamations take place.

That is in marked contrast to the situation in England, where ministerial responsibility is still acknowledged. In a written reply on 17 March 1983 the Prime Minister herself said:

"We recognise the value of rural schools to their communities. This is reflected in the calculations underlying rate support grant to take account of the additional costs of provision in sparsely populated areas, in the advice of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science to local education authorities about falling school rolls, and in his detailed consideration of all closure proposals that fall to him to decide, which takes account in each case of local circumstances, the views of the local community, and the educational needs of the children concerned."—[Official Report, 17 March 1983, Vol. 39 c. 234.].

We have no such guarantees or safeguards in rural Scotland. Indeed, one Scottish village community threatened with the closure of its school is considering an appeal to the European Court of Human Rights. That should not be necessary.

I conclude by appealing to the Minister to acknowledge the case for rural schools in Scotland and to consider establishing a new review procedure that will be seen by all concerned to be fair. I should like to wish the Minister a happy Easter, but I shall refrain from doing so until I have received from him a response that I hope will be positive.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Allan Stewart): First, in case I forget to do so at the end of my speech, I wish the hon. Member for East Lothian a happy Easter, and the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), whose interest in these matters we all acknowledge.

We should place the question of rural schools in the context of the improvements that we have made in general to primary education in Scotland, which apply to rural as well as urban schools. We have embarked upon a primary education development project, stemming from the report "Learning and Teaching in P4 and P7" by the inspectorate That report followed a survey that revealed shortcomings in the primary school curriculum, including, especially, the failure to establish the relevance of skills and knowledge acquired at school to the real world.

In planning the national development programmes and the annual programme of inspection of schools by Her Majesty's inspectors we are always concerned to ensure that schools in different environments and of different sizes are given their proper place. In that way, in practical terms, we ensure that the interests of small rural schools are always covered.

Mr. Home Robertson: The Minister refers to the inspectorate. The inspectorate is not always much help. Dirleton school in my constituency received a glowing report from the inspectors last year but, almost in the same post, it also received a closure threat. I wish that the inspectors could save the schools, but they cannot.

Mr. Stewart: Yes, but the authorities have to take many factors into account when considering the question of school closure.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned resources. The Government's public expenditure plans make generous provision for primary school staffing. There is a flexibility factor of 8 per cent. over the basic staff complements recommended in Scottish Education Department circular 1029. The hon. Gentleman referred to expenditure. Resources are always limited. However, we have increased expenditure per pupil in real terms in each of the past few years. We have also introduced all-graduate entry into primary school teaching. Those measures will have beneficial effects in rural as well as urban areas.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the present teachers' pay dispute. The feature of the dispute that is of special relevance to the debate is the threat by the Educational Institute of Scotland of selective action in primary schools to replace, for a short period at least, targeted action on secondary schools in Conservative-held constituencies. It would be wrong for me to devote too much time to the dispute, but the management, the Scottish Secondary Teachers' Association and the Professional Association of Teachers all recognise that the sensible way forward would be to undertake a review of pay and conditions within the Scottish joint negotiating council. The third union, the National Association of Schoolmasters and Union of Women Teachers, wants to enter the normal annual pay negotiations. Only the EIS is not prepared to take either route. I hope that the planned selective action will not be widespread in rural schools, because of the effects on the schools and the communities to which the hon. Gentleman has referred.

The hon. Gentleman concentrated on the implications for rural communities when small schools close. He referred to the statutory framework which, as he said, is different north of the border. The legislation has been revised by the present Government. I will spell out the reasons for the present legislative framework in Scotland. Before 1981, the consent of the Secretary of State was required for every school closure in Scotland. In some cases there was no opposition to closure. There was a consensus that the school, for one reason or another, had outlived its usefulness or the original need. The hon. Gentleman has told us that it is not the essence of his case that there should never be any school closures in rural areas.

Education authorities had no option but to seek the Secretary of State's permission to close. The procedure was wasteful of resources, and bureaucratic. It was also wrong in principle, for it had the effect of passing to central Government a local matter that would more properly have been left to local discretion.

I found some of the hon. Gentleman's comments surprising. My impression was that the Labour party favoured the decentralising of decisions to local authorities. I believe that it was right that the Education (Scotland) Act 1981 transferred the responsiblity for closure to the education authority. However, it is quite wrong to suggest that local authorities were left—I believe that this was the hon. Gentleman's phrase—to their own devices. The Government recognised that some types of school would entail special circumstances. Safeguards were therefore introduced, especially in respect of proposing to close schools in more remote areas. The regulations made in 1981 require that the Secretary of State's consent be obtained before the implementation of any primary school closure proposal that would result in pupils having to transfer to another school five or more miles away. In the case of secondary schools, the distance is 10 miles. It was envisaged at that time that a significant proportion of closure proposals affecting rural schools would continue to require the formal consent of the Secretary of State. The 1981 Act did much more than that. One of its main features was the parents' charter, the objective of which was to give parents more say in deciding which schools their children should attend.

The education authorities are now required, before reaching a decision on any school closure proposal, to consult many people including the parents of all children in attendance at the school and of all children who, while not yet of school age, could be expected to attend the school concerned within two years of the date of the closure proposal. Those consultations are an important part of the process. They are taken seriously by all concerned, as witnessed by the hon. Gentleman, who gave examples of two cases where local communities succeeded in persuading their education authorities to abandon proposals to close rural schools.

Mr. Home Robertson: I am grateful to the Minister for attempting to cover this point, but I hope that he accepts that it is deeply unsatisfactory that the future of something as important to a village community as its school should be left entirely in the hands of the authority which has a pecuniary interest in closing it. Indeed, the interest has been imposed on it by the Secretary of State. Is there not a case for an independent inquiry procedure to be set up? I understand why the Minister may not wish to take back the responsibility for reviewing such matters, but there must be a case for setting up an independent inquiry system in areas where there are closure threats.

Mr. Stewart: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's anxiety, but I believe that the decision must be made by the local authority. It must take account of all the factors involved, and it is responsible to the electorate of the area. However, as I emphasised, it is not an unfettered choice, because if the closure will involve transfer to schools more than five miles away, the decision must be made by Ministers.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I am grateful to the Minister for giving way and to the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), whose interest in the matter is well known, for introducing the debate. Could I press the Minister on the importance of the framework in which the consultations take place. I accept that the decision should be devolved and that the regional authorities must make the ultimate decision in each case. No one has argued against that; if we did, we should be charged with being anti-devolution, whereas most Opposition Members are in favour of it. In many of their structure plans, the regional authorities lay heavy emphasis on the fact that rural areas should be supported in a very conceivable sense, yet some of their policies, especially the primary school closure programme, go against that.

Have the Government any interest or are they taking any part in the promulgation of the ideas contained in the Armitage Norton report, which was the genesis of the present round of closures started by my local authority in the Borders region? Is it the Government's intention to encourage other regional authorities to adopt the cost-benefit analysis contained in that report? If it is, the Minister will have to answer many such debates in the future.

The Government have a duty to set out the framework in which they believe consultation should take place. They need not bring forward a statutory instrument; they could simply give guidance to local authorities, especially about consultation with community councils and with the public in general, as well as the statutory duties that are imposed on them by the 1981 Act, which, at the end of the day, amount to nothing more than writing to parents and saying what they propose to do.

Mr. Stewart: Of course, we have issued circulars to local education authorities setting out their duties and responsibilities under the Act, and no doubt local authorities will take into account the factors mentioned by the hon. Gentleman. But, ultimately, within the framework set out in the Act, this should be a matter of local discretion.

A delicate and difficult balance must be struck in relation to the use of resources. An education authority has a responsibility to the entire area that it serves, and money saved in one part of the service could be used to improve the service elsewhere. As the hon. Member for East Lothian fairly acknowledged, a balance must also be struck on the purely educational merits. On the one hand, the pupil moving from a small village school to a larger school benefits from the wider educational opportunities that become available and the social benefits likely to accrue from contact with larger peer groups. On the other hand, I do not deny the hon. Gentleman's point that a small school can have an educational richness all its own. Increased travelling time makes the child's day longer and thereby detracts from the educational advantages of attendance at a larger school.

Mr. Home Robertson: Has the Minister said that to local authorities?

Mr. Stewart: Certainly, and I assure the House that where a case is referred to my right hon. Friend for decision, the factors of educational advantage and travelling distance, including travel arrangements, and the length of the school day are carefully examined.

The position is different north and south of the border, but the different responsibilities of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science do not mean that there are no rural school closures in England and Wales. The hon. Gentleman may be interested to know that since the new Scottish arrangements were introduced in 1981, 18 schools have closed in Scotland and 390 have closed in England. The hon. Gentleman should not place too much emphasis on the different statutory provisions north and south of the border.

The hon. Gentleman referred to Hutton primary school, which his children attend and which is in the constituency of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire. He will know the position on the consultations about that closure.

I must emphasise that we always have the interests of rural communities very much in mind. We are undertaking a research project on the parental choice provisions of the Education (Scotland) Act 1981, which will include an examination of parental choice in six areas of Scotland, including a rural district, and I await with interest the result of that part of the project, which is expected within the next few months.

We all appreciate the difficulties faced by education authorities and communities about school closures. The hon. Gentleman recognised that school rolls have been falling, and he referred to the uncertainty for the future. Beyond the immediate period, there is much uncertainty about the trends in school rolls. If education authorities are properly to fulfil their accountability to the public, they must take whatever steps they consider necessary to rationalise the provision of school education. Therefore, school closures, which occur in urban as well as in rural areas, should be considered as part of a larger canvas and should not be seen as a discriminating or random measure.

We are committed to the principle of reducing direction from the centre, but we have acknowledged that, on some occasions, local discretion cannot be completely unfettered. The present legislative framework in Scotland provides the correct balance between the rights of the local authority responsible to local people to take decisions and to take account of wider considerations, which is why, under certain conditions, school closure proposals still come to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for consideration. When the closure proposals come to my right hon. Friend we shall be conscious of the basic theme of the hon. Member's speech: the special and important role that small rural schools play in the fabric of rural life.

National Institute for Research in Dairying, Shinfield

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Dr. Gerard Vaughan.

11.50 am

Sir Gerard Vaughan (Reading, East): I am grateful for this opportunity to draw attention to the unsatisfactory redundancy and re-employment terms offered to staff employed at the National Institute for Research in Dairying at Shinfield, Reading, in my constituency. The institute was closed last week. I am grateful for the support given by Lord Sherfield, chancellor of Reading university, who has put down questions in another place, and by my hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Sir W. van Straubenzee). With your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and the consent of the Minister, my hon. Friend will join in this debate.

It seems that there may have been a serious misunderstanding about the nature of the employment of the staff of NIRD. The NIRD is administered by a delegacy of Reading university under their ordinance No. 24 and also under the terms of a trust that was set up in 1963. The effect is that the staff hold contracts with the university. A number of them are listed in the university calendar as university staff, some—this is important—as academic staff. It is quite clear that they are employed by the university, but the university does not manage the finances of NIRD. They are provided by the Agricultural and Food Research Council, which also set out the conditions of service. This seems to me to be a very complicated and, I should have thought, unsatisfactory arrangement, but it has worked very well over the years until now.

In 1974, the delegacy decided that all new staff should retire at the age of 60, not, as previously, at 65, but the existing staff—this is also important—were given an option to continue under their contracts until the age of 65. In the delegacy minutes of February 1974 it is noted "that the existing male staff will prefer to retain their present contractual age of 65."

This was accepted by the AFRC.

In 1975, a further change was offered: to lower the pension age from 65 to 60. Again, this was an important option for the staff and no change was made to their contracts; it was a pension change. In April 1984 they were told, somewhat unexpectedly, that the NIRD at Reading would be closed in March of this year and that in its place there would be the Animals and Grassland Research Institute, mainly at Hurley and at Arborfield, and a completely new Food Research Institute Reading at Shinfield. But—and this is the unsatisfactory aspect to which I wish to draw the Minister's attention—staff under 60 were to be offered new posts on clearly less good terms, since they would be compelled to retire at the age of 60. Staff over 60 were to be made redundant without compensation.

In the intervening period since 1974 a number of the staff have refused other jobs, while some have not made pension arrangements which would have been beneficial to them had they known that they would be faced with this situation. There is also the aspect that quite large earnings will be lost because of the loss of five years of expected work. In one man's case—he is at the upper end—it will be in the region of £97,530, as well as the loss of part of the pension which he would have expected to receive.

This is clearly a matter of great concern to the approximately 160 staff who are involved. These people are employed by the university. The 1963 trust lays down that the institute can be closed down only by a decision of the council of the university, not by the delegacy, nor by the AFRC. This was not done. So far as I can ascertain, no decision was made by the council to this effect. There was merely a decision by the delegacy. Furthermore, under the trust two years' written notice has to be given to the AFRC.

Since these people were employed by the university, many of them had expected that if their employment was to be terminated it would be terminated under the procedures of the university. These are clearly set out in the university statute 32(4), in the university ordinance 24(3)(I) and in ordinance 32. This has not happened. Many of these staff are highly skilled and have given very long and devoted service to the NIRD.

There is absolutely no doubt that the reputation and standing of the institute not only contributed to agricultural research in this country but is one of the reasons why the staff retained their loyalty and stayed there over the years. They fully expected that their contracts would be honoured or that they would be compensated. They did not expect the Government to direct the AFRC not to pay them compensation.

The Minister, I am sure, recognises the justice of their case. He is a fair-minded and impartial Minister and I ask him to look at this again, Mr. Deputy Speaker, with your agreement and the Minister's consent. I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: At the beginning of the debate I failed to call the hon. Member for Reading, East by his correct title—Sir Gerard Vaughan. I apologise and beg his pardon.

Sir William van Straubenzee (Wokingham): Your courtesy, Mr. Deputy Speaker, is typical of that which you show the House whenever you are in the Chair. I am very grateful to you and to my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Sir G. Vaughan) for making it possible for me to intervene for a few moments to support the campaign which he has correctly led, because the institute of which we speak is in his constituency. He has led that campaign in defence of his constituents' rights with the pertinacity which we all associate with him. I, too, have a number of constituents who are involved. For some years the institute lay within the boundaries of the Wokingham constituency. I know that I share with many others admiration for the past work of the NIRD, now coming to its end.

I shall concentrate on one point only. I am grateful for the presence of the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science and also for the conscientious and exhaustive way in which he personally has looked at this matter, as he always does when human matters are involved. It could be put like this. His view—of course it is upon advice and having looked at the matter carefully—is that staff entitlement was explicitly agreed when the current Agricultural and Food Research Council's pension scheme was introduced with a retirement age of 60. I think that that is a fair summary of the view that he has expressed to my hon. Friend and to me. I do not question the sincerity with which that view is put, but it is not a correct reflection of the position of those who are 60 or older or were on a contract that gave them certain rights when they reached 60.

I have drawn to the Minister's attention a letter to a constituent of mine from the secretary of the institute. So that the references are on the record, I should say that the letter is dated 14 March 1974. The letter was written to bring the then existing arrangements at the institute into line with the institutes of what was called the Agricultural Research Council. One can see the reasoning, purpose and rationalisation behind that in 1974.

However, as we have been reminded, the delegacy of the institute agreed in 1974 that the retirement age should be 60 in future contracts and that existing staff should have that option offered to them. That rule was reasonable, civilised and proper and I take no exception to it. However, a number of senior men, including the constituent in whose name I have provided documentation, did not take up that option in 1974. There is no dispute about that.

Furthermore, the Employment Protection Act 1978 requires that all employees should receive a statement of their terms and conditions of employment. I shall not weary the House by reading the statement and conditions of employment issued to those of whom we are speaking. I shall quote only paragraph 13 of the statement that was given to my constituent and, I have every reason to believe, to all others involved:

> "Although the retirement age for staff is 60, you are allowed to retain a retirement age of 65, but you may choose to retire at 60 with immediate payment of any benefits to which you are entitled under the ARC superannuation scheme."

That shows that the retirement age for my constituents and others was 65, and all compensation should be based on that age. However genuinely and sincerely the Minister states that he is satisfied that the retirement age is 60, he is not correct. I ask him to recognise that fact.

The House always likes matters such as these to be reduced to their effect on individuals. I have been a willingly loyal supporter of the Government's policy on universities, involving, as it has in recent years, severe reductions and retrenchments of personnel. However, we have always said—and, as far as I know, we have always honoured the commitment—that the rights of individuals are protected. If the House has interfered with the reasonable expectations of those employed in universities, we have recompensed them accordingly.

In this case, the amount involved is minuscule in terms of national expenditure, but for one of my constituents it represents a pension right of £1,000 a year. I know that the Minister accepts that that is a major change in the reasonable expectations of a person's professional life when he has been working for one of the most prestigious academic and practical institutions in its field.

I repeat my gratitude to my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East for permitting me time in his debate to support his forceful advocacy. I feel deeply that, unwittingly I am sure, the Government are doing an injustice to some fine people. Such actions always leave me with a sense of deep unease and that is why I am grateful for the opportunity to help to raise the matter on the Floor of the House.

12.6 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Peter Brooke): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Sir G. Vaughan) for providing the House with an opportunity to debate the closure of the NIRD at Shinfield, Reading and the circumstances of the termination of service of people formerly employed by the institute. I am also grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Sir W. van Straubenzee) for having joined in the debate and I thank both my hon. Friends for the way in which they put the issues. I recognise that the matter is one of particular concern to their constituents. We have had some correspondence about it and had the pleasure of meetings on the issue. I pay tribute to my hon. Friends, because no constituents could ask for more diligent hon. Members on their behalf.

Until its formal winding-up on 31 March, the NIRD was a state-aided agricultural research institute funded by the Agricultural and Food Research Council. The AFRC funds 14 such state-aided institutes in England and Wales, which, together with the council's own establishments and the state-aided institutes funded by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland, constitute the Agricultural and Food Research Service. With the agreement of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, which provides about half the AFRC's income through payments for commissioned research, and DAFS, the AFRC undertakes corporate planning for the whole of the AFRS. I note that because the changes at the NIRD need to be understood in the context of the research service as a whole.

In its first corporate plan, published in December 1983, the AFRC identified as an important objective the achievement of more specific remits for individual institutions. It wishes to move towards a simpler and more integral management and structuring of research programmes. In line with that objective, the first plan gave notice of the council's intention to bring the NIRD and Grassland Research Institute programmes on nutrition and production studies in cattle, sheep and pigs under single management, with the possibility of a progressive concentration of the work at the GRI site at Hurley, near Maidenhead. The plan also envisaged expanding the programme of food research at the existing sites at Bristol, Norwich and at Shinfield, and to convert that part of the NIRD programme at Shinfield which has concentrated on milk utilisation to the study of a wider range of commodities.

These proposals in the plan are now well on the way to implementation. The closure of NIRD and the Grassland Research Institute at the end of last month coincided with the establishment of a new Animals and Grassland Research Institute based at Hurley and of a new Food Research Institute, Reading, which will continue to use some of the former NIRD premises. The initial staff of both institutes have been found by transfers from the former institutes, although inevitably in a rationalisation of this kind jobs could not be found for all the former members of staff. I should say in this connection that the council's planning and redirection of activity is being carried out in the context of a significant reduction of income from the Department of Education and Science, following advice from the Advisory Board for the Research Councils in 1982, and the prospect of equally serious reductions in commissioned research income. The council's second corporate plan, published in March, speaks of 550 posts having been lost in 1984-85—100 by compulsory redundancy—with at least 650 more to go by 1988, a significant proportion of whom will inevitably be made compulsorily redundant.

I turn now to the position of the staff at NIRD. In doing so I must stress that the AFRC acts in these matters as an independent body in receipt of its own legal advice. My Department is not necessarily privy to that advice, and in any case it has no power to intervene. Under the council's Royal Charter, the pay and pensions of its officers are subject to the approval of the Secretary of State for Education and Science and the Treasury. Details of conditions of service, however, are matters for the council to determine.

The NIRD was technically a constituent institution of the University of Reading and was administered by a delegacy of the university. Its staff were employed by the university, as my hon. Friend said, but it was a condition of the AFRC's grant to the university to run NIRD that their terms and conditions should be essentially the same as those of other staff in the AFRS. The AFRC told the university when the time for closure came that the grant was being withdrawn. Thereafter the university procedures to which my hon. Friend referred are essentially for the university. The staff concerned are members of the AFRC pension scheme and are employed on Civil Service rather than university salaries. That is why the decisions relating to the staff were taken by the AFRC rather than by the university. Effectively they were members of the Agricultural and Food Research Service. For many purposes that is treated as a unified service. For example, it is covered by a single Whitley council, a single redundancy agreement and unified disciplinary and promotion procedures.

The normal retirement age for AFRS staff has for a long time been 60. However, a number of staff at NIRD who were appointed before February 1974 had a specific provision in their contracts from the university, their employer, that their retirement age was 65. My hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham specifically referred to an individual.

When the decision was taken to close NIRD all its staff were given notice that their contracts would be terminated, as was allowed for in their terms and conditions. I understand that all staff below the age of 60 have been offered contracts at the new institutes, apart from eight industrial staff who left under the redundancy agreement. Those contracts specify a retirement age of 60 in all cases, including those of staff whose previous contracts specified retirement at 65.

Although I know that my hon. Friend is specifically referring to the group aged between 60 and 65, because he quoted the larger group I will dwell on them for a moment. It is obviously for individuals to decide whether to accept those new contracts—I am talking of those under 60. If they do so, they also accept the change in retirement age. If they reject the new contracts it is for AFRC to decide whether that rejection is reasonable. If the rejection is reasonable, the individual is treated as redundant and compensated accordingly. If it is not, he is treated as resigning and receives no immediate benefits. In the latter circumstances, it is open to an individual to take his case to an industrial tribunal. I understand, however, that the AFRC trade unions advised their staff to accept the new contracts and that as of yesterday all but one had done so.

Staff at NIRD who were aged 60 or more on 1 April 1985 have not been offered new contracts of employment and are therefore redundant. I shall come to the question of compensation in a moment, but it is important to realise why the AFRC has acted in this way. Its purpose of course is to apply across its whole service, including the new institutes, its retirement age of 60. This concern is given particular force by the fact that the AFRC is currently having to make a significant number of compulsory redundancies to stay within the Government's expenditure constraints. To retain former NIRD staff up to age 65 would, therefore, in effect mean that more younger staff in other institutes would have to be made redundant instead. It may be helpful if I give the House some idea of the numbers involved. When NIRD closed there were some 405 staff there. Of these, about 364 have accepted the offer of new contracts of employment at other AFRS institutes. For about a third of those this means accepting a contract with a different retiring age. Thirty-three staff are already aged 60 or more and are therefore not being offered new contracts and, as I mentioned earlier, eight industrial staff have been made redundant.

In considering the question of compensation for staff aged 60 or more who have been made redundant — which formed the nucleus of my hon. Friend's case—it is necessary to look back to 1975 when the AFRC introduced a new pension scheme. That scheme is essentially the same as the principal Civil Service pension scheme, which has a normal retirement age of 60. When its introduction was discussed the position of staff with a contractual entitlement to work until age 65 was looked into very carefully. It was explicitly accepted by all parties, including, I understand, the AFRC trade unions, that if such staff were made redundant after age 60 they should receive only immediate payment of their pension entitlement. Certainly there is a letter to the unions setting out these terms and there is a letter to the secretaries of all the institutes stating the circumstances of the case.

This was part of the agreed package for introducing pension arrangements which were in many ways an improvement on those that the staff concerned had before. The only exception would be if that was less than their statutory entitlement under redundancy compensation legislation, in which case it would be made up to the latter figure. This is the basis on which the NIRD staff are being compensated, since the situation envisaged back in 1975 has now arisen. It was, of course, the AFRC's decision in 1975 to allow staff to retain a right to work until age 65 while joining a pension scheme with a normal retirement age of 60. It gave them the option to do this because it wished to encourage as many staff as possible to join the new scheme. However, I understand that if NIRD staff now being made redundant had stayed in their previous pension scheme they would not have been any better off, and might have been worse off.

Despite all this, the Government have considered carefully the possibility of allowing AFRC to pay additional compensation to NIRD staff aged 60 or more. We have not yet felt able to do so. The starting point must be that there is no legal entitlement to such compensation. The staff concerned have had their contracts terminated, are therefore redundant and have been compensated for this in line with arrangements made with their representatives in 1975. I am afraid that that is a fairly normal course of events in both the private and the public sector. They are receiving a Civil Service pension, which is not normally regarded as ungenerous. They were in many ways in a favourable position with a pension scheme posited on a retirement age of 60, a right to retire at 60, and yet a right to stay on until 65. In using the expresssion "a right", I am, of course, implying that it was subject to the provisions of the contracts of employment which allowed for termination by notice, and that observation applies both before and after 60. I acknowledge, nevertheless, their genuine concern that their expectation of working until 65 has been removed with a consequent reduction in their pensions. I can only say that this is by no means the only area where Government policy involves retrenchment and a requirement on staff to leave before the age to which they had hoped to serve.

I understand and sympathise with the concern of my hon. Friends the Members for Reading, East and for Wokingham for their constituents. The position is not one that any of us would have chosen. As has been kindly said, I have looked into it in some detail. I hope that I have demonstrated that none of the staff of the former NIRD has been unfairly or unreasonably treated. It is, of course, unpleasant for people who have given good and useful service to their employers, and who believe that they still have much to contribute, to have their service terminated or, as they see it, truncated. However, the AFRC, which has the responsibility for managing the service and deciding on the allocation of the funds entrusted to it must be free to make the changes which it regards as necessary for the proper development of the scientific work that it supports, bearing in mind resources and priorities.

Security Services (Ministerial Control)

12.21 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Yesterday's announcement by the Prime Minister of a large extension of ministerial powers in suspending public servants—and not only civil servants—on the ground of being subversive is bound to cause further anxiety about security matters.

We must be very careful not to allow a climate of intolerance to grow. We know what happened in the United States in the late 1940s and early 1950s, and the tremendous damage that McCarthyism and the like did there. I think that we can say with some justification that even at the height of the cold war hysteria, we did not, under either Labour or Conservative Governments, allow ourselves to follow quite that path in the 1950s. When the Prime Minister returns to the House after the Easter break, she will be expected to make an announcement. She should have made an oral statement to the House instead of using the device of a written reply.

The security services are rarely debated in the House. They might be touched on, as happened, for example, in the debates held only this week during the Committee stage of the Interception of Communications Bill, but that is about all. It is not possible for me or any other hon. Member to table questions about the security services, because the Table Office will tell us that such questions are not allowed. I accept straight away that the same argument has been put by Ministers in successive Governments, and no doubt we shall hear the same argument from the Minister today. It is argued that it is necessary to protect the work undertaken by bodies such as MI5, and so it would not be in the public interest for such state agencies to be the subject of parliamentary questions and scrutiny.

However, there is a growing feeling in the House, and even among some Conservative Members I understand that that attitude is no longer acceptable. The allegations that have been made, particularly in the film shown on Channel 4, "MI5's Official Secrets", have strengthened the case for saying that some degree of parliamentary accountability on the part of the security services is now more than justified. Indeed, I do not accept that such accountability would endanger the safety of the country. I shall illustrate that by reference to the Select Committee of which I am a member.

When the Home Affairs Committee decided to look into the special branch of the police force, one or two Conservative Members and some people outside expressed the fear that we would endanger the safety of the state. What happened? We agreed to inquire into the special branch and that all our sessions would be held in public. The inquiry has now come to an end. Does the Minister or any Conservative Member suggest that as a result of that inquiry, with public sessions—just as there should be—the country has been in any way endangered? Have secrets been revealed? The answer is perfectly clear. Therefore, the fears expressed at the time about the Select Committee's inquiry were not justified. The leak that occurred was about a draft report, and I hope that that will not be used as ammunition in arguing against parliamentary scrutiny.

In a recent answer, the Prime Minister informed me that she would not agree to the Director General of MI5 appearing before the Select Committee if at any time he was invited to do so. When I put another question to the Home Secretary, I was informed that it would not be possible for the newly appointed Director General of MI5 to meet hon. Members in this House, say, once a year. But what would be wrong with that? Indeed, what would be wrong with the Director General of MI5, who is a public servant, paid out of public funds, appearing, if so requested, before the Home Affairs Committee?

I cannot for the life of me see how the state would be endangered if the Director General came before the Select Committee. Nowadays, everyone knows who he is. Only two or three weeks ago a profile appeared in The Observer. So the nonsense that the public are not supposed to know the identity of such people has fortunately ended. Before the film, "MI5's Official Secrets", was shown, disturbing reports had appeared in the press about the way in which MI5 collects information on people.

There is, apparently, an F Branch of MI5, which is very important. It is sub-divided: F2 investigates not the stock exchange, the City or the Conservative party but trade unions, while F7 looks at various other political groups. In an article that appeared in The Guardian in April 1984 we were told that F7 also looks at Members of Parliament, teachers, lawyers and journalists. If that is so, how many people are the subject of investigation? How many files are open on Members of Parliament, teachers, lawyers and journalists, and perhaps others as well? Who decides who should be investigated by F branch of MI5? Since the publicity over F branch, the title might have changed.

It is perhaps surprising—although I do not know—that those Conservative Members who are always on about state interference and the need to cut the number of civil servants do not seem to be particularly worried about state surveillance activities. The article also mentions FX. Apparently, it is responsible for long-term infiltration. Moreover, F4 puts agents into political parties and organisations. We are told that F6 puts agents into trade unions. If I had mentioned all this at the time, or shortly afterwards, the ministerial response might have been—and might still be today—that we should not believe all that we read in the press. Of course when an organisation such as MI5 has such immense powers, and there is no parliamentary scrutiny, there is bound to be unease about whether abuses occur.

In the film "MI5's Official Secrets", a former employee of MI5, Miss Cathy Massiter, claimed that the late Mr. Harry Newton was an agent of MI5 and had been put by MI5 into CND and other organisations. This point may not be covered by the Minister's brief, but I hope that he will take note of it. Would it not be right to clear up this allegation? Mr. Newton is dead, and the allegation has caused considerable distress to his family and friends.

If the allegation made by Miss Massiter is correct, what justification would there be for the security service to plant agents in organisations that no reasonable person could consider to be subversive? I do not know whether Mr. Newton was an agent—I am trying to seek information through this debate. If he was not an agent, what possible reason could there be for Miss Massiter to claim that he was? What would be her motive? Many of us believe that she is an honourable woman, who has done the country good by revealing what has been happening in MI5.

Is CND subversive in the eyes of security service? The Home Secretary told us in the House and in the Select Committee when it was examining the special branch that the CND is perfectly legal. Therefore, why is it subject to all these investigations?

In March this year, I read in The Observer that the former editor of the CND newspaper, a journalist of some 30 years experience, a Mr. Bonnett, fell out with CND. When he left the organisation, he was asked all sorts of questions by the special branch, about gossip, such as who lives with whom, and about the leadership style of the general secretary of CND. What justification is there for asking such questions? He is quoted as saying that the special branch was interested in everybody. There is understandable and justifiable concern over this matter.

Is the Institute for Workers' Control, of which Mr. Newton was treasurer, considered subversive? If it is not, why was Mr. Newton, if he was an agent, planted in that organisation, and no doubt encouraged to become its treasurer? Are MI5's planted agents instructed to act in the most provocative way possible, carrying out the traditional role of agents provacateurs? Is putting agents into such organisations the right way to spend taxpayer's money?

Yesterday in Committee on the Interception of Communications Bill, I was asked by a Conservative member whether I believed that a security service was necessary. Obviously, I answered in the affirmative. I went on to say that much of the work undertaken by the security service is no doubt justified, but if the feeling continues to grow that some part of the security service is out of control, and many people fully committed to the parliamentary and democratic system are or have been the subject of unjustified surveillance by MI5, then confidence in the impartiality of the service will become eroded. Why should CND, the National Council for Civil Liberties and the Institute for Workers' Control be targeted by the security service and the special branch?

Miss Massiter said about the NCCL:

"Anyone who was on the National Executive of NCCL, who worked for NCCL, who was an active member to the degree of being, say, a branch secretary of NCCL, would be placed on permanent record and the routine enquiries were instituted to identify such people and police inquiries were sought."

I am sure that the Minister will say that he is not in a position to talk about such matters, but is it not a matter of concern to the House that an organisation that no one could reasonably consider to be subversive should be subject to such detailed and unjustified inquiries? How far does this extend to other organisations?

Why was my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman), before she came to the House, the subject of such surveillance? Is she a subversive? Is it argued that she wanted somehow to overthrow parliamentary democracy? Taxpayers' money was used to carry out investigations into her and many like her. I should have thought that every hon. Member should be concerned about such abuses being practised by the security service. What kind of intelligence officer in MI5 could have been so stupid or prejudiced as to believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham was some kind of danger or threat to the state?

Are there some people in MI5—if there are, I trust that there are not many—who are so partial in their own political views that they would find it difficult to carry out objectively the directive given to the security service in 1952?

The matters that I raise will continue to be raised, certainly by Labour Members. The feeling grows that it is wrong for the security service not to be subject to any form of control by Parliament. The definition of subversive, which anyway is far too wide and needs changing, refers to those who want to overthrow parliamentary democracy by various means. The irony is that Parliament itself has no say in these matters. We can have the occasional debate, but we are not likely to get much information. The director-general of MI5 is banned from appearing before the Select Committee and questions are banned in the House. The announcement by the Prime Minister yesterday means that anxiety is bound to grow, as is the feeling that some changes are necessary.

Yesterday, in Committee on the Interception of Communications Bill, one or two Conservative Members argued for an ombudsman for telephone tapping, but more is required. If we are to have confidence in the security service we have to be persuaded that it carries out its function in a proper manner and not by such practices as targeting organisations such as the NCCL and the CND, and carrying out inquiries into my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham. We have to be persuaded that the security service will carry out its functions in a proper manner. It should not do so in a way that many of us would consider, in the light of the allegations made by Miss Massiter, to be near-subversive in themselves.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): The subject of this debate reflects the close interest that the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) takes in security matters, and that has been demonstrated by his contributions, among other things, to the recent inquiry of the Home Affairs Select Committee into special branches, and to debates on the Interception of Communications Bill. There is no dispute that questions of national security, touching as they do both on the most vital interests of the nation and upon the rights and freedoms of the individual citizen, are ones which need to be taken very seriously by the House, and I have no quarrel with the hon. Gentleman for raising these matters. However, I am sorry that he did not pay tribute to the vital work that the security service carries out in protecting the community as a whole from threats such as espionage and terrorism.

Mr. Winnick: I said that much of the work was justified.

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Gentleman referred to yesterday's announcement, which he said represented a large extension of ministerial power to suspend people in the public service who are security risks. I am sure that all hon. Members will agree with the basic proposition that when the reliability of an individual in public service is in doubt it may be necessary to remove him from work the nature of which is vital to the security of the state, or to bar him from moving to such work. When there is doubt because of alleged subversive tendencies or associations a formal procedure is used which has existed since 1948. Under it the individual has the right of appeal to an independent panel of three advisers.

Last night the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) engaged in his usual extravagant language and made a statement to the press which was reported this morning. If the right hon. Gentleman works himself into a lather like that over such a non-event he is likely to be well and truly dead before he is deselected for Gorton.

I must go into some detail to put into perspective the substance of the reply given yesterday.

Mr. Winnick: I appreciate that it is right for the Minister to refer to such matters, because I referred to them, but does he intend to find time to refer to other matters that I raised?

Mr. Waddington: I have every intention of referring to a number of other matters raised by the hon. Gentleman.

The terms of reference of the three advisers were last published by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury in 1957. The Security Commission, in its report on security procedures and practices in the public service in 1982 observed that these had become out of date in the light of the changes in the nature of the threat to security. I am advised that my right hon. and learned Friend has decided, in the light of that, that the Government, in consultation with the three advisers—Lord Justice Lloyd, Sir Patrick Nairne and Mr. Edward Hewlett — should revise the terms of reference and the statement of procedures to be followed. That decision, which was announced yesterday, does not alter the definition of subversion from that given by Lord Harris of Greenwich, a Labour Minister, in 1975.

The new terms of reference now include membership of subversive groups, other than Communists, which are acknowledged by the Minister concerned to fall within the definition of "activities which threaten the safety or wellbeing of the state and which are intended to undermine or overthrow parliamentary democracy by political, industrial or violent means."

The only other changes in the terms of reference of the three advisers are concerned with procedure. I therefore hope that the hon. Member for Walsall, North will recognise that this really is "much ado about nothing". It would have been highly irresponsible if the terms of reference had not been brought up to date in the light of the report by the Security Commission.

Safeguarding national security is in a real sense the highest trust which parliament places upon Ministers and, in the area which we are now discussing, particularly upon the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary of the day. If that trust is neglected, the nation's safety is imperilled.

However, two things are particularly worth noting about the debates which have recently taken place on the Interception of Communications Bill. Nobody anywhere in the House, with the possible exception of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), who on 12 March at column 215 had some rather extraordinary things to say about his former Prime Minister Lord Wilson of Rievaulx, has suggested that Prime Ministers and Home Secretaries of successive Administrations, of whichever political party, have not discharged the trust confided in them in these matters with all the care and integrity that Parliament has rightly expected and demanded of them. No one has suggested that questions of national security can be discussed in public in any detail.

Those who threaten society with terrorism, espionage and subversion use stealth and secrecy as their weapons. Those who have to counter these threats must be able to operate with similar secrecy and their operations cannot be put at risk by public disclosure of their methods and tactics. It is this consideration, and this consideration alone, which has led successive Governments over a very long period to adhere to the policy of not commenting on security matters.

This means that false or misleading reports and allegations have to go unanswered. Far better that, than to give those who threaten our society clues as to the nature of the security service's operations against them by comparing the answer which is given to one allegation with that which is given to another. It is for that reason that I shall not comment on any of the particular allegations that have recently been made.

I cannot possibly oblige the hon. Gentleman in his request about Mr. Harry Newton. However, I shall indulge myself in a comment upon it. I am aware that the allegations about Mr. Newton have caused distress and anxiety to him, his family and those who knew him. My right hon. and learned Friend has said how irresponsible it is for such allegations to be made about someone who cannot respond to them himself. However, responsibility for the allegations rests with those who made them. I cannot depart from the usual policy of not confirming or denying allegations about the operations of the security service. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman recognises fully why that is so.

I remind the House that the Home Secretary covered all aspects of the allegations made in the programme. First, the allegations of improperly authorised interception were examined by Lord Bridge, who found that no warrant relevant to those named in the programme had been issued in contravention of the appropriate criteria. Secondly, my right hon. and learned Friend indicated that he had taken steps to examine the allegations that the security service had acted improperly in carrying out investigations and surveillance in relation to subversive activity, and had concluded, in the light of the allegations and of his inquiries into them, that the security service had carried out no operation, investigation, surveillance or action against any individual other than for the purposes laid down in its directive and with the propriety which successive Governments have rightly demanded of it.

My right hon. and learned Friend also said that he was satisfied that members of the security service had not carried out any interception without the authority of the Secretary of State, and that the Director of Public Prosecutions had asked the Metropolitan police to look into the allegations in the film which suggested that criminal offences may have been committed. This was a complete and conclusive answer to that set of allegations.

The hon. Member for Walsall, North made some remarks about CND. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has made it abundantly plain that political campaigning to change the mind of the Government or of people generally about political issues cannot constitute subversion under the definition given by Lord Harris in 1975. Similar considerations apply to trade unions and their members.

No individual need fear that he is the subject of investigation by the security authorities on the ground of subversion unless his actions and intentions bring him within the strict criteria set out in the definition. That definition was discussed at length in evidence to the Home Affairs Select Committee in its recent inquiry. My right hon. and learned Friend explained its effect fully and carefully. He also explained the reasons for the Government's belief that this definition — which was applied by the previous Labour Government—sets the right boundaries for investigations into subversion without transgressing into interference with legitimate political or trade union activity.

On ministerial control of the security service, we must take as our starting point the directive issued to the director general by the then Home Secretary, Sir David Maxwell Fyfe, in 1952, and referred to in paragraph 238 of Lord Denning's Report Cmnd. 2152.

This directive makes the director general personally responsible directly to the Home Secretary for the proper and efficient implementation of the tasks set out in the directive. It is through this relationship that ministerial control is exercised. The Government appoint the director general, and he holds office only so long as he has the confidence of the Home Secretary and the Prime Minister.

The director general is expected to seek direction and guidance from the Home Secretary as to the way the service goes about its business. With but one exception, the Home Secretary does not concern himself with particular operations. That one exception is when an interception warrant is sought, when of course the Home Secretary must be given sufficient supporting information for him to judge whether the application comes within the established criteria. But in general the Home Secretary is not concerned with particular cases, as paragraph 6 of the directive makes clear when it states:

"Ministers do not concern themselves with the detailed information which may be obtained by the Security Service in particular cases, but are furnished with such information only as may be necessary for the determination of any issue on which guidance is sought."

There are good reasons for that policy. The security service is not—as some have alleged—in the business of obtaining information on behalf of the Government. It is there to protect all of us and the state against external and internal dangers, and must, as the directive makes clear, do that in a way that avoids any suggestion that it is concerned with any matter other than the defence of the realm as a whole or that there is any political bias or influence in its work. The operational judgments must be for the director general to make. If he gets them wrong, and the safety of the state is jeopardised or civil liberties unjustifiably infringed, he must answer to the Home Secretary.

In that way the chain of responsibility and control is clear and unequivocal. It enables Ministers to discharge their responsibility to Parliament for security matters without involving themselves in the detailed operations of the security service.

Mr. Winnick: I appreciate that the Minister does not intend to respond to any of the allegations made by Miss Massiter. If it is true that my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman), when she was the legal officer for the National Council for Civil Liberties, was the subject of surveillance, and if it is true that many other people involved in that one organisation had files on them for no other reason than that they were active in that organisation, would not the Minister agree that that was indeed a serious erosion of civil liberties and in itself to be deplored?

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Gentleman knows better than that. It has been the custom for years and years never to comment on national security matters. It has certainly been the practice never to answer hypothetical questions.

The hon. Gentleman needs to think for only a moment to realise that if Ministers were actually to answer questions framed in that way, over a period of time there could be questions so framed and answers so given that eventually obvious damage would be done to the security services.

I am not, therefore, impugning anybody. It is nothing except common sense to say that it is nonsense to put questions framed in that way and ask Ministers of the Crown to answer them. I am not departing from the practice that has been followed by Governments for as long as I can remember, and certainly the practice followed by the last Labour Government.

The hon. Gentleman, who is so ready to make all these criticisms, never mentions one of the most salient factors in the "20:20 Vision" film, which was that the bulk of the allegations related to matters that were alleged to have happened during the period of the Labour Government. All the hon. Gentleman's attacks are directed as though somehow under this Government the prison gates are closing and practices are being changed. He knows the position perfectly well and he should make that plain if he wants to make a fair speech to the House—which it is obvious he does not.

I am sure that the House would not want the position to arise where any Home Secretary was directing particular operations against subversives or others who might threaten our society. However great was the honour and integrity of the Home Secretary of the day, the suspicion would always exist that political influence might be brought to bear on the conduct of these operations, and it is therefore right that through the structure of responsibility established by the directive, the service should be under the operational control of its director general, and that he should account to the Home Secretary for its proper and efficient working.

So the Home Secretary is necessarily distanced from the detailed workings of the security service, but that does not mean that there is any lack of ministerial control. As my right hon. and learned Friend has made clear, he and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister take very seriously their responsibility for satisfying themselves that the service operates within the letter and spirit of its directive. They take the utmost care to ensure that the person appointed as director general has the necessary qualities of ability and judgment to guide the service properly and effectively in the performance of the tasks set for it. My right hon. and learned Friend maintains regular contact with the director general, though the House will not expect me to go into details about the nature of those contacts or the matters discussed.

However, the House can be assured that my right hon. and learned Friend takes great care—as I am sure did his predecessors—to inform himself of the matters of which he must be aware in order to satisfy his responsibility to Parliament for the maintenance of a security service that is efficient in the protection of our national security and vigilant in its upholding of the civil liberties of the citizens of this country. This is an effective exercise of ministerial control in a difficult and sensitive area. I believe that the balance is right, as indeed have all the Governments of both parties who have exercised these responsibilities since 1952 when the directive was issued.

Royal Assent

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I have to inform the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

1. Hong Kong Act 1985.
2. National Heritage (Scotland) Act 1985.
3. Lerwick Harbour Order Confirmation Act 1985.
4. Bournemouth Borough Council Act 1985.
5. London Docklands Railway Act 1985.

European Economic Community (Enlargement)

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): The subject for debate has not been dealt with by the House since 1978, which was the last occasion on which we had an opportunity to discuss the vital matter of the enlargement of the EEC, which will have, as I hope to show the House, very profound effects for the United Kingdom and the EEC as a whole.

Since 1978 we have had the opportunity to examine the effects of an enlargement of the Community with the accession of Greece. As a Member of the European Parliament from 1979 to 1984, I have had the opportunity to examine the effect of an enlargement of the Community and to consider at close quarters the operation of the institutions of the Community.

The rationale that is given by the Government for supporting the accession of Spain and Portugal to the EEC tends — my hon. Friend the Minister will no doubt confirm this later — to be based on three principal arguments. One could be summarised as the completion of western democratic Europe, another related to that would be the consolidation of democracy in the applicant countries — Spain and Portugal — and the third has a strategic or defence element and relates to the encouragement of Spain to take part in or to join NATO.

The completion or extension of democratic Europe is a very tempting argument, although it should be noted that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said as recently as 2 April — Hansard reference column 1066, perhaps appropriately:

> "I think it likely that 12 will be the limit of the Community for a very long time."—[Offical Report, 2 April 1985; Vol. 76, c. 1066.]

I regret that in a sense because, quite apart from the merits or otherwise of the case being made for Spain and Portugal to join the Community, I would be very interested in the possibility of countries such as Austria and Switzerland — were it not for their curious political position — and Norway and Sweden looking again at the Community as prospective members. Apparently that is not in the mind of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, which I regret.

Therefore, the argument about the completion of western democratic Europe can at best be only a rather temporary one because we are not, apparently, contemplating its full completion. In that sense, the related argument about the consolidation of democracy is somewhat dubious because we are not told in what sense mere membership of the EEC would guarantee the continuation of democracy in any member country, never mind Spain and Portugal. Nor does the Community have a satisfactory definition of "democracy", and I believe that it would be unable to judge whether a country was, in that sense, sufficienty democratic to merit membership. The Minister of State might wish to expand on that when he replies to the debate.

In relation to the argument relating to strategy, defence and NATO, an intriguing prospect emerges because the Spanish people will have a referendum next year about their membership of NATO. Are we being told that we are, in effect, bribing the Spaniards into agreeing to stay in NATO by their membership of the EEC? Or do we not welcome wholehearted membership of NATO, regardless of whether moneyes are paid or membership of other organisations is extended?

That must be considered in the context of the fact that Ireland, which is a member of the EEC, is not in NATO — indeed, Ireland declares itself to be neutral — that France is not a full member of NATO in any case, and that, more importantly, the country which is arguably the single most important member of NATO, certainly on the eastern flank—Turkey—will apparently be expected to continue to support NATO without being offered the bribe or inducement of membership of the EEC. It is beyond me why we must offer Spain, but not Turkey, that inducement.

Will the Minister comment on the position of Turkey as a loyal member of NATO and as a country which is moving rapidly towards the restoration of democracy, and say whether we would welcome Turkey as a member of the EEC? That is highly relevant to the question under consideration, which is the enlargement of the Community, in this case to take in Spain and Portugal.

Politics is, among other things, the assessment of the judgment of costs and benefits. What I have outlined so far have been the principal arguments about the claimed benefits of the enlargment of the EEC bringing in Spain and Portugal. The costs argument is much less clear than hon. Members might believe. Surprisingly little information is to hand about the costs of enlargement. The Prime Minister said:

"We shall, of course, put as many of the details of the costs"— of enlargement—

"as we can before the House". — [Official Report, 2 April 1985; Vol. 76, c. 1070.]

However, she had said about the enlargement of the EEC in a written reply to me:

"It is not yet possible to estimate actual costs and benefits to the United Kingdom"—[Official Report, 29 March 1985, Vol. 76, c. 365.]

We are left in the peculiar position of being asked to sign a blank cheque. We shall be asked by Her Majesty's Government to agree to the entry of Spain and Portugal without, I fear, being told the costs of that exercise, either to the Community or to the United Kingdom. I hope that that will be rectified before the treaty is brought to this House for ratification.

I hope that the Minister will consider several heads of cost and give the Government's position on them. Two of the main sources of benefit to Britain from the EC are the regional fund and the social fund. It would be interesting to know whether those funds will be increased in size and, if so, what other elements of the budget of the EC might be reduced as a result. In any case, it is not inevitable, given the fact that two countries which are less prosperous than the United Kingdom will join the Community, that our position in, as it were, the league table of claims on funds, such as the regional and social funds will be reduced.

Shall we not find ourselves benefiting less than we have from such funds? Either we shall benefit less, in the sense that we shall get less of an existing fund, or, if the funds are increased in size, we shall get less than we would have got were Spain and Portugal not members. I am sure that the Minister will have followed that logic—I hope that it has not been too confused—in his usual impeccable way.

My first area of concern, therefore, could be put broadly as the redistribution of wealth from the richer to the poorer. It is often said that one argument for bringing Spain and Portugal into the Community is that we could help them as less prosperous countries. The honest answer to be given by those who support the entry of Spain and Portugal must be that, if that is the case, the more prosperous must inevitably pay some of the bill. It is the size of that bill that we must be told before we are expected to approve the entry of Spain and Portugal into the Community.

A much bigger issue is the common agricultural policy, and here we enter the real big money arguments of the EC. The CAP still takes by far the largest part of the resources of the Community and there is, regrettably, no sign of that changing. How much worse will it be when we get the entry of these two new countries into the Community, with their production of wine, olive oil and tomatoes, to say nothing of their other products, and the demands that they will make on the CAP?

The questions that arise from that include not only what we shall do to deal with the control of expenditure on those important items, which will be much increased in output within the Community, but what will happen to the whole orientation of the CAP. I have been asked to comment on behalf of Britain's horticultural industry. I have been sent a document by the National Farmers Union, and the extracts I quote from it show the depth of concern of the industry in this country. The NFU says:

"realisation of Spain's enormous agricultural potential could add to the Community's existing surplus problems with further adverse budgetary consequences. The Unions believe that EC funds should not be made available to Spain or Portugal from the Guidance Section of FEOGA if this would lead to increased production of products already in surplus."

The NFU goes on to say with specific reference to horticulture:

"The accession of Spain and Portugal would increase EC fruit production by almost 50 per cent. and vegetable production by 25 per cent. Existing Community growers"—— including those in the United Kingdom—

"would face a major increase in competition, as well as the possible disruption and destabilisation of sensitive and already adequately supplied markets."

There is, therefore, concern among the members of the agricultural community in Britain that the effects of Spain and Portugal coming in will be far-reaching, because the southern countries—I refer to Greece, Italy, Spain and Portugal all in alliance, and France when it suited her—would be in a position to swing the whole emphasis of the agricultural policy away from the direction that it has taken in the past — dairy products, cereals, beef, sheepmeat and the like—towards the southern products.

I hope that the Minister will address himself to that difficulty because if we are to be honest with ourselves and our citizens, and particularly with our farmers, we must tell them what we estimate the effect will be of the entry of two new countries to the Community, which would form a new emphasis or power bloc to the south of the Community, when those countries would, in their own interests, want to draw more of the CAP funds towards themselves.

Again we are faced with the difficulty either that the funds will be increased overall or that the existing funds will be redistributed. One way or the other, the bill must be picked up. It is the size of that bill about which we need to hear more today. Why is it assumed that a sector as vital as our automobile industry will prosper by easier access to Spanish markets, when the Spanish automobile industry is one of the most modern and efficient in Europe and when, if anything, we shall face an increased stiffening of competition from that source?

I am aware of, and pay tribute to, the attempts by Her Majesty's Government, and in particular by the Minister of State, to try to make sense out of the institutional arrangements of the Community, particularly in terms of the position that would be created if Spain and Portugal were to join. The Minister will, I am sure, confirm that up to now our efforts in that direction have, alas, failed. We shall see an increase in the membership of the Commission of the Community from 14 to 17. There is already a problem in finding enough meaningful work for the present 14 commissioners to do. It remains to be seen what 17 members will do. That is bad enough, but I am told that the European Parliament will increase from 434 members to 518 members. There will also be two official new Community languages. The costs of travel—Madrid and Lisbon will be centres of activity in the Community, and those of us who have been Members of the European Parliament know what that involves—and of interpretation and translation of documents must impose a heavy burden on the Community's institutions. There will also be significant effects on voting in the Council of Ministers.

I add in passing, because I agree that it is only a temporary argument in a sense, that the political complexion of the two countries, but especially the larger country, Spain, which has a Socialist Government, will have a potentially profound and unfortunate effect on the political balance within the Community and its institutions. How will the political decision-making process in the Community be affected by the accession of Spain and Portugal?

I am dubious about the claimed benefits of the enlargement to bring in Spain and Portugal. I do not believe that the arguments have the strength and validity which we have been asked to accept as unarguable and beyond dispute or doubt. I am concerned that the full cost of this exercise has never been laid before us, in terms of the internal budgetary working of the Community and, more importantly, in terms of the effects on the balance of decision-making and influence within the Community and the extent to which funds will be reorientated or redirected from the northern part of the Community, of which we are a part, to the south, in which the two applicant countries will be such an important element.

I remain extremely sceptical about the benefits of this exercise. I look to my hon. Friend the Minister of State for reassurance. I hope that the House will take the opportunity that it is given, in terms of what my hon. Friend says as a background, to consider the position that it will take when the ratification of the treaty of accession comes before hon. Members later this year.

1.12 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) began his interesting comments by saying that this was the first time since 1978 that the subject of enlargement of the Community had been raised in the House. It is perhaps no coincidence that during that year Spain and Portugal applied to join the Community. The fact that it has taken a long and arduous seven years before the negotiations were satisfactorily concluded is an eloquent indication of the extent to which real problems had to be resolved and of the Community's determination to ensure that the accession of Spain and Portugal would be beneficial to the Community as a whole and would not bring in its wake some of the fundamental problems to which my hon. Friend referred.

Although the subject of the Community often divides the House in substantial ways, the enlargement of the Community has been welcomed by the overwhelming number of hon. Members from all parties. There is a deep realisation that the accession of democracy to Spain and Portugal not only benefits the people of those countries but makes an important contribution towards strengthening the Western world as a whole.

My hon. Friend mentioned the fact that both countries have left-of-centre Governments, but it is equally true that, in their first democratic elections after the return to democracy, right-of-centre Governments were elected. One hopes that, one day, the normal process of democracy will produce Governments with political complexions that are more acceptable to my hon. Friend.

My hon. Friend referred to the remark of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister about the size of the Community and about whether, with 12 states as members of the Community, that is likely to be the end of the road. My hon. Friend said that he regretted the fact that consideration did not seem to have been given to other Western democratic countries such as Austria and the Scandinavian countries joining the Community. The position is simple. As democratic, parliamentary countries in Europe, they would be eligible to be considered for membership, if they wished to apply. They have not done so, and that is entirely within their sovereign rights. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was simply saying that, at present, no further applications for membership of the Community have been made. If a European country which was a parliamentary democracy applied for membership, that would obviously be a matter to be negotiated within the existing Community.

That must be my answer with regard to Turkey. At the moment, there is a European Community-Turkey association agreement which was negotiated in 1963 and which recognised the possibility of Turkey's eventual membership of the Community. The Turkish Government have not made any application to the Community, so that matter does not need to be considered at present.

My hon. Friend attached great importance to how membership of the Community could enhance the democratic credentials of Spain and Portugal. He will appreciate that, in the first instance, that is a matter for Spain and Portugal. It is significant that all parties in Spain and Portugal have supported applications to join the Community and have emphasised their belief that accession will help to strengthen the democratic structures of their countries if they can be locked into a community that is, by its very nature, essentially a community of parliamentary democracies.

We are all conscious of the fact that, for many years, Spain and Portugal were both outside the mainstream of European thinking and were experiencing dictatorial regimes. When democratic systems were reintroduced into both countries, they both attached importance to the strong belief that any hankering by some people for a return to authoritarian systems would be much more unlikely to make progress if Spain and Portugal were part of a wider community participating in the European Parliament, the Council of Ministers and the other democratic structures of western Europe.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is no mechanism in the Community to judge whether a country is democratic or, more importantly, to reject from membership any country that is not democratic from time to time? I am at a loss to understand what would happen if any country that intends joining the Community or any country that is already in the Community became in some sense undemocratic.

Mr. Rifkind: I suggest that democracy is rather like the elephant—difficult to describe, but one knows one when one sees one. Although my hon. Friend is correct to draw attention to the theoretical possibility that an existing member of the Community may one day adopt an authoritarian system of government, and to the fact that the Community has no formal method of responding to that, there is, I believe, general acceptance of the fact that it is incompatible with full membership of the Community for a country that does not have democratic structures to participate fully. How could such a country participate in the European Parliament? How could it participate in an equal and acceptable way in the Council of Ministers? I believe that that point is widely acknowledged.

My hon. Friend asked about the implications for the regional and social funds of the accession of Spain and Portugal. Recently, it has been agreed that the regional and social funds should be significantly increased, with a view not simply to the consequences of enlargement but because of the widespread belief that agriculture should take an increasingly lower proportion of total expenditure and other Community activities should take a higher proportion. The particular quotas that will be available to Spain and Portugal from the regional development fund have not yet been decided. They will be determined later this year. The decisions that were taken at the European Council with regard to integrated Mediterranean programmes were taken firmly on the basis that additional criteria for determining entitlement to the regional fund should not be changed. One Commission proposal would have shifted regional funds towards the Mediterranean countries. That proposal has been withdrawn, and there is now no danger of such a development.

My hon. Friend referred to the institutional implications of enlargement of the Community, mentioning in particular the problems that could arise from a larger Commission of 17 members, as is presently proposed. As he knows, the British Government have been in the forefront in arguing that this is an appropriate time at which to look completely afresh at the whole question of the size of the Commission. We have said that for our own part we would find it acceptable that there should be one Commissioner per member state, rather than some of the larger states having two Commissioners, as at present.

My hon. Friend is correct in saying that there is as yet no agreement, but I have been heartened by the fact that in the ad hoc committee on institutions—the so-called Dooge committee — on which I am the British representative, I made a proposal to that effect, and there has been unanimous agreement in the final report that it would be desirable to reduce the size of the Commission. There is still continuing discussion as the exact figure, but there was unanimous agreement on the part of all the representatives on the committee—all of whom were personal representatives of their respective Prime Ministers—that the likely figure of 17, which would result from enlargement under the existing rule, would be highly undesirable and unsatisfactory, very much for the reasons referred to by my hon. Friend.

My hon. Friend properly drew attention to the cost implications of enlargement, and that clearly is an important matter. It was one of the most difficult issues to resolve in the negotiations. He may be aware that the agreement which has been proposed in regard to the traditional financial arrangements is that for Spain there should be broad financial neutrality for the first few years. If the assessments on which the proposal is based are correct, the direct budgetery costs of enlargement should be very limited in the early years at least.

With regard to Portugal, it has always been accepted by EC Governments, including the British Government, that it would be intolerable for Portugal to be a net contributor, in that it would be by far the poorest member of the Community. Therefore, there is an acceptance that, even during the transitional arrangements, there has to be some net benefit to the Portuguese economy, and that is highly appropriate.

With regard to costs, it is difficult at this stage to give any precise figures. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said, we would hope to give the House the fullest details when it considers the treaty of accession. That would provide a full opportunity for a more detailed assessment and analysis of all the implications of membership, including the financial implications.

I think that the most important point to which my hon. Friend will wish to give attention is that, following the agreement reached at the Fontainebleau summit, the financial implications for the United Kingdom will be very modest—far more modest than would otherwise have been the case. As a result of the agreement, the additional cost to the Community arising from enlargement will involve the United Kingdom in paying only 7 per cent. of the costs, rather than its traditional share of approximately 21 per cent. France will have to bear 27 per cent. and the Federal Republic of Germany 32 per cent. of the total costs. Therefore, compared with either of those two countries, the United Kingdom, with only 7 per cent. will have a very modest additional burden. Obviously, that is very satisfactory for the House and the country.

Mr. Forth: While I accept what my hon. Friend says in this context, will he agree that there is a danger, with Spain and Portugal joining the Community, that in the future there will be much greater pressure for additional Community expenditure in total, largely as a result of the agricultural matters, on which my hon. Friend has not yet touched? Therefore, his figures, while reassuring for the immediate future, may well be under a good deal of pressure as time goes on and as the Community, with its enhanced membership, finds more and more ways to spend Community money.

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is correct about Spain and Portugal being likely to be beneficiaries of Community expenditure, and they may very well have an interest in pressing for greater expenditure. But my hon. Friend should bear in mind that, parallel with that development, France, which has traditionally been a net beneficiary, is now in the process of becoming a very substantial net contributor. Therefore, in future the French financial interests will be likely to be much closer to those of Britain and West Germany, so the balance will indeed be preserved. As any increase in the own resources of the Community could be agreed only unanimously, there would be a constant ability to ensure proper accountability and responsibility in matters of this kind.

With regard to agriculture, the Community has agreed that there should be a very substantial transitional period before Spain should be entitled to full membership of the Community. There is agreement on a seven-year transitional period for all agricultural produce other than fresh fruit, vegetables and olive oil. In the case of certain sensitive products such as fruit and vegetables, the period for dismantling Community tariffs will be as long as 10 years. That will give substantial protection to our horticulture—a matter to which my hon. Friend rightly drew attention.

With regard to fisheries, which was one of the most important areas of negotiation, the outcome is extremely satisfactory for the United Kingdom. One of the areas about which we were most concerned was the possibility of Spanish access to the North sea. It is agreed that there should be no Spanish access whatever to the North sea. That has been warmly welcomed by Scottish fishermen and others who have an interest in those matters.

With regard to fisheries in other parts of Community waters, the access of Spain will be based largely on the traditional access which it has enjoyed under bilateral agreements with the European Community. There have been some increased quotas in certain areas, but not in those areas which are most sensitive for British fishermen, and that is very satisfactory.

With regard to industrial tariffs, my hon. Friend mentioned that he was far from certain that British exports in, for example, the motor vehicle industry would necessarily benefit as a result of the enlargement of the Community. It is certainly the case that Spain will be able to have the same duty-free access to the United Kingdom as the United Kingdom will ultimately have to Spain, but the question is much more complicated than that.

The problem at present—it has been for the past few years—is that Spain has far higher tariffs, which have enabled it to prevent penetration by British exports to Spain, whereas that has not been the case with the export of Spanish motor vehicles to the United Kingdom. Traditionally, Spain has had very high industrial tariffs, because historically its industry was relatively weak. It was given privileged access to the Community some years ago, and the Community has been increasingly concerned at the implications and unfairness of that in terms of reciprocal trading rights.

Under the arrangements which have been agreed, the Spanish have accepted that, in the first three years after accession, they must reduce their industrial tariffs against the rest of the Community by as much as 52 per cent. The remaining tariffs will be phased out in two or three years after that. That agreement provides very important and exciting opportunity for British exports. Particularly for motor vehicles the opportunities should be significant, because the reduced duty quota has permitted larger numbers of vehicles to be imported into Spain.

When there are two such countries as Spain and Portugal joining the Community, that does not simply involve marginal changes to the Community; it is a very significant change, of which we are all conscious. It is precisely for that reason that the negotiations were long and hard on both sides, but I believe that there is widespread agreement, not just in the United Kingdom but throughout the Community and in Spain and Portugal, that western Europe will be greatly strengthened by the addition of the Iberian peninsula to the European Community, that the democratic prospects for Western Europe are enhanced, and that as a consequence, not only at the political but at the economic level, there are challenges and opportunities for the United Kingdom which should result in our welcoming this excellent conclusion to the negotiations.

Dr. David Hemson (Detention)

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Five weeks ago, during the first weekend of March, 15 trade unionists were arrested in Harare and Kwekwe in Zimbabwe under the emergency powers taken over from the white minority Rhodesian regime of Ian Smith. All those detained have been active in campaigning for democratic trade unions under workers' control, and in organising Socialist workers' education.

Among those detained were Mr. Rabi Down of the General Engineering and Metal Workers Union, whom I had the honour of showing round the House of Commons at Christmas, and Dr. David Hemson, a teacher and refugee from South Africa, who was a textile workers' union official in Natal in the early 1970s. After being banned by the South African regime, he became a constituent and a personal friend of mine. Of the original 15 detainees, 13 have now been released, but two remain incarcerated. In addition to Doctor Hemson is Mr. Darcy Du Toit, also a teacher, and also a refugee from South Africa. Like Dr. Hemson, he is a member of the British Labour party.

Those arrests are the first concerted attack on Zimbabwean trade unionists by the Government since independence. The sole activity of the 15 people detained has been to assist in the organisation of workers in Zimbabwe and in the promotion of Socialist ideas. In fact, they have been promoting the Socialist transformation of that society, the very promise that brought ZANU to power in 1980, but which that Government have not carried out. In their view and mine, the implementation of real Socialist policies will be the only way to preserve the unity of the country, solve the problems facing working people and put an end to the economic blackmail waged against Zimbabwe by South African and Western capitalism.

The recent ZANU youth congress, as well as some ZANU leaders, called publicly for Socialist study circles among workers to be established on the widest scale, yet trade unionists, including my constituent, who have organised precisely such study circles and education among workers have been detained by the security police. The recent ZANU congress adopted a "leadership code" in an attempt to combat corruption and privilege rife at the top levels of Government and party. But trade unionists who were organising opposition to undemocratic and corrupt leaders, including some who openly collaborated with the former Smith regime, have been cast into prison.

Last year many of those detained were involved in setting up a workers' campaign for a democratic General Engineering and Metal Workers Union. They organised workers' committees in the factories and rank and file members of the union to bring it under democratic control. Last year the security police intervened to defend the general secretary of the union, Mr. Chimusoro, when he was suspended from office for corruption and misconduct by the national council of GEMWU. That long-standing supporter of the former Muzorewa regime has continued to hold office in defiance of the workers, by courtesy of the security police. Therefore, it is not surprising that the recent ZANU youth congress resolved that the CIO—the security police—should be purged.

Those detentions have sparked off an enormous wave of protest in the labour movement across the whole of Europe. On 27 March, the Labour party national executive committee passed a resolution that said:

"This committee is disturbed at the arrest of a number of trades unionists in Zimbabwe including members of ZANU, former members of the British Labour party, one of those being a British citizen. We express our grave concern that the Socialist policies on which the Government was elected in 1980 should be tarnished by this attack on campaigning trades unionists. We recognise the damage such action will do to the reputation of ZANU. Therefore, we wish to record our protest, and agree to immediately write to the Zimbabwean High Commissioner and send a tele-message to Prime Minister Mugabe."

There have been similar protests from the Swedish metal workers union, the Dutch Trades Union Congress, the French Confédération Française Démocratique du Travail, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the South African mineworkers union. There have been many more. Amnesty International has intervened. There have been protests and demonstrations in Britain, Belgium, Holland, Ireland, Sweden, Germany, Denmark, Greece and Spain.

However, for nearly four weeks there was an official silence from the Zimbabwean authorities. I know that officials from the British Foreign Office intervened on behalf of Dr. Hemson and his family, but there was no public statement from the Zimbabwean Government or the high commission in London until 26 March. When that statement came, it was full of what I can only describe as absurdities and contradictions. The detainees were accused of being Left-wing and of "organising workers for a generalised insurrection against the Government and the state."

Yet at the same time there was "no direct contact with the party or the trade unions."

That was a vain attempt at a cover-up. We now know that 13 of the 15 have been released precisely because the Zimbabwean Government were unable to bring such charges. Indeed, despite reports of beating and torture under interrogation, the Zimbabwean Government would not be able to produce a shred of credible evidence to support their claims. As for having no contact with the ZANU party or the trade unions, that was said to try to hide the deep debate going on inside ZANU and the trade union movement and the worry that many organised workers in Zimbabwe have that their Government might drift towards a Polish-style society.

One of those arrested was Mr. Nyamhunga, the president of the engineering union. Three others were on the regional executives of that union. Several are office-bearers of officially recognised workers committees. Several of those originally detained are leaders of ZANU in Kwekwe. One of those has been a ZANU(PF) member since he was 16, and was arrested 14 years ago in 1971 under the Smith white minority regime for leading opposition to the Pearce commission. His wife, also detained, is an elected leader of 10,000 ZANU members, yet the Zimbabwean information Minister claims they have no contact with ZANU or the trade unions.

All those detained gave wholehearted support to the liberation struggle against the white Rhodesian regime. For the information Minister to suggest that they support is nothing short of the grossest slander.

"the installation of a neo-colonial coalition of reactionary tendencies in Zimbabwe"

Those detained, including my constituent and the constituent of my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney,

[Mr. Dave Nellist]

North and Stoke Newington (Mr. Roberts), have had no opportunity to speak in their own defence. That is why my hon. Friend and I, together with members of the families of those detained, and with the assistance of the South African Labour Education Project, with whom the 15 were co-workers, launched the Zimbabwean Trade Unionists Defence Campaign. The wide-ranging European and African support that that campaign has received shows the deep concern within the international labour and trade union movement about this attack on fellow trade unionists and the drawing back of the Zimbabwean Government from the Socialist tasks that they set themselves in 1980.

I have four specific questions for the Minister. In the early part of the detention, reports were reaching the families of the very bad conditions of Dr. Hemson, Mr. Du Toit, and the other 13 detainees. We have reports of lice-ridden sleeping bags in overcrowded cells, and inadequate sanitary arrangements. What are the Minister's latest reports about the conditions of detention in the security prison for those two detainees?

Secondly, have the Government demanded the immediate and unconditional release of Dr. Hemson? Will the Government make similar representations, at whatever level is possible, about Mr. Darcy Du Toit? Now that the 30 days detention without trial has passed, if the Zimbabwean Government decide to deport Dr. Hemson, Mr. Darcy Du Toit, their wives Trish and Anneke, and their three children, will the British Government honour the political asylum that they granted Mr. Du Toit several years ago and allow them, if they wish, to resettle in Hackney where they used to live before they went to Zimbabwe to become teachers?

In raising this debate, I am conscious of its international importance. Five weeks ago, when first hearing of the detention, I thought originally that it may have been the work of reactionary officials in the CIO—the security police—many of whom are hangovers from the Smith days. Perhaps it had been carried out without the strict control of the Government. My initial reaction, in early contacts with the Zimbabwean high commission, was to suggest that it should look to supporting the call of the ZANU youth congress for a purge of the CIO. Although that is still necessary, that is now no longer my main feeling.

The attempt by the Zimbabwean information Minister to smear those trade unionists with association with the Rhodesian regime of Ian Smith, the instructions from Harare to London to the high commission and the commissioner to give no statements and accept no delegations, and the fact that from Wednesday 13 March Prime Minister Mugabe took personal charge of those in detention—when all those things are taken together, the real reason for the detention becomes clear. A deep suspicion is growing among the workers and peasants in Zimbabwe against ZANU(PF)'s move towards a one-party state, the maintenance of much of the private sector and the huge tracts of prime farmland that have been left in white hands. In an interview with a magazine in recent weeks, a former guerrilla said:

> "We were the ones politicising the people during the war, but what the peasants see happening now is different from what we told them. We told the people they would have land and many things, but the people still have nothing."

In criticising that path, the 15 who were detained, including the two who remain incarcerated, are being used as scapegoats for the failure of ZANU(PF) to move towards genuine Socialism which, for those of us in the Labour party and internationally in the labour and trade union movement, is inseparable from full democracy, free trade union movement, the right to free speech and freedom from arbitrary detention.

I hope that in commenting on the specific case of my constituent Dr. David Hemson, his wife Trish and their one-year-old child the Minister will give reassurances about the conditions in which Dr. Hemson is being held and the likelihood of his early release. Are the Government demanding that he should be allowed to continue his normal life in Zimbabwe, where he was a teacher in a secondary school before he was detained by the security police? If the Zimbabwean Government were to deport Dr. Hemson and Mr. Du Toit, can the Minister assure me that the political asylum granted by the British Government several years ago to Mr. Du Toit will be honoured by the present Government and that, if the family so wish, they will be allowed to settle in Hackney?

1.41 pm

Mr. Ernie Roberts (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): I wish to add a few words to those of my hon. Friend the Member or Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist). I have already written to Mr. Mugabe on the matter because of my association with Mr. Mugabe before he became the leader of his country. I and others connected with the anti-apartheid movement and other movements were concerned about the need for Zimbabwe to have its independence. We hoped that it would achieve that independence, with our support. Having spoken with Mr. Mugabe at meetings in various parts of Britain, I felt that he would respond to a friendly approach from someone seeking to insure that justice was done and that those who had been detained would be released.

I have been advised that some of the detainees, including ex-constituents of mine, have been released and would be allowed to return to this country. As my hon. Friend has said, they will probably return to Hackney. Arrangements are already in hand to assist them with housing as far as we can, so that they can take up their lives again in this country.

Although I did not know them personally, I am advised by the members of my constituency party that the children were born in the United Kingdom and will therefore have the right to British citizenship. They should, therefore, have the special protection of the Government, and the Government's concern for their safe return to this country.

My constituency party has decided to apply all the pressure that it can to ensure that the detainees are released, and, in particular that Dr. Hemson should be released and allowed to return to the United Kingdom if he wishes. Those who will need help should receive help from us and, we trust, from the Government, on a humanitarian basis. On humanitarian grounds, whatever the legal situation may be, they should be allowed to return to this country if they wish. Hackney will be only too pleased to receive them.

We ask the Minister to use his good offices on behalf of the Government to ensure that Dr. Hemson and the others who wish to return to Britain are allowed to do so and receive the humanitarian respect to which they are entitled.

1.45 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): I wish to acknowledge the obvious concern of the hon. Members for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) and for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Mr. Roberts) about the position of their constituents presently in Zimbabwe.

It may be helpful if I set out the facts of this case as far as I am able. Mr. Hemson, a British subject, has been working in Zimbabwe since 1982 as an English teacher at a school in Harare. He was detained on 1 March under the emergency powers regulations. A number of other people, Zimbabwean and non-Zimbabwean, were detained at about the same time. Under the emergency powers regulations specific charges were not required or made, but we understand that Mr. Hemson's detention is in connection with an investigation by the Zimbabwean authorities into what they consider to be unacceptable political activities concerned with trade unions. A deportation order was served on Mr. Hemson on 13 March, but implementation of the order was subsequently suspended and Mr. Hemson is now held on an immigration warrant. The Zimbabwean authorities appear to be acting strictly in accordance with their law. We understand that their investigations into this case are not yet complete.

We have had full co-operation from the Zimbabwean authorities in discharging our consular responsibilities. Mr. Hemson is receiving regular visits, including visits from his wife and lawyer, and he was seen by our consul in Harare on 7, 14 and 21 March and on 2 April. He is in good health and made no complaints about his treatment in detention. He has received medical attention for a minor complaint. Our high commission is in frequent contact with the Zimbabwean authorities over the case. We know that they are aware of the public and parliamentary interest in it here, and of our hope that matters will be speedily resolved. In addition, we are keeping Mr. Hemson's relatives in Britain and South Africa informed on a regular basis.

Mr. Du Toit was also working as a teacher in Zimbabwe. Mr. Du Toit is a refugee from South Africa who has a British travel document issued under the 1951 United Nations convention on refugees. He is not a British subject and his travel document does not entitle him to formal British consular protection. Nevertheless our post has instructions to do what it properly can to help Mr. Du Toit as well as Mr. Hemson. Consular access to Mr. Du Toit has been granted informally on one occasion, on 14 March. He appeared to be fit and well.

Mr. Nellist: On behalf of Parliament, will the Minister now attempt to ensure that the consular officials may make a further visit? The last visit took place about three weeks ago. Some of the worst conditions reported referred to the cell in which Mr. Du Toit was being held. Will the Minister attempt to secure another informal visit so that we can reassure Mr. Du Toit's family about his well-being?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman will appreciate the difficulties. Mr. Du Toit does not have British status and we therefore have no right to claim consular access to him. However, we will do what we can to ensure that so long as he is in detention we have up-to-date information about his circumstances and the conditions in which he is living.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether, if Mr. Du Toit were released and able to leave Zimbabwe, he would be able to come to the United Kingdom. I understand that his permission to stay in the United Kingdom is currently valid until next October. Thereafter, he would have to apply to renew the permission, and that would be a matter for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. However, he is at present entitled to come to the United Kingdom and could do so if he were released.

The question of the position of trade unions in Zimbabwe is one for the Zimbabweans themselves to resolve. We have no right to interfere. We can and do make our views known whenever appropriate and we try to help whenever we are asked. For example, within the framework of our aid programme for Zimbabwe, we hope to develop, in consultation with the Zimbabwean authorities, a limited programme of training courses in Britain as a way of providing some assistance to Zimbabwean trade unions. In addition, part of the funds allocated by the Overseas Development Administration to the TUC will be available for trade union training for Zimbabwe, again in consultation with the Zimbabwe Government. We are also involved in Commonwealth efforts to provide assistance within the framework of the Commonwealth Trade Union Council. Our assistance in this field, as in all others, is, of course, as it must be, given in consultation with, and with the agreement of, the Zimbabwean authorities.

One frequently hears, and no doubt the Zimbabweans themselves frequently hear, criticism of the Government in Harare for being too Socialist or not Socialist enough. I can only observe that that is a matter for the Zimbabwean Government and people. Zimbabwe is an independent country, free to determine its political and economic system for itself. It would not be right for Her Majesty's Government to express any opinion on what kind of Government Zimbabwe should have.

May I set out the Government's general policy on Zimbabwe. Our concern stems from our close historical ties with Zimbabwe, our shared membership of the Commonwealth, and the leading role played by the United Kingdom in bringing an end to the civil war in what was then Rhodesia and paving the way for an independent Zimbabwe. Important British interests are affected, in Zimbabwe itself and more widely as a result of Zimbabwe's influence in the region. Our aim now is to do what we can to encourage the development of stability and prosperity in a multiracial Zimbabwe. The purpose of our aid programme is to promote this objective, which we see as being in the interests of all Zimbabwean citizens and also important for the stability and prosperity of the wider area of southern Africa.

But it is important to recognise that this is a medium or even a long-term aim and that there are bound to be difficulties on the way. It is only five years since Zimbabwe emerged from a long and bitter civil war in which all sectors of society suffered greatly. Inevitably, progress since then has not been entirely smooth, but we think it important that the inevitable obstacles should not deter us from persevering with our longer-term efforts.

May I conclude by telling the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington that the Government recognise their full responsibility to provide what consular protection they can to any British citizen who is incarcerated in a foreign country. Where a British citizen is detained, we always make representations to the Government of that country that they should either bring charges and allow the person to be tried in open court, or he should be released if no charges are brought. We are applying exactly the same criteria to Mr. Hemson and, naturally, we hope that this matter will be satisfactorily resolved in the very near future.

Asbestos Waste (Vitrification)

1.51 pm

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): I am grateful for the opportunity of raising on the Adjournment what I believe to be an important subject, and I hope that the debate will give a wider platform to an exciting British technological breakthrough which renders an extremely harmful substance completely innocuous.

I need not remind the House that a most worrying problem in the building and other industries is the health hazard of asbestos products, not because those products are harmful in situ in a building, but because they are harmful when they are disturbed, damaged or dismantled, and when the waste products of asbestos are removed from a site, transported and disposed of.

It may be helpful if I briefly mention that there are three sorts of asbestos. There is white asbestos, whose principal use is in asbestos cement products, such as roofing, wall sheeting and down pipes. White asbestos, which is the least toxic sort, is generally safe until it is disturbed. The second type is brown asbestos, which was widely used in the 1960s as a fire safety spray on steel-framed buildings. Brown asbestos is not as hard as white asbestos; therefore, it is more easily disturbed. It is much more toxic.

The third type is blue asbestos, which is widely used for sound and thermal insulation in buildings, including the lining of air ducts. It is a very high temperature material and is used frequently in the insulation of boilers, not only in buildings but in ships. The House will know that ship breaking yards have a special problem, an example of which occurred at Faslane. Blue asbestos is the most toxic.

The current method of disposing of asbestos waste is that it must be double-bagged on the site and then transported to a suitable waste disposal site, where it is tipped and buried. The regulations state that it should be buried in 1 m of earth. Since for me imperial preference has a double meaning, I prefer to say that the regulations require that it be buried under 3 ft. 3⅜ in. of earth. The problem with the conventional method of double-bagging and dumping is that the asbestos waste remains toxic and is therefore still a health hazard. It is also in danger of being re-exposed or disturbed on the waste site at a later date. For example, during the construction of part of the M25 motorway, an asbestos waste site was discovered.

Recently, a new process was invented by the Sheffield firm of King, Taudevin and Gregson. I understand that it was invented by no less a person than the technical director of that firm, Dr. David Roberts, whom I had the great pleasure to meet in the House yesterday. Previously I had met the firm's finance director, Mr. Keith Hindle, and the managing director, Mr. Stuart Johnson.

The firm has invented a process which transforms asbestos waste into a completely harmless glass substance which is safe for all time. It is worth stating what that new process means. First, the harmful asbestos waste is vitrified on site. The vitrification of the waste makes it non-toxic and, therefore, completely harmless. The process removes any danger in the transporting and burying of asbestos waste. An added advantage is that there is no need to sterilise land when getting rid of the asbestos waste. Another gain is that the vitrification of the waste reduces its bulk. I am told that it reduces it to one fifth of its original size. If we allow for the volume and area required for the double-bagging of asbestos waste, I am told that it can reduce the area needed for disposal to one tenth of the volume presently needed.

A further beneficial by-product of the process is that not only does it get rid of a harmful substance by making it non-toxic, but it produces something that can be used, albeit only as hard core for infill on a building site. Another small but significant advantage of the new process is that it can use, as part of the vitrification process, rejected, uncycled glass from bottle banks.

There is no doubt that this is a significant breakthrough. King, Taudevin and Gregson is the world's largest glass furnace manufacturer. It is worth pointing out that it not only won the Queen's award for export achievement in 1984, but that last month it was awarded the pollution abatement technology award for inventing the process. The award was organised by the CBI, the Department of the Environment and the Royal Society of Arts.

There is no need for me to do it, but it might be prudent now to say that I have no financial interest in that distinguished Sheffield company and, of course, it does not employ any of my constituents. I must declare an interest in such matters, because I qualified as an architect many years ago. Vanity — the placing of four extra letters after my name—requires me to remain a member of the Royal Institute of British Architects, and I am a fellow of the Royal Society of Arts.

This invention is a significant breakthrough. Cost must be a crucial factor in recommending that this process should be used. If the cost is very great, clearly it will inhibit the use of such a process. I recognise also that the cost assessment very much depends upon the amount of asbestos waste which has to be stripped and removed from a site. If, however, there is a large amount of asbestos on a building site or upon any other site—for example, a requirement to dispose of asbestos waste at the rate of 10 tonnes a day—there is no doubt that the cost of the vitrification process invented by KTG, including an assessment that the capital is on a four-year write-off, the manning of the plant, the electricity needed to power the plant and the recycled glass, will be about £130 per tonne.

Having checked the figures as carefully as I can, I believe that £130 per tonne could be half the conventional cost. I understand from inquiries I have made today that the cost of bagging and dumping the asbestos waste at Fulham power station worked out some time ago at £210 per tonne and that at West Thurrock power station, where there was a requirement to get rid of 4,000 cu m of asbestos waste, the cost worked out at £260 per tonne for bagging, transporting and dumping. My information is that the figure of £260 does not include the cost of stripping the asbestos.

The scale of the disposal of asbestos waste is a primary factor. There is much asbestos waste to be disposed of in buildings and other constructions. A conservative estimate is that we shall have to dispose of asbestos waste at the rate of 100,000 tonnes a year. At Fulham power station over 1,000 tonnes have to be disposed of. Greater Manchester has informed King, Taudevin and Gregson that it needs to dispose of 25 tonnes a day from its area. During the next few years a number of power stations will be decommissioned, most of them in the south-east of England.

An additional benefit of this newly invented process is that it provides options for how the asbestos waste can be treated. The plant could be put on site, with all the attendant savings. That is the most favoured option from the point of view of savings, where there is a large amount of asbestos waste to be disposed of. However, a temporary mobile unit could be placed on site to deal with small amounts of asbestos in sensitive areas where the health of those in the immediate area has to be monitored very carefully. In the case of other sites where the amount of asbestos waste is very small it could be transported to central units strategically located in different parts of the country.

The central unit or the temporary mobile units may be less cost effective than having the plant on the site. However, I believe that it is still competitive with current conventional disposal methods. I should very much like the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment to say whether he believes that the figure of £260 per tonne is too high.

Tremendous interest has already been shown in the new process. I believe that King, Taudevin and Gregson would wish me to say that my hon. Friend's Department has been extremely helpful, in particular Mr. Tony Sheils of the land waste department. At least 20 local authorities have expressed interest in the process. My hon. Friend may also be interested to hear that about 17 countries have been in touch with King, Taudevin and Gregson, including West Germany where, because of the lack of sites, there is an arrangement for asbestos waste to be exported for burial in East Germany. The cost is £1,500 per tonne. Therefore one understands why West Germany is deeply interested in this new process.

I had expected the Central Electricity Generating Board to be very interested in the new process, because potentially it is the largest client. However, I understand that after showing initial enthusiasm the CEGB rejected a trial scheme. I find this hard to believe and, if it is true, it is disappointing. Surely it is in the power stations which will have to be decommissioned that a cheaper and more effective system for making the waste harmless will be of the greatest economic benefit.

It would be wrong of me not to mention that there are other alternatives to the present conventional method, but I do not believe that they are half so good or half so effective as the process invented by King, Taudevin and Gregson. In the case of one scheme, I understand that the asbestos waste can be compressed to reduce its volume. Another system involves the encapsulation of asbestos waste either in cement or in a resinous material, but in those cases the asbestos waste is still toxic. Therefore its harm is not necessarily removed.

I have no doubt that the King, Taudevin and Gregson process is an important breakthrough. It could end the asbestos waste problem, which is a major environmental hazard. I am proud to say that a British firm has created this process. I ask my hon. Friend to use his good offices and his considerable authority not only to broadcast this achievement to local authorities and other potential clients but also—I think I am entitled to say this on behalf of the constituents of other hon. Friends as well as my own constituents — to consider seriously whether the regulations relating to the disposal of asbestos waste could be tightened up by means of a requirement to make the waste non-toxic. That is necessary on health and environmental grounds. I should like to think that I have demonstrated that there is a process by which the waste can be made non-toxic, and that on economic grounds it is practicable and reasonable to do so.

2.9 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) for raising this important subject. It is appropriate that he should do so, because his commitment and expertise over a long period, even before he became a member of the Select Committee on the Environment, and his professional training as an architect give him insights into some of the problems resulting from the demolition or design of buildings.

I think that it would be useful if I filled in a little of the background. I shall have little to add to what my hon. Friend said, because his speech contained a wealth of accurate information.

It is estimated that about 6 million tonnes of asbestos has been imported into the United Kingdom over the past 80 years. Imports of asbestos are declining but in 1984 about 38,000 tonnes was imported, mainly for use in asbestos cement, friction materials and asbestos textiles. The amounts of asbestos waste arriving for disposal are substantial — about 120,000 tonnes per annum. Those levels are likely to continue for some years as asbestos materials are replaced by substitutes. The waste is often fibrous or dusty and must be handled properly. That leads directly to the manner of its disposal.

It may be helpful if I explain our general approach to the disposal of wastes; the treatment of asbestos is exceptional. We believe that a substantial proportion of domestic, commercial and industrial ordinary waste can be safely disposed of by controlled landfill. In many cases, that may be the best environmental option.

Only last week, I opened a symposium to launch the report of our landfill practices review group which has produced comprehensive guidance on the landfilling of wastes. I urged the authorities concerned to make sure that their standards are as high as they need to be, because some preliminary reports from the hazardous waste inspectorate give cause for concern. However, we rely equally on other methods such as incineration and chemical or physical treatment for wastes that need special approaches.

Most of the wastes for which we advocate disposal by landfill undergo dispersion and dilution or various forms of degradation within landfill, rendering them effectively harmless. Wastes that could pose long-term potential risks to man or the environment are not normally landfill. Asbestos is one of the exceptions.

Paradoxically, as I shall be agreeing with my hon. Friend, there is some evidence that the nature of even that asbestos waste is slowly changed for the better within landfills that also accept domestic and similar waste. It is due to the reaction of the leachate generated within those co-disposal landfills. However, those mechanisms are normally afforded only limited opportunity to work because asbestos waste has to be sealed in plastic bags to protect handlers. Therefore, the only benefit of the leachates is when the bags are broken in the landfill, which we do not want to happen.

The hazardous waste inspectorate has recently looked in detail at the practices adopted for the landfill disposal of asbestos and it reports that the main problem is the bursting of some bags during handling. There is a contradiction; there may be some degradation of asbestos through natural processes, but only in a way which conflicts with the manner in which it must be disposed of to ensure the safety of handlers.

The only environmental impact of any significance is the long-term hazardous potential of the waste within the landfill. That can be minimised by the proper recording of deposits, as required under the special waste regulations. All deposits have to be at suitable licensed sites, which are operated according to the licence conditions and the requirements of the Health and Safety Executive. However, the overall conclusion is that there are some drawbacks to the landfilling of asbestos waste and suitable alternative procedures are to be welcomed.

My Department is funding some research work at Harwell on the detoxification of asbestos waste. Preliminary results demonstrate its technical feasibility and work is being carried out to determine optimum conditions and operating factors. My hon. Friend asked whether we should now require detoxification before disposal. We cannot yet make a decision on that, but, in the light of progress on the various alternative procedures and the research work, we shall bear that in mind as a requirement for the future.

We understand that some alternative methods are available for the processing of asbestos waste prior to landfill. These mainly involve the conversion of the waste into a hard solid material, using a variety of bonding agents, some of which my hon. Friend referred to.

The WARD system — waste asbestos removal in drums—has recently been developed and has been used, or is being used, at some power stations. It consists of compressing asbestos waste inside steel drums and adding a bonding agent to make the waste a solid block within each drum.

Some other fixation processes, including Sealosafe and Chemfix, have been tried, but technical and economic reasons have prevented their wider use. They involve mixing asbestos waste with cement and a bonding agent such as pulverised fuel ash. A hard solid block results.

An older version, or forerunner, of the WARD system was called Black's blocking process. It involved compacting the asbestos waste after the addition of a bonding agent. The resulting hard block was wrapped in thick plastic sheeting, sealed and labelled before disposal by burial. Another method for disposal involves turning the waste into a slurry with water in a closed skip and depositing it in a disposal site.

As my hon. Friend rightly said, those approaches represent a different type of solution to the problem and, in one sense, a less complete solution than the KTG process which results in the waste being destroyed. I am happy to confirm that the company won a pollution abatement technology award under an admirable scheme set up under the impetus of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) when he was a Minister at the Department of the Environment. I had the pleasure of signing the certificate sent to KTG in recognition of its achievement.

Everything now comes down to differing assessments of the economics of the process. I am still receiving some conflicting advice and some conflicting reports, including some from the CEGB, about the cost of the bagging and disposal of asbestos waste from power stations. I am not sure that the board would accept the figure that my hon. Friend gave.

Nevertheless, there is bound to be some uncertainty, because we are scaling up processes that have been operated on a pilot basis, and we would hope for economies of scale. Recent trials, as I understand it, have been at half a tonne per day, and I understand that they may need to be scaled by at least 10 times. My hon. Friend said 20 times.

Mr. Chapman: I think that if the plant were put in on a site and there was 50 per cent. utilisation instead of 100 per cent. it would be about as expensive as the conventional method. So there is clearly a graph of costs.

Mr. Waldegrave: That must be so. My Department would welcome further information on and assessment of the commercial viability, on which the speed of introduction of the process at least is bound to turn.

On the question of relative health hazards, it seems clear that these must be considerably less in the case of the Vitrifix process compared with all the operations leading up to landfill with a remaining asbestos waste of some kind. I understand, however, from the Health and Safety Executive that it too feels that it has insufficient information at present as to the likelihood of dust being involved in the process. No doubt this point can be considered further between the HSE and the company. It is an important point in assessing worker exposure during the process.

As I understand it, the economics of the Vitrifix process turn rather crucially on the cost of electricity because it is an energy-intensive process, as any high-temperature furnace process is bound to be. Therefore, as with many processed chemical industrial operations, it will depend on the loading of the process — whether it can be kept going—and on the cost of electricity.

I think that the KTG process is a very positive step and that my hon. Friend is indeed right to draw the attention of the House to it. My Department would welcome close consultation with and further information from the company, as would the HSE. Without going too far—and I hope that I shall not be in any way misinterpreted —I think that it would be a helpful development if one of the disposal authorities which has a large amount of asbestos to dispose of would consider taking seriously tenders from Vitrifix so that we can move to the next stage.

Obviously, that must be a matter for the decision of the authority or company involved, but from my Department's point of view it would be very interesting to see a bigger plant work so that we could assess it. The Department will be delighted to do anything it can — either itself or through the hazardous waste inspectorate—in the way of facilitating the transfer of information or ironing out any misunderstandings.

I end as I began by thanking my hon. Friend for raising the matter and congratulating the KTG people on the invention of the process, which has already been acknowledged by the entirely justified PAT award. I hope that over the next few years we may come to see that my hon. Friend is right in saying that this is a breakthrough in terms not only of the safe disposal of hazardous wastes but of British industrial achievement.

Rate-capped Authorities (Government Policy)

2.21 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): It is unfortunate, to put it mildly, that the House should have to be debating the issue of rate capping on the day on which it rises for Easter. The depths to which relationships between central and local government have fallen over the last six years are unprecedented. They have fallen, quite simply, because of the way in which the Government have sought continuously, year after year, to force local authorities to make cuts in their services and make staff redundant, compelling them to pass on the cuts in Government expenditure to local welfare services. Indeed, the Government have forced them to question the democratic basis on which they were first elected.

I will give a simple example of this. Six years ago—and indeed in 1982—the local authority in the area I represent, Islington, was able to elect its local council on a very clear manifesto which the council was quite able to carry out. Now, because of successive losses of grant from central Government and successive attacks on that local authority by central Government, the position is that if the grant were restored to the level it was in 1979 the ratepayers of Islington would this year be facing a very large rate reduction. Instead, they are faced with the dreadful choice of making cuts in their services and having losses of jobs or standing firm against the Government and trying to get some money back to maintain local services in Islington.

We now have a position in which a large number of local authorities have not set a rate for the financial year which has just begun. These include Camden, Greenwich, Hackney, Haringey, Islington, Lambeth, Lewisham, Southwark and Sheffield. It is no accident that those boroughs figure very high on the list provided by the Department of the Environment of the poorest communities in this country. Indeed, Hackney is Britain's poorest borough bar none.

There are also three authorities that have not set a rate this year because of the amount of money that has been taken away from them by central Government policy. They are Liverpool, Tower Hamlets and Newham. For those authorities upon which the Government have imposed rate capping, the cuts this year total £452 million. The Government want those authorities to make cuts in their services.

Those councils are being told to cut 12·3 per cent. of their budgets as between last year and this year. They have all considered the position very carefully. However, they have been placed in an impossible position. They wish to maintain their services, to keep faith with the people who elected them and to stick to the manifestos that they put before the people in 1982, but because of Government policy their wishes are being frustrated. The Government are trying to take away their opportunity to maintain services and to fulfil their manifesto commitments. Consequently, those authorities have not set a rate. Instead, they have asked central Government to return the grant that has been taken away from them in successive years since 1979. In London as a whole, the loss of grant to local authorities since 1979 amounts to more than £3 billion. More than £500 for every person living in London has been taken away through loss of grant, cuts in services or increased rates to compensate for the loss of grant.

I shall outline briefly the situation facing my borough, Islington. The loss of grant this year, and the Government's decision affecting the council's budget this year, mean that the Government are saying that Islington's services can exist this year on £86·9 million. But the figure that the council gives, which is a minimal figure that does not go any way towards meeting many of the needs of the poorest people in the borough, is £94 million. Thus, there is a difference of 8·2 per cent.

If Conservative Members were councillors in Islington, Hackney or any of the other rate-capped areas, what would they do? Would they sit in the council chamber and calmly destroy those jobs, services and communities, or would they say, "No, our job is to speak up for the people of this borough and to obtain the resources that we need and deserve from central Government in order to do something about the appalling poverty, much of which is created by the Government's other policies."?

It has been calculated that if the borough council which I represent wished to carry out the Government's policies, 750 jobs would go this year. Those job losses would include those working on meals on wheels, those working as home helps and street sweepers, as well as those working in libraries. Indeed, every council department would be affected in some way by those job losses, and everyone in the borough would be affected by the loss of those services.

Where is the logic in sacking a home help, a meals on wheels worker or a street sweeper so that people can walk through filthy streets or see elderly people living alone, prisoners in their own homes because of the lack of social services? The same sort of logic is applied by the Government in every other area.

The borough of Hackney is just across the border from us. On any criteria, it is Britain's poorest borough. The loss of 12·9 per cent. of its budget this year is appalling even to contemplate. In Lambeth, 2,000 jobs at least would be lost if rate capping were carried out. In Southwark, 1,500 jobs would go. There would be carnage throughout London, Sheffield and the other areas affected if rate capping were carried out.

I am sponsored by a public service trade union, the National Union of Public Employees. Members of my union work largely for health authorities and local authorities. They work in all the difficult jobs at the sharp end. They deliver meals on wheels, sweep the streets, and collect dustbins. They do some of the most unpleasant, least glamorous but most important local government jobs. In the rate-capped authorities all those members' jobs are under threat. They ask what the logic can be of getting rid of their jobs, destroying their livelihoods and their hopes for the future when we all know that the work needs to be one, and when they are being threatened with privatisation and the loss of jobs to private enterprise companies. The sole motive of such companies in coming into those areas is not to help the poorest people but to make the fastest buck.

We have now come to the position where large numbers or local authorities have so far refused to set a rate for the forthcoming financial year. They have done so because they realise that, first, it is impossible for them to meet the cuts on which the Government are insisting, and secondly that, implicit in the Government's policy towards local government, is an attack on democracy itself. This has wider implications. That attack goes back to 1979, when the Government started asking for cuts in local government spending. Then they went on to telling, then they introduced the concept of a penalty clause, and then the concept of what the totals of expenditure of any one authority should be. Finally, in 1985-86, the Government are announcing what level of spending there has to be in selected local authorities.

If local authorities accept rate-capping limits, they are mortgaging the future, because next year the limits will be tighter, and the year after that even more so. It is not difficult for the Secretary of State for the Environment to come to the House, propose a change in the order and use the payroll vote to get it through. Rate capping can then suddenly affect not just a limited number of authorities in England, and all authorities in Scotland. It can quickly be spread to every local authority.

It is important for people to realise what the Government are doing in attacking democracy and taking finance away from inner city local authorities. People should also recognise that the implications of this run very deep. There is enormous support for the stance being taken by rate-capped authorities. I have never seen such large numbers of people demonstrating outside town halls as I have in the past few weeks, not in opposition to those local authorities but in support of them. I have probably been to more demonstrations than most people and I have never seen such support for local authorities — normally, people are critical of them. There is a turn-round in feeling and opinion, and the Government will rue the day that they introduced rate capping because of what it has done to the local authorities that are trying to provide services.

Yesterday, we saw an even more sinister movement. A judgment was made against the London borough of Hackney, in which the judge announced that there is a certain date by which the council must comply and set a rate. Thus, that judge has announced that he will invalidate the decision of two council meetings—two meetings of elected councillors carrying out a manifesto, who made a decision with the massive support of the people of that borough.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): Will my hon. Friend accept that the judge was decidedly uneasy about making that judgment, and made it clear that he did not like the idea of the Government putting the law courts in this invidious position because it is not a matter for the courts?

Mr. Corbyn: It is true that many people do not like the way in which the Government are putting them in an invidious position through their policies, when the Government do not have the guts to stand up and say what they mean and what they want doing about the crisis in local government.

Rate capping means the loss of money, and grants, and of control by locally elected councillors. It also means that, in the long run, the principle of the relationship between central and local government being one of partnership is thrown away, possibly for ever, but at least for as long as the present Secretary of State for the Environment and Government are in office. Instead of that partnership, there will be a dictatorial Government.

Why has the Minister refused so far to meet the leaders of the rate-capped authorities that would not set a rate? Secondly, why is he apparently refusing to meet the TUC, at its request, for a discussion about the crisis facing local government? When does he propose to meet the TUC, and when does he propose to make a statement to the House on this matter?

The issues of local government run far and wide. There are implications for every local authority in what is happening. The headless chicken atmosphere which surrounded the Government last weekend when they were running scared before the Scottish ratepayers will be repeated soon in England and Wales unless the Government are prepared to understand what is happening in the inner city areas and to mend their ways.

Yesterday the Secretary of State announced that he intended to claw back a further £123 million, mainly from county local authorities. That is a disgraceful decision. Fortunately the people living in the county areas will have an opportunity next month to vote in elections. They will vote solidly against central Government policies. They will vote against the anti-democratic nature and thrust of central Government in their relations with local government.

The Government will rue the day that they introduced the rates legislation. They will rue the day that they listed the rate-capped authorities and tried to take control of local government. Their policies will hit them back—slap in the face.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) for allowing me to intervene before the Minister replies to the debate. My hon. Friend and I have worked closely together with the London borough of Islington in defence of jobs and services in our area. I am pleased and proud to stand here today to support the actions of Islington council in defence of the people of the borough.

Last year when the Rates Bill was making its way through the House and when, night after night, we debated these matters in Committee, we warned the Government about the consequences of their actions. We are now beginning to see the fruits of those actions.

The way in which the Government have responded in the last few weeks has been particularly disgraceful. Because of the withdrawal of rate support grant, the operation of penalties, the rate limits imposed upon local authorities and because of concern for the people, authorities unable to set a rate have approached the Government through the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and the London Boroughs Association. The Government have refused to meet them for discussions. That is not a reasonable response. It displays a vindictiveness towards the authorities and the people that we have come to expect from this Government.

The same Government refused, in a similar vindictive manner, to meet the executive of the National Union of Mineworkers when it offered discussions without preconditions. The Government are now displaying the same vindictive and arrogant attitude towards certain authorities.

I have discussed the rate- capping issue with many of my constituents in the past few weeks. On behalf of my constituents and of the borough which represents them, I ask the Government to consider seriously whether, after all, they are prepared to sit down and have reasonable and responsible discussions. If they are not prepared to do that, they will stand condemned for the chaos and vindictiveness they are imposing on the people in the inner city areas.

2.39 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): The hon. Members for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) and for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) are well known for their opposition to the policy of rate limitation. A good deal of what we have heard today we have heard before. The hon. Member for Islington, North said that it was a pity that we were debating this matter on the last day of the Session. His hon. Friend put him right on that because we debated this matter throughout the larger part of last year. We have certainly had prolonged sessions in Committee and susequently.

Islington's budget for 1984-85 was more than £86 million. That represents an increase of more than 24 per cent. on the amount it spent in 1983-84. In that year, Islington exceeded its expenditure target by only 0·5 per cent. and incurred a mere £60,000 holdback of block grant. In 1984-85, by increasing its spending—without any regard to the consequences—by more than 24 per cent., it is exceeding its target by 22 per cent. and has incurred very significant holdback of £17·5 million. Indeed, it has forfeited all its grant and the rates have increased by 29·6 per cent. If it had spent at target, the rates could have fallen by almost the same amount.

The hon. Member for Islington, North spoke of the new announcement by the Secretary of State about grants for counties. That is a good line for the Opposition in the run-up to the county elections. I am astonished that John Carvel, one of the few local authority correspondents who actually understands local government finance, should, for the first time in his history, behave rather like what he would describe as someone from a less distinguished and more tabloid newspaper.

There is nothing surprising about the close-ending of grant. It happens every year and depends on whether there is an overspend—it usually reflects the overspend or underspend in large authorities. Every county treasurer will have been expecting that announcement and will have taken it into account in his budget. I do not blame John Carvel because I suspect that he did not write the headline, as though it was a great news story.

Islington ratepayers have seen the local rate increase from 59p in 1982-83 to 122·74p in 1984-85, an increase of 108 per cent. Moreover, in the past two and a half years Islington has increased its manpower by more than 9 per cent.

Against that background, the rate limit which the House approved for Islington is eminently reasonable. It is 112·07p. That represents a reduction of 8·7 per cent. on the 1984-85 poundage. It is intended to enable the council to spend this year at the same level in cash terms as its 1984-85 budget. I can see no possible cause for complaint. Indeed, Islington councillors also apparently have no cause for complaint. If they were dissatisfied with the proposed rate limit which the Secretary of State announced on 11 December they had the opportunity to make representations and seek agreement to a higher limit. They did make a point about their estimated penny rate product for 1985-86, and the rate limit takes account of that point. But they have made no representations to us of the devastating cuts they now allege.

Indeed, I am not surprised that we have not heard any official talk of devastating cuts from Islington, because the scope for sensible pruning there is so great. That is what I am told by the journalists of Time Out, not a Government publication, which carried an interesting little piece last month. I shall just read it to the House. It stated:

"In these times of financial cutbacks and economic hardship, it is astonishing to discover Islington Council squandering £1·6 million of rate-payers' money tarting up its offices in the town hall. Not only were they perfectly adequate to begin with, but the work is being carried out using the most expensive wood on the market—American oak. Brand new office partitions are being put in, all covered in beautiful and costly hessian."—[Interruption.] I know that hon. Members do not like to hear things that do not fit in with their preconceptions, but it might do them some good to listen. The article continued:

"And rows of perfectly serviceable, custom made oak lockers have been smashed up and ripped out to make way for made-to-measure replacement. Admittedly, part of this hideous extravagance includes the cost of facilities being put in for the disabled."

Mr. Chris Smith rose——

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman must wait until I have finished the quotation from a magazine which, I have no doubt, if it had said something that suited the hon. Gentleman, he would have quoted in the House with the utmost approval.

"Which is splendid news for any disabled person working in, or visiting the town hall in future, provided he or she doesn't suffer severe damage negotiating Islington's neglected streets while getting there. If this is the kind of thing rate-capping is supposed to prevent, no wonder the local authorities on the hit list don't like it."

Mr. Chris Smith: I am surprised at the Minister using that quotation, because it was produced by his right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government at a dinner held by the Islington chamber of commerce but three weeks ago. There is a wholly inaccurate representation in the article about the replacement of the heating system at Islington town hall and a wholly inaccurate figure and description of the work involved. His right hon. Friend was put right on that matter by the leader of Islington council. I am surprised that there has been no liaison between the Minister and his right hon. Friend.

Mr. Waldegrave: The contradiction of the story was not convincing. We are told by Opposition Members that there is no waste anywhere in Islington council, that it is, extraordinarily, a perfect council and that nothing could be done better by any other authority. Opposition Members argue that Time Out was well off the mark, as are Ministers, journalists and all others who criticise Islington council on any occasion.

Mr. Corbyn rose——

Mr. Waldegrave: I will not give way. The hon. Gentleman had an opportunity to address the House.

Islington and the other rate-limited authorities should have responded to rate capping by reducing that sort of waste. Instead, they have been demanding the return of the block grant which, they say, we have "stolen" from them. That argument is spurious, and they know it. The Labour party started to cut the grant in 1975-76. There is nothing sacrosanct about the 61 per cent. grant rate that we inherited.

We do not consider these councils entitled to put their municipal fingers in the taxpayers' pockets to fund their spending sprees. If they had spent in line with their targets, rate increases would have been modest. The example of other responsible authorities show what can be done. Rate increases by councils such as Islington are due overwhelmingly to the spending decisions of those councils, in full knowledge of the consequences for their grants and for the ratepayers.

Let us consider what has been happening. We had something called "Democracy Day," when all of these councils were going to demonstrate their opposition to the Government in what they said would be "an impressive show of unity." Unfortunately, that unity did not work —as usual in the Labour party—and south Yorkshire, ILEA and Merseyside took the opportunity of "Democracy Day" to fix precepts at or below the maximum limit that we had set. They were joined by Basildon.

What happened three days later? Reference has been made to a headless chicken. If one wanted a scene that was reminiscent of a number of headless chickens running about, it would have been the setting of the GLC rate, a scene which hardly enhanced the relatively low reputation of London's Labour leaders. The GLC decided to set its precept nearly 3p below the limit that we had set.

The decisions of those authorities came as no surprise to us. But they must have come as a bit of a shock to their ratepayers, who had been pounded with propaganda telling them that rate capping would decimate jobs and services. Indeed, many of those ratepayers must be asking why so much of their money was spent giving them totally misleading information about the effects of our policies.

The remaining authorities passed motions that no rate would be set. But as some of their friends in the upper tier authorities were quick to point out, they knew that they could postpone making a rate without immediate legal consequences. Indeed, the resolutions that they passed were carefully worded, all with expensive legal advice, to avoid legal consequences.

Last week, many of the authorities met again to discuss their rates. This time common sense broke out in Leicester and in Thamesdown, where legal rates were set. The remaining nine authorities—only half of the 18 in the original show of unity—again passed carefully worded resolutions not to make a rate. A good example was the resolution passed by Hackney council, which resolved to defer a rate-making decision while

"re-affirming its commitment to set a legal and practical rate in due course."

These councils have tried to justify their decisions to defer making rates by arguing that they were about to start negotiating with the Government—the usual story. First, they were going to have collective discussions with us. But my right hon. Friend made it clear in his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Rippon (Mr. Watson) on 14 March that there would be no negotiations on that basis.

Then they claimed that discussions were about to start through the AMA and ALA, even though my right hon. Friend wrote to Mr. Layden and Mrs. Hodge in terms which made it clear that the time for discussion of the Rates Act, the rate limits he had set and the rate support grant settlement for 1985-86 had passed.

The truth, as we have made abundantly clear, is that there will be no negotiations. The time for negotiation has passed, and the councils' anxiety to talk to us is in marked contrast to their reluctance to do so when they had the opportunity. Moreover, even if there were still time for those councils to make approaches, the demands that they are making would hardly form the basis of a realistic agenda.

They have been asking us to withdraw the Rates Act and to re-write the rate support grant settlement so that we could pay them substantial sums of money. They have asked for all their so-called "lost grant" back. They have deliberately made demands which they know to be unreasonable in an effort to make us appear inflexible and intransigent. If there was any doubt about that, the leaked "Blunkett report" made it clear that that was the objective.

Mr. Sedgemore: Is the hon. Gentleman really saying that there will be no negotiations, or is he saying that their might be negotiations if the terms are changed? Is he saying, before Britain's poorest borough goes back to court in a week's time, that the Government are adamantly refusing to negotiate with Hackney borough council?

Mr. Waldegrave: I make it absolutely clear that there will be no negotiations. If the council argues in court, on the advice of its lawyers, that it is waiting to set a rate because the negotiations are in train, that would not be true.

Referring to the prospect of non-existent negotiations on an unrealistic agenda as the reason for not making a rate is a very dangerous game to play. These councils know that, if they persist in their totally unjustified posturing, the consequences could be severe. If councillors are responsible for a loss to the council that is judged to be due to their own wilful misconduct, they can be surcharged; and if the loss amounts to more than £2,000, they will automatically be disqualified from holding office as councillors. If they are bankrupted, they would be precluded from standing for Parliament. For some of these people, that may be a telling consideration.

One hopes that councillors will be equally, if not more, concerned about the consequences for the areas that they are supposed to serve. Council employees will probably be the first to suffer. They will not be paid. Some of the more extreme shop stewards may be prepared to put up with that, but I am not sure that the same will be true of their members. Anyway, why should they go without pay in order to bolster the political aspirations of these militants? The councils' clients will begin to feel the effects. Of course, those who need the services most, the very people whom these councils claim to be protecting, would suffer first and suffer most.

It is the duty of all these councils to make a legal rate without further delay. It was helpful of the hon. Member for Islington, North to give me the opportunity to put that point clearly on the record. That is the view of Mr. Justice Woolf, who yesterday ruled that there were "no reasonable grounds" for Hackney's decision to defer setting a rate. It seems to be the view also of the hon. Gentleman's party, which decided yesterday, by a two to one majority, that it would not support councils that refused to set rates. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman backed another loser in this matter.

Let me end by referring to a letter sent, at ratepayers' expense, to the unfortunate ratepayers of Southwark. The letter advises the member to continue paying rates at this year's level. The council has told its ratepayers that it is "negotiating with the Government", which, as I have explained, is totally untrue. The council has not told its ratepayers that last year's borough rate is 25 per cent., or almost 37p in the pound, higher than the limit that we have set the council. I say to the ratepayers of Southwark, "You have no obligation whatsoever to pay any rate until a rate has been set legally for the current year." Last year's rate cannot be a legal rate in Southwark, and this year's rate will be considerably lower.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Islington, North for giving me the opportunity to put some of these matters clearly on the record. I have every hope and every confidence that these councils will shortly set legal rates because they, like the others, recognise the position in which they find themselves.

Teaching (Pay Dispute)

2.53 pm

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): In my maiden speech nearly six years ago, I said that I was a member of the greatest profession—teaching. I hold to the view that the teaching profession is the greatest profession. The time has come for the House to face the consequences and the effects of the current teachers' strike. I invite my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to respond to my points on the important issue of the teachers' pay dispute.

I was a teacher for 23 years and for seven years was in charge of a large mixed school of more than 2,000 students. Millions of pupil learning days have already been lost because of the current wave of teachers' strikes. The schools affected include special schools. I know of two schools for maladjusted children and another school for educationally subnormal children that were recently closed for three days. It is public knowledge that hundreds of schools have been closed for three days, and sometimes more, with a consequential loss of education for our children. It is a very serious matter.

Before we break up for our Easter recess, it is important to consider the schoolchildren who have just broken up for their Easter holidays. However, whereas we can be sure, when we come back from our welcome break, that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will be seated where you are in your Chair to keep us in good order and to teach us good order, the children can be far less certain that their teachers will be in front of the class to teach them. Between now and then there will have been the Easter conferences of the major teacher unions. I still hope that new thinking will prevail at those conferences. A few hot-heads, claiming to represent all the teachers—which they do not—may seek to step up their disruptive campaign.

There is strong pressure among some teachers on their coleagues not to supervise the examinations that the children will be taking in the spring and summer, and not to continue to prepare them for those examinations. It is a very serious matter and I cannot believe that teachers will do it. If they do, the effect will be to damage those children for life in a massive way, and I do not think that such action could possibly be justified. I appeal to members of the teaching profession not in any circumstances to do such a thing, and to put the children first, as they have always done traditionally.

It needs to be said loud and clear that the purpose of a few teachers seems to be to damage the education of our children. From my experience, most people are genuinely and deeply upset at what is happening. It is the purpose of the hot-heads to disrupt the smooth running of the schools. It is their purpose to cause lessons to be cancelled and to see schools close altogether for several days a week. If they succeed in furthering their efforts, they will deeply damage the education of the children in those schools. Indeed, I suppose that unless they can damage and disrupt our children's education, there is no point in their taking the action. If the withdrawal of good will and of cover for absent colleagues and walking out from classes had no effect, no one would take any notice, so one has to see the rationale of the situation from that point of view.

Therefore, it is totally disingenuous of some teachers' leaders to claim that it is not the intention of the teachers to harm the children by the strike. By definition, children are deeply damaged by those actions. Some will never recover in their lives. We must face that possibility, and so must my former colleagues in the profession.

All teachers must be professionals first and last, as most are. They must put the children's education first and last. That is what is involved in a professional approach to education. The teacher must be a professional first and last. As I said earlier, in my view it is the greatest profession of all, and that must be the teachers' approach.

My first point, which I cannot emphasise too strongly, is that, no matter how justified the teachers' pay claim may be, and no matter how annoyed, provoked, angry or lacking in morale they may be as professional people—or would-be professional people — there can be no justification for strike action or any other form of disruptive action. It is totally wrong in principle.

My memories of teaching go back a long way. I remember in 1965 the teachers' strike at the William Penn comprehensive school in south London. It was then a school of about 1,100 boys. Twenty-five very fine schoolmasters walked out for a one-day strike. They were members of the National Association of Schoolmasters, which was not represented on the Burnham committee and did not seem to be able to achieve representation on that committee. The strike was intended to force that representation, and it achieved it. At the time, that action seemed to have much justification. It was taken by dignified men. Looking back, I believe that it was the thin end of a wedge, which has led to the present wave of strikes, with all the damage to our children.

I cannot emphasise my first point too strongly. However justified the teacher's pay claim might be, no matter how annoyed, provoked, angry or lacking in morale they might be as professional or would-be professional people, there can be no justification for strike action or for any other form of disruptive action which damages the children. It is wrong in principle.

We have heard many protests from the Labour party and the alliance whose members have been clamouring to support the teachers in their claim for higher salaries. Many have said inside and outside the House that we have to go back to the Houghton award of 1974 and achieve such a standard again. I was a teacher at that time, and was paid that award. I remember it well. I also remember very well that it was eroded under the Labour Government. The Lib-Lab pact also occurred between 1974 and 1979. I do not wish to be tendentious, but it seems to me to be the deepest hypocrisy for the Labour party and the alliance to say that they have supported the Houghton level of salaries when under their leadership that level was eroded. Since the Conservative Government came to power in 1979, the level of teachers' pay has improved by 9 per cent. in real terms——

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Greenway: I am sorry, but I shall not give way.

If teachers' salaries have improved by 9 per cent. under the Government, no one can be complacent about that because basically it is not good enough. However, at least it is reasonable for the Government to say, "That erosion did not take place under our Administration. It happened under the Labour Government." We challenge the hypocrisy of the Labour party when it tries to wriggle away from that fact. That must be said, but I do not say it in a tendentious spirit because I wish teachers' salaries to be improved — they need to be. However, I question whether the local authorities and the Government will find an extra 12 per cent. this year. I wonder whether the teachers have set out on a realistic quest in seeking such an improvement.

The teachers are only too well aware of that fact. The ordinary classroom teacher, who is the backbone of the profession, knows only too well that the present disruptive action will not lead to a vastly greater amount of money, and many have told me so themselves. Perhaps that is why their morale is at a low ebb. Their own leaders are asking them to take action that they know is unprofessional. It is counter-productive in achieving the end that they seek, which is more pay. Unfortunately, the public are alienated. It is sad to see a great profession less loved by the public, by parents and by children — and that is suggested by the response of some members of the public — than it traditionally has been. There is no greater example of the profession than yourself, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You were a veritable Mr. Chips in your day and gave a great deal to the profession.

Even if the teachers' action is not stepped up, it is wrong in principle and in practice. I say that sincerely. I realise that teachers have a right to protest and must find some way of expressing their feelings, but striking is not the way.

What is the answer? I appreciate that it is unlikely that my hon. Friend will be able to give me many answers today. He will not be likely to say anything that might rock the boat in the present attempt to start the negotiations again. I hope that the negotiations will be successful. They need to be. A settlement of this terrible situation is keenly sought by us all. My hon. Friend may be able to do little more than rehearse the arguments and outline the current situation once more. However, I hope that he will be able to say something.

I should like to voice some of the things that many teachers are thinking and saying. I was a teacher in London, which is not always the easiest of assignments. I know how very hard a teacher has to work and how inadequate is the financial reward that most teachers receive. One must bear that clearly in mind. It is essential that teachers should be paid at a level that enables them to have the self-respect to which they are entitled as professional people, especially if they renounce the right to strike because of the damage that it does, although their rate of pay should not be ruinous to the ratepayers and the taxpayers.

We should start by conceding that there is some merit in the teachers' case; there is no question about that. In particular, there should be more pay for the good teacher at the chalk face who, in my experience, has always been under-rewarded. It is difficult adequately to reward the good teacher while not overpaying the terrible ones — and there are a few terrible teachers, too.

The problem has faced successive Governments and successive local government employers. Even if one considered that starting pay at present was not too unreasonable, pay stays at that level for far too long. It takes far too long to reach the higher levels, and those levels are not high enough when they are reached. No recognition is afforded either to the quality of teaching or to the scarcity value of the teacher. In short, the salary structure seems to be all wrong. A good middle-aged head of department or senior teacher should enjoy a better salary and a better standard of living than he does at present. Other teachers, too, should enjoy a better standard of living, but the job of head of department or senior teacher is the goal of many teachers. Once the teachers reach that goal, it should represent a proper and better reward. His or her contemporaries at university who now work in other occupations may work no harder or longer — indeed, most will not — but they enjoy a considerably better standard of living. It is extremely unfair.

I believe that the case is mainly for salary restructuring, and perhaps for relating pay to performance. That is the only way of rewarding the extra good teacher. There is probably also a case for employing fewer teachers as rolls fall, but paying those whom we retain a much better salary.

The constant improvement in pupil-teacher ratios, which is now the best ever—the Government can take credit for that — has not been matched by a commensurate improvement in the quality of education. We must have a wide and searching debate about what the ideal pupil-teacher ratio should be. It will vary among teachers, because some teachers could teach 100 children brilliantly while others could not teach one.

The improvement in the pupil-teacher ratio has been expensive in cash terms. Has not the time come to reconsider the matter and perhaps to spend money not on even better pupil-teacher ratios but on better teachers? All this is for negotiation, but how can we have that if one side refuses to negotiate? Unfortunately, the NUT refused the 4 per cent. pay offer. It then refused the offer of arbitration, having fought so hard for arbitration last year. Its representatives walked out of the restructuring talks, but I understand that the union is still interested. It has even refused conciliation, but eventually it must negotiate — if not now, then later. The later that happens, not only will more damage be caused to children, but the teachers will have done more damage to their standing in the public eye.

If the NUT refuses to negotiate, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, the Government may have to impose a solution. If that happens, what are the Government's intentions? Will there be a proper appraisal of teachers' performance? If that is envisaged, we must ensure that such appraisal is conducted not only by headmasters—we do not want a creeps' charter—but by teachers' peers and even their juniors, as well as others. Will the Government consider the relation of pay to performance, and the reward of teachers not just for time served but for their ability to teach? Will they reduce the number of teachers, increase the salaries of more senior staff and toughen the procedures for getting rid of incompetent teachers? Cannot the teacher be better valued in society now on the basis of greater public esteem? Above all, we should reward the good teacher.

The pay dispute must stop sooner or later, and the sooner the better. We need a two or three-year strike-free agreement. The recent habit of striking and withdrawing from voluntary and some professional activities once a year damages children, schools and teachers, and I know well that it is extremely upsetting for them. I hope that sooner rather than later the teachers will get terms that they can accept. If they leave it until later, the negotiations will not go as well. They will attract more odium from an angry public who may have less sympathy in future with any grievances that the teachers may have.

[Mr. Greenway]

I hope that the matter can be settled and that teachers can return to their central place in society. They are respected and loved by children, parents and all members of society for the honest job that they try to do. Let no one forget that it is a great and noble profession.

3.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): I should like to take this opportunity to thank my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) for raising the important issue of the teachers' pay dispute and the effects of their industrial action. The House always listens with a great deal of interest to my hon. Friend's words because of his long experience in the education service. During his six years in the House he has held high office in a number of educational organisations, both within our party and outside. I thank him again for his comments.

I shall deal a little later with the effects of this action on schools, pupils, parents, teachers themselves and society in general, but I should like to begin by setting out some of the background to the negotiations on teachers' pay.

The Remuneration of Teachers Act 1965 provides that the Secretary of State shall constitute one or more committees to consider and make recommendations on teachers' pay. The Burnham primary and secondary committee has therefore been established for the purpose of considering school teachers' pay. The management panel of the committee comprises representatives of the employers—that is, the local education authorities—and of my right hon. Friend. The teachers' panel comprises representatives of the teacher associations. It is for the Secretary of State to make orders to give statutory effect to the committee's agreed recommendations.

Although the Secretary of State's repesentatives have a place within the management panel of the Burnham committee, they do not constitute a majority, and it is not therefore possible for my right hon. Friend, through them, to impose his will upon the management panel. Still less of course is it possible for him to impose his will on the Burnham committee as a whole, since any resolution would need to secure the approval of the teachers' panel. There are those who argue that my right hon. Friend should somehow step in to resolve the dispute. It will I hope be clear from what I have said that that is not open to him. The Burnham committee is a negotiating body and can proceed only by way of agreement between management and teachers.

The present position, as the House will know, is that in response to the teachers' claim for £1,200 for all—putting about 12·5 per cent. on the pay bill — the management made teachers an offer of a 4 per cent. increase. This was rejected. It then offered arbitration. This, too, was rejected. It offered to resume talks on structure reform broken off by the teachers. This was rejected, too. Exploratory meetings between both panels and the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service have taken place, and ACAS is pursuing the prospects for conciliation. We must wait and see how this initiative fares.

In rejecting these various offers, the teachers have said that they want to go back to 1974 and the salary levels established by the Houghton committee. This backward-looking yearning for a "golden age" is misconceived. Let me give the facts. The "level" established in 1974 hardly warrants the word "level". It had already been eroded by 1979. In no small measure this erosion was caused by public sector pay settlements like Houghton which came in a flock at that time. The rest is history — the International Monetary Fund and Labour's pay policy. But history is remembered only selectively and some union leaders would have their members forget everything but the "golden age" and the Houghton "level". I must dispel this illusion and remind the House that inflation in the mid-1970s was running at about 20 per cent. a year. This Government have no intention of returning to that self-perpetuating and self-defeating inflationary spiral. It is not a philosophical question of what a teacher is worth. This Government and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State have the highest regard for the majority of teachers committed and dedicated to their difficult job. It is a question of economics. We cannot go back to paying ourselves more than the nation can afford. I say again, therefore, that the teachers' "back to Houghton" claims are quite unrealistic.

As to the possibility of arbitration, in offering the teachers arbitration, the spokesman for the management panel made it plain that he was doing so because of what the teachers' panel spokesman called the "unbridgeable gap" between the teachers' claim and the management panel's offer. Arbitration is not an ideal solution. The Government have made it plain that they cannot suspend economic laws; no additional resources will be made available to local authorities to finance an arbitral settlement. The fact is that no arbitrator can conjure up resources out of thin air to finance a pay settlement that is beyond the employers' capacity to pay. The teachers do not differ from other employees in this respect. Resources are finite, and what is spent on pay is not available for spending on goods and other services.

My right hon. Friend does not undervalue teachers. He recognises both the importance of the job that they do, and the dedication with which the great majority perform their difficult task. He is well aware of diminished career and promotion opportunities in the wake of falling pupil numbers. Career prospects for capable and effective teachers are much diminished. The present pay and career structure was relevant and appropriate 10 or 20 years ago, but there is a widespread recognition that reform is now needed. That is why my right hon. Friend has consistently encouraged the employers and the teachers to consider together the possibility of structural reform, and he has consistently made clear his willingness to consider any proposals put to him. If he is satisfied of their educational merit, and considers them affordable in present economic circumstances, he has made it plain that he would be prepared to put them to his Cabinet colleagues and seek their support for any necessary additional resources. At the same time, he has emphasised that he cannot guarantee the results.

My right hon. Friend has given the teachers and employers a clear lead on the direction in which he believes reform is necessary. At a time of reduced promotion opportunities, he looks to reforms that would link pay more directly with performance. That does not mean a crude system of payment by results. It means a sensitive and objective assessment of all aspects of teachers' performance with a view to improving teaching quality by means of well-informed and, therefore, more soundly based decisions on induction, in-service training, support and counselling, professional and career development, deployment and promotion. It means greater incentives to achieve good performance and more help and encouragement for those encountering difficulty.

The Secretary of State believes that a reform based on such principles would offer improved rewards, better morale and increased job satisfaction, and, of course, enhanced status and esteem. Together with other policies and initiatives for better schools, which I need not rehearse here, such reform could make a real contribution to higher educational standards in our schools. I know that both sides of the House share that view.

This is not easy and my right hon. Friend has never pretended otherwise. But instead of grappling with the problem, the leaders of the biggest of the unions have taken the teachers out of the structure reform discussions, and led them to disrupt and damage children's education, buoyed up by the false expectations aroused by an unrealistic pay claim. This is an appropriate time, on the eve of the teacher unions' Easter conferences, to urge each and every teacher to recognise the country's economic circumstances, and to look for realistic and affordable solutions — the only ones offering any prospect of success. They will achieve nothing and persuade no one, least of all my right hon. Friend, by their present course of disruption.

My right hon. Friend's concern is above all for the quality of education provided for pupils and improvement in teaching quality can be wholly consistent with the interests of the teachers in better career prospects. Central to the Secretary of State's policies for improved teaching quality is the development of more formal and systematic arrangements for the appraisal of teachers' performance. He hopes that the teachers and employers can negotiate such arrangements into place. He has set aside resources to support research and development in the field. The Department is consulting the unions and the local authorities on how progress on appraisal might be made in the context of the better career development and management of teachers. But my right hon. Friend is acutely aware that, two years after the publication of the White Paper entitled "Teaching Quality", in which the Government set out their commitment to performance appraisal, we are scarcely any nearer agreement. In those circumstances, it is plainly incumbent on him to consider all possible means of securing his objectives. It is against that background that we have announced in the White Paper entitled "Better Schools" our intention to seek power to make regulations on appraisal. Indeed, in that White Paper we have said much that has been warmly welcomed on both sides of the House and in the education service about where we should be in the next decade and after, leading on to the 21st century.

I know that Labour Members have shared our interest and supported the claims and the points made in the White Paper "Better Schools" and have not disagreed about the main thrust of the arguments contained therein. We have been used to receiving the constantly reiterated views that ever more resources are necessary and essential. I am, of course, grateful for any comments that Members of the Opposition may care to make about the policies contained in our White Paper. It must be hard for the Opposition to make a speech condemning what we have done in the past six years and what we intend to do over the next 10 years and more. All I know is that the arguments which they put forward in their speeches both in the House and outside have led us to the view that we are content to receive their support in what we are doing. And of course I am grateful that the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice), who leads the Opposition on these matters, is always fair and even-handed in what he says and what he has to do.

Mr. Radice: The hon. Gentleman is not.

Mr. Dunn: I do take exception to that. The hon. Gentleman knows that I try to understand the points that he makes.

Mr. Radice rose—

Mr. Dunn: No. I have got a lot to say and it is my speech.

I have always listened with care to what the hon. Gentleman has had to say. I think that he represents a more moderate voice on the Opposition Benches and I hope that he will continue for a lot longer in his present role on those Benches—certainly not on these.

My hon. Friend, in moving the motion, has drawn attention to the widespread disruption that is being caused by the teachers' industrial action. Throughout England and Wales hundreds of thousands of children have had their schooling dislocated. Many schools have had to close altogether for up to three days at a time and many more have been unable to provide all their pupils with uninterrupted education. Parents have had their working and domestic arrangements disrupted, as their children have been sent home not only at lunchtimes but for part of the time tabled school day. As so often with industrial action, the hardest hit tend to be those who are worst placed to cope with additional problems—single-parent families, families least able to meet the costs of extra travel for their children and so on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I express the hope that Members and staff will have a quiet and peaceful recess.

It being half past Three o'clock, Mr. Deputy Speaker adjourned the House without Question put till 15 April, pursuant to the Resolution of the House of 26 March.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Forth asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of any change in the level of support within the common agricultural policy for dairy products, cereals, beef and sheepmeat, respectively, which may result from the early entry of Portugal and Spain to the European Economic Community.

Mr. MacGregor: The accession of Portugal and Spain to the European Community will not of itself affect the levels of support for these products under the common agricultural policy.

European Community (Food and Wine Exports)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total volume of European Economic Community exports of food and wine, by category, to the Soviet Union and to Eastern Europe, respectively, in the most recent annual period for which figures are available; and what were the comparable figures in each of the previous 10 years.

Mr. MacGregor: The following tables provide the information requested for the years 1976 to 1983 together with the latest available figures for 1984. Information is not readily available on a consistent basis for years prior to 1976 or for annual periods other than calendar years.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish a table showing the amount of food and wine exported by the European Economic Community to the Soviet Union in the most recent six-month period for which figures are available and the average unit value of these sales, expressed in pound sterling per ton, on the same basis as his reply to the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Terlezki) on 2 February 1984, Official Report, column 319.

European Community (Surplus Foodstuffs)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his reply of 14 March, what is his estimate of the extent to which the £20 million per day spent by the European Economic Community on the storage and dumping of surplus foodstuffs in 1984 will be exceeded or reduced in 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: As the 1985 Community budget has not yet been adopted, it is not possible to give a firm estimate of expenditure this year on commodities in structural surplus.

Farmers (Diversification)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what finance has been allocated to farmers from European Economic Community resources to promote diversification from farming to tourism and other industries; and when these funds will be available for payment.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

THE ARTS

Budget Implications

29. Mr. Freud asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts if he will make a statement on the implications of the Budget for the Arts.

30. Sir David Price asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what effect he estimates the Budget statement of 19 March will have upon the public and private funding of the arts, respectively.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend announced a package of measures to promote employment, which should enable arts bodies to make more productive use of their subsidies.

I believe that the announcement of increased relief at the higher rates of tax for convenants to charities will prove a valuable incentive to private support for the arts.

Arts Council (Administration)

31. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts if the Minister for the Arts will undertake an inquiry into the administration of the Arts Council.

Mr. Waldegrave: No.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authorities (Capital Receipts)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the rules he has imposed constraining the use by local authorities of their capital receipts, new and cumulative, in each year from 1981-82 to 1985-86, most recent arrangements.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 provides for the rate of use by local authorities of capital receipts to be regulated by prescribing what proportion of different classes of receipt may be used to enhance an authority's capital spending permission in any year.

From the coming into force of part VIII of the Act on 1 April 1981, proportions were prescribed for local authorities in England as follows:

—for receipts from the sale of dwellinghouses normally let or available for letting, other than those disposed of on shared ownership terms, 50 per cent.;

—for receipts from the repayment of advances for the acquisition or improvement of a dwellinghouse, 50 per cent.; and —for receipts from the repayment of grants and advances to housing associations, 1 per cent.

From 1 April 1982 the proportion of 50 per cent. was revoked in respect of receipts from the sale of dwellinghouses normally let or available for letting where the dwellinghouse was not held under part V of the Housing Act 1957 or was disposed of under a homesteading agreement.

From 1 April 1983 a proportion of 50 per cent. was prescribed in respect of receipts from the sale of land (including buildings and structures on land) not held under the Housing Acts and of vehicles, vessels, plant, machinery and apparatus; anf from the repayment of grants and advances not made under the Housing Acts.

From 1 April 1984 the proportion of 50 per cent. in respect of receipts from most sales of dwellinghouses and from repayments of advances for the acquisition or improvement of a dwellinghouse was changed to 40 per cent.

From 1 April 1985 that proportion of 40 per cent. becomes 20 per cent. less; the proportion of 50 per cent.

for most non-housing receipts introduced in 1983 becomes 30 per cent.; and a proportion of 30 per cent. is introduced in respect of receipts from the sale of undeveloped housing land and of dwellinghouses normally let or available for letting disposed of on shared ownership terms or under a homesteading agreement.

Authorities will continue to be able to use receipts arising from low-cost home ownership schemes such as building under licence, build for sale and purchase for resale, in full to cover the immediate cost incurred under such schemes. The position remains that no prescribed proportion applies to such receipts. Accordingly, authorities have been and remain free to use such receipts in their entirety in any year to enhance their spending permission.

Where there are prescribed proportions, they apply to receipts accruing in the year in question and to those accumulated in earlier years.

While the rules properly constrain the amounts which authorities may spend, they do not prevent them from applying the cash from capital receipts at any rate they choose for any other purpose to which capital monies may properly be applied, for instance, the repayment of debt, internal lending, or other such purposes.

Environment Ministers Council

Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement about the outcome of the Council of Environment Ministers meeting on 20 March.

Mr. Waldegrave: I led the United Kingdom delegation at this meeting at which the principal item discussed, as on 7 March, was Community action to set new limits for vehicle emissions.

After prolonged discussion, the Council finally agreed in principle to the framework for a new directive which will balance industrial and consumer factors with the need for increased environmental protection. This agreement represents a major improvement on European vehicle emission standards, and will keep open good opportunities for the export of United Kingdom manufactured motor vehicles to the Community.

Each category of vehicle will have standards appropriate to that category. In industrial terms this means that expensive three-way catalytic converter technology may now be required only for large vehicles over 2,000 cc; medium cars (1,400-2,000 cc) will have standards achieveable by simple lean burn technology combined with oxidation catalysts (not three-way catalysts) or comparable cost-effective technology; and present limits for small cars (below 1,400 cc) will be tightened from 1990 as an interim stage before further emission reductions to be agreed in 1987.

It was also agreed that individual member states—such as the Federal Republic of Germany—with serious environmental problems will be able to start a limited incentive scheme from July this year to encourage the voluntary purchase of cars meeting the new limits.

Precise limit values have yet to be settled. The Council decided that this work was to be completed by the end of June. The work as basis for this will go ahead in consultation with technical experts from the motor industry and elsewhere. I am very pleased that a settlement has now been reached which recognises the United Kingdom's concern to balance industrial and consumer factors with the need for increased environmental protection.

I am also pleased that the Council agreed to adopt the directive that provides for the introduction of unleaded petrol in the Community not later than 1989 or earlier if individual member states wish. The Council had agreed this directive, which is the result of a United Kingdom initiative last December, but adoption has been delayed because of the uncertainty over vehicle emissions.

The Council also reached agreement on a directive on containers of liquids for human consumption on terms satisfactory to United Kingdom interests subject to a parliamentary reserve by the United Kingdom. It would in particular avoid discrimination between different types of container systems or packaging. We would expect to implement the directive in the United Kingdom through voluntary arrangements. The measure should help to reduce the environmental impact of used containers, and save energy and raw materials.

Housing

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he proposes to have with representatives of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities about estimates of repair bills in respect of maintenance of pre-first world war dwellings and post-second world war public sector defective properties and about the extent to which repairs undertaken to existing stock have within the restraints of the investment funds allocated to them squeezed out new-build programmes.

Sir George Young: The Department will shortly be asking local authorities to provide detailed estimates of the costs of repair of the houses and flats they own and manage. This will include properties built before 1919 and defective houses and flats built since the last war. The local authorities' associations have been consulted on the conduct of this inquiry. It is for individual authorities to decide how much of their capital resources to devote to repair of the existing stock.

Local Authorities (Housing Revenue)

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish figures setting out expenditure in 1982-83 and 1983-84 on wages and salaries, including pensions, by the housing departments of the local authorities.

Mr. Waldegrave: The available estimates are as follows. The housing revenue account figures are based on budget data supplied by local authorities and converted to estimated outturn prices by the DOE. The non-HRA figures come from local authorities' outturn return.

Local authority housing employee costs England—£ million

	HRA	Non-HRA
1982-83	590	30
1983-84	510	42

Local Authority Expenditure

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the budgeted expenditure increase, current expenditure, in each local authority in each year from 1981-82 to 1984-85, showing the total increase between 1981-82 and 1984-85.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I have today placed a copy of the required tables in the House of Commons Library. These show, for each local authority in England, budgeted current expenditure at outturn prices in each year since 1981-82, percentage changes between individual years and the absolute and percentage changes between 1981-82 and 1984-85.

Lead Shot

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation in the current Session of Parliament to ban the use of lead shot by anglers.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government believe that the use of lead shot by anglers should be phased out voluntarily if at all possible. A review of progress has recently been conducted by the Nature Conservancy Council, whose formal report is awaited. The Government will then consider whether further action is necessary, in the light of that report.

Rivers (Pollution Control)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will detail all those measures that he has (a) undertaken so far and (b) proposes to take to improve river quality.

Mr. Macfarlane: In the last 18 months we have implemented all the main provisions of part II of the Control of Pollution Act 1974, providing a comprehensive statutory framework for the protection of our rivers and coastal waters. The provisions include full public participation in the system for controlling discharges of effluent, a code of good agricultural practice to prevent pollution from agricultural sources, and wide powers to deal with accidental and diffuse pollution. We have also reviewed the policy and procedures for the control of discharges of sewage effluent made by water authorities, set a financial framework which provides for higher investment by those authorities, continued the initiative to clean up the Mersey and made further progress with the implementation of the EEC directives on dangerous substances discharged to the aquatic environment.

For the future it remains the Government's intention to continue our policy to maintain and improve water quality, and in keeping with this a new national survey of rivers and estuaries will be undertaken to help develop programmes for the control of water pollution. This year we will be making regulations providing for the opening, in July, of registers containing details about water quality and discharges of effluent, and announcing proposals for the withdrawal of the exemptions conferred by the Control of Pollution (Exemption of Certain Discharges from Control) Order 1983. In addition, public consultation will be undertaken on proposals for the effective use of the new precautionary measures introduced by part II of the 1974 Act.

Housing Corporation and Housing Associations

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if the Housing Corporation and housing associations in receipt of public funds are expected to observe Government guidelines on pay for public sector employees in reaching pay settlements with their own staff.

Sir George Young: There is no Government guideline on pay for public sector employees. The Government make a pay assumption in their public expenditure plans, but the pay of Housing Corporation employees is determined by analogy with the pay of new town development corporation staff or, for staff of chief officer and above, by analogy with Civil Service rates of pay, and approved by Ministers.

Staff of housing associations are not public sector employees. Their pay is a matter for negotiation between the staff and their employers.

Conservation (Management Agreements)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the management agreements entered into by the Nature Conservancy Council, indicating in each case the acreage covered and the annual and total payments made.

Mr. Waldegrave: This information is being compiled by the NCC. I shall write to the hon. Member very shortly.

Birds of Prey

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the number of inspectors in his Voluntary Inspectorate for inspecting registered keepers of birds of prey.

Mr. Waldegrave: The current number of part time ornithological wildlife inspectors is almost 200.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will detail the cases that came to court in which his Department gave information against registered breeders of birds of prey.

Mr. Waldegrave: 90 witness statements were provided by the Department to enforcement agencies during 1984 but not all these necessarily came to court.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is his estimate of the number of each of the protected raptors;

(2) what is his estimate of each of the protected raptors in England and Wales; and if these numbers are increasing or decreasing.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department does not keep these statistics, but I am advised by the Nature Conservancy Council that the most recent available estimates are:

Raptors	Number	Estimate
Common Buzzard	12,000 pairs	Increasing
Honey Buzzard	4-10 pairs	Stable
Golden Eagle	4-500 pairs	Increasing
Goshawk	70 pairs	Increasing slowly
Marsh harrier	25 pairs	Increasing
Hen harrier	600 pairs	Stable
Montagu's Harrier	2-9 pairs	Decreasing
Hobby	100-180 pairs	Stable
Kestrel	70,000 pairs	Stable
Merlin	3-400 pairs	Decreasing
Peregrine	8-900 pairs	Increasing
Red Kite	46 pairs	Stable
Sparrowhawk	20,000 pairs	Increasing
Osprey	25-30 pairs	Stable

Separate estimates for England, Scotland and Wales are not available.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the number of (a) golden eagles, (b) goshawks, (c) merlins, (d) peregrine falcons and (e) other raptors held by registered breeders;

(2) what is the number of each protected raptors kept by registered keepers in 1984;

(3) how many registered breeders and keepers there are of (a) golden eagle, (b) the goshawk, (c) the merlin, (d) the peregrine falcon and (e) other raptors; and how many of each bird was (i) bred and (ii) kept in 1984.

Mr. Waldegrave: Breeders as such are not registered but the following are the numbers of birds recorded as held by keepers in Great Britain.

	Total kept	Not bred in 1984
(a) Golden Eagle	41	1
(b) Goshawk	473	38
(c) Merlin	153	35
(d) Peregrine	523	43
(e) Other raptors	5,931	888

Separate records are not maintained for England, Scotland and Wales. Data are still being verified from the re-registration period which commenced on 1 September 1984.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many raptors were released into the wild by registered breeders in 1984.

Mr. Waldegrave: The total number of raptors released to the wild in 1984 was 103, of which 29 were captive bred.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the number of prosecutions in the latest period for which figures are available of those charged with robbing the nest of the protected raptors.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 31 January 1985, at column 280.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he now estimates he will have finished his study of local government finance.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I estimate that the studies will be completed towards the end of this year.

Homeless Persons (Voluntary Organisations)

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions the discretionary power under section 13 of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 has been used since the legislation became operative; and how many separate loans, grants or a combination of these have been made.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend and his precedessors have made 56 grants, but no loans, under section 13 of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 since the legislation became operative. It is not known how many grants or loans have been made by local authorities under the same power.

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what amounts of money have been made available to voluntary organisations under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 in each year since the Act became operative.

Sir George Young: The following amounts have been made available by my right hon. Friend and his predecessors:

1977-78	0
1978-79	110
1979-80	168
1980-81	200
1981-82	233
1982-83	307
1983-84	299
1984-85	*266

* As at 28 February 1985.

I have no information on the amounts of money made available by local authorities under this section.

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give a breakdown of the purposes for which money has been advanced under section 13 of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977.

Sir George Young: The grants made under this section by my right hon. Friend and his predecessors have been in respect of the provision of housing aid and advice services. I have no information regarding the purposes for which local authorities give assistance under this section.

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what sums have been received by the Secretary of State in repayment of loans under section 13(9) of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 in each year since its operation.

Sir George Young: No loan has been made under this section by my right hon. Friend or his predecessors.

Litter Act 1983

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what sections of the Litter Act 1983 are in force.

Mr. Waldegrave: All sections of the Litter Act 1983 are in force, with the exception of section 4, which requires local authorities to prepare litter abatement plans. Implementation of section 4 has so far been deferred in view of the need for restraint in public expenditure.

Housing (Hyndburn)

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many houses in Hyndburn are classified as requiring repairs costing more than £7,000, as defined by the English House Condition Survey 1981; and what is the estimated cost of putting these deficiencies to rights;

(2) how many houses in Hyndburn are classified as requiring repairs costing between £2,500 and £7,000, as defined by the English House Condition Survey 1981; and what is the estimated cost of putting these deficiencies to rights;

(3) how many houses in Hyndburn are classified as unfit for habitation as defined by the English House Condition Survey 1981; and what is the estimated cost of putting these deficiencies to rights.

Sir George Young: Estimates are not available at district level corresponding to those for England derived from the detailed inspection of a sample of dwellings in the 1981 House Condition Survey.

Local authorities' 1984 housing investment programme returns included, for 1 April, their estimates of dwellings in their areas in three categories, unfit, fit but lacking basic amenities, and not substandard but requiring more than £3,000 of repairs; copies of these returns are available in the Library. The numbers reported by local authorities are not necessarily comparable as their criteria may differ and in total the figures are not consistent with estimates from the English House Condition Survey.

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to table regulations to give effect to the Building Act 1984.

Mr. Gow: My right hon. Friend hopes to lay new Building Regulations and Building (Approved Inspectors etc.) Regulations in the summer to come into operation before the end of the year.

Nitrates

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many applications he has received from water authorities for permission to exceed the 50mg per litre level of nitrates in public water supplies; how many of these applications he has accepted or rejected; and if any time limits or conditions have been placed on the derogations.

Mr. Macfarlane: Forty-seven applications have been received. No decisions have yet been taken on any of these.

Football

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many football matches the Minister with responsibility for sport has attended since taking office.

Mr. Macfarlane: I shall write to the hon. Member shortly.

Marsham Street (Repairs)

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the cost of the first-aid remedial action on his Department's headquarters building in Marsham street, referred to in his answer of 18 March, Official Report, column 343; and what is the estimated cost of the proposed repairs.

Sir George Young: The cost of remedial work done to date is £18,217·34 plus VAT. Until the consultant's report is available for consideration, it is not possible to estimate the cost of any additional work.

PRIME MINISTER

Official Business

Mr. Gorst asked the Prime Minister how many days, or parts of a day, she has spent outside the United Kingdom on official business during each year since she became Prime Minister; and how many days she expects to have spent outside the United Kingdom during the first quarter of 1985.

The Prime Minister: The information requested is as follows:

	Number of days
1979	30
1980	17
1981	45
1982	33
1983	38
1984	30
1985*	6

* Up to 25 March.

Chief Scientific Adviser

Mr. Boyes asked the Prime Minister what are the role and responsibilities of the Chief Scientific Adviser, Cabinet Office, Sir Robin Nicholson; and whether that responsibility includes giving advice on nuclear affairs.

The Prime Minister: The role and responsibilities of the Chief Scientific Adviser, Cabinet Office, Sir Robin Nicholson, were given in annex A of Cmnd. 8591 at the time when he was Chief Scientist, Central Policy Review Staff. When the Central Policy Review Staff was disbanded in July 1983 I announced that Sir Robin Nicholson would continue as Chief Scientific Adviser, Cabinet Office and continue to advise me and the Secretary of the Cabinet on scientific and technological matters and scientific and technological aspects of other issues which came to me or to the Cabinet Office. This remains the position.

United States Navy

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Prime Minister whether consultations have taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the United States Government on the granting of port facilities in the United Kingdom for United States Navy maritime pre-positioning ships.

The Prime Minister: Consultations take place at regular intervals between Her Majesty's Government and the United States Government on a range of aspects of contingency planning.

It would not be in the public interest to give details of such consultations.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Prime Minister what moneys have been spent on infrastructure and development in the Falklands, excluding defence expenditure, in the financial years 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85; and how much will be spent in the next three financial years.

The Prime Minister: Expenditure on infrastructure and development in the Falkland Islands against commitments of a £15 million rehabilitation grant and a £31 million development aid grant announced in 1982 has been as follows:

1982-83	10·4
1983-84	6·0
1984-85	* 6·6

* Estimate.

Expenditure is likely to continue at about the current level for the next three years.

MI5

Mr. Winnick asked the Prime Minister what is the general policy of Her Majesty's Government concerning the appearance before the Home Affairs Committee of the Director General of MI5; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: As my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House stated in his letter of 27 April 1983 to my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. du Cann), at columns 444-48, there is a long-standing convention under which the Government do not provide information or answer questions in Parliament on matters of security or intelligence, and the Government would regard themselves as bound by that convention in relation to departmental Select Committees, no less than in relation to Parliament itself. In the light of that policy the Government would not consider it appropriate for the Director General or other members of the Security Service to appear before a Select Committee.

Local Revenue

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Prime Minister what consideration Her Majesty's Government are currently giving to new methods of raising local revenue, with particular reference to a poll tax.

The Prime Minister: The local government finance studies are looking at all the main aspects of the present finance system including how total local authority revenues might best be raised. A poll tax is one of a number of options for raising revenue locally.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Crimes of Violence and Vandalism (Convictions)

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of convictions of persons under 18 years for crimes of violence or vandalism in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Mellor: The readily available information relates to offenders aged under 17 years and is published annually in tables S4.1(A) and S4.1(B) of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, supplementary tables, vol. 4".

Government Property (Damage)

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of convictions for damage to Government property in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Mellor: Information collected centrally does not distinguish offences of damaging Government property from other offences of criminal damage. The available information for indictable offences is published annually in table 5.1 of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, 1983" (Cmnd. 9349) and for summary offences in table S4.1(B) of supplementary tables, vol. 4.

Prisoners (Correspondence)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many letters to and from prisoners have been (a) photocopied and (b) retained in each of the last five years; and how many prisoners this has involved.

Mr. Mellor: This information is not available.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is his practice regarding the photocopying of correspondence between prisoners and (a) solicitors, (b) Members of Parliament, (c) probation officers, (d) social workers and (e) members of their family; where such copies are retained; for how long and for what purpose; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if it is with his authority that letters to and from prisoners are photocopied by the prison service and sent to his Department's P5 division.

Mr. Mellor: Under prison rule 33(1) the Secretary of State may, with a view to securing discipline and good order or the prevention of crime or in the interests of any persons, impose restrictions, either generally or in a particular case, upon the communications to be permitted between a prisoner and other persons. Under prison rule 33(3) letters to or from a prisoner may be read or examined. Under rule 37A(1) a prisoner who is a party to legal proceedings may correspond with his legal adviser in connection with the proceedings, and unless the Governor has reason to suppose that any such correspondence contains matter not relating to the proceedings it shall not be read or stopped. It may be necessary for correspondence not protected by rule 37A(1) to be photocopied for these procedures to operate effectively, or for the prevention of crime or in the interests of any persons, particularly where questions of national security arise; and his specific authority is not required for that. In such cases the photocopies would be held at establishements or elsewhere for so long as necessary and would be destroyed when they were no longer needed.

Victim Support Schemes (Funding)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received representations from individuals and organisations concerning his Department's funding to victim support schemes.

Mr. Mellor: The Home Office has received some 60 letters from hon. Members and a number from victims' support schemes and others supporting the recommendations of the Home Affairs Committee concerning the funding of victims' support schemes in its report on compensation and support for victims of crime (HC 43). The Government's reply to the Committee's report was given in a White Paper (Cmnd. 9457) published on 7 March.

Intex 85

Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he proposes to take to encourage local authorities to take part in the warning and monitoring exercise Intex 85.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Intex 85 exercise was held on 16-17 March. The United Kingdom warning and monitoring organisation informed county level authorities of the exercise and invited them to take part; 29 in England and Wales and four in Scotland did so. We are considering what more can be done to encourage local authorities in the future. We are ready to help in any way we can.

Prisoners (Segregation)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners segregated under rule 43 are sharing cells; and how many cells are involved.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not held centrally.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prisoners segregated under rule 43 at Leeds prison are currently sharing cells; and how many cells are involved;

(2) in what ways facilities for work, education, recreation and association are more limited for segregated prisoners at Leeds prison than for the other prisoners.

Mr. Mellor: I will reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the wing in which segregated prisoners are accommodated at Leeds prison is properly separated from other parts of the prison.

Mr. Mellor: The part of the wing at Leeds prison in which prisoners segregated under prison rule 43 for their own protection are located, is physically separated from the rest of the prison.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the wing in which segregated prisoners are accommodated at Leeds prison has facilities for keeping food hot.

Mr. Mellor: A hot plate has been provided in the part of the wing at Leeds prison in which prisoners segregated under prison rule 43 for their own protection are located.

Gloucester Prison

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he plans to re-examine the Chief Inspector of Prisons' recommendation to relocate C wing at Gloucester prison elsewhere.

Mr. Mellor: No.

Murder (Sentencing Recommendations)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many recommendations have been made by judges under section 1(2) of the Murder (Abolition of Death Penalty) Act 1965; and in how many cases prisoners have been released before the minimum period recommended.

Mr. Mellor: In England and Wales, 201 such recommendations were made from 1965 — when the power was introduced—until the end of 1984.

Up until the end of 1984, three life sentence prisoners have been released on life licence at an earlier date than that recommended by the trial judge. In accordance with the provisions of section 61 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, all three prisoners were released on the recommendation of the parole board and after consultation with the Lord Chief Justice and, where he was available, the trial judge.

Prisons (Food Hygiene)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what specific training or qualifications prison medical officers have in relation to their responsibilities for supervising food hygiene standards in prisons.

Mr. Mellor: All medical practitioners receive instruction in general health and hygiene as part of their training. The prison department does not provide further training in these subjects for prison medical officers but those who wish to do so attend external courses.

Cruelty to Animals Act 1876

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the revised White Paper on the amendment of the Cruelty to Animals Act 1876 will be published.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend hopes to publish a further White Paper shortly.

Penal Institutions (Education Classes)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of inmate hours of study in educational classes in penal institutions for both day and evening education classes during 1984, with comparative figures for 1982 and 1983 with the figures for youth custody centres and detention centres, and for earlier years borstal institutions, identified within the totals and in all cases related to the average daily inmate population in the year.

Mr. Mellor: The available information is as follows:

Prisons	33,606	2,088,492	32,302	2,205,120	31,345	2,334,866
Remand Centres	2,893	240,917	3,365	261,165	3,645	307,063
Youth Custody Centres	5,095	1,204,287	6,088	1,120,713	6,821	1,347,802
Detention Centres	2,113	907,922	1,706	815,637	1,485	697,217
Totals	43,707	4,441,618	43,462	4,402,635	43,295	4,886,948

NB. The change from borstal sentences to youth custody sentences took place on 24 May 1983, when Part I of the Criminal Justice Act 1982, was implemented. The figures in the table before and after that date are not directly comparable, because of changes in the designation of accommodation which occurred about that time: in particular most young prisoner centres as well as borstals became youth custody centres.

Featherstone Prison

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of the cells of Her Majesty's prison, Featherstone, near Wolverhampton, are occupied by (a) one inmate, (b) two inmates and (c) three inmates.

Mr. Mellor: On 10 March, no cell was occupied by more than one prisoner. In the short-term open unit, which has rooms not cells, 66 prisoners were sharing two to a room.

Off-sales Licences

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of liquor licensing committees which have issued off-sales licences to petrol stations; and how many such licences were issued in the years 1980 to 1983.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Security Operations

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Seretary of State for the Home Department how long he devoted to reviewing security operations before his announcement on 12 March, Official Report, column 154, that no operation, investigation, surveillance of action against any individual had been carried out without due propriety.

Mr. Brittan: I have a continuing responsibility to satisfy myself that the security service operates entirely within the letter and spirit of its directive. My inquiries into the particular allegations were made in the context of that continuing responsibility, but I do not propose to say more on how they were pursued.

Police (Dental Treatment)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated value, as a percentage of gross salary, of free prescriptions and dental treatment to each grade within the police force for 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Information on the cost of reimbursing National Health Service charges incurred by police officers for medical prescriptions and dental treatment is not recorded centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Diplomatic Immunity

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has, by country of diplomat, of the numbers of persons stopped on suspicion of committing moving traffic offences in respect of whom the police have taken no further action when the person has successfully claimed diplomatic immunity in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The table below sets out, for each of the last five years, the total number of moving traffic offences which are alleged to have been committed by persons who were entitled to diplomatic immunity.

	Number
1981	170
1982	156
1983	190
1984	98

Since none of the alleged offences has resulted in court proceedings, it would be inappropriate to relate them to particular missions.

Women Prisoners

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women were held in prisons in England and Wales for the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, distinguishing between those held on remand and sentenced prisoners.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested will be published shortly in a Home Office statistical bulletin on "The Prison Population in 1984".

Animal Laboratories

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of LD50 tests on animals are carried out without anaesthesia at any stage in Government research laboratories, in university laboratories and in all laboratories; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: This information is not available. LD50 tests, however, are not normally performed under anaesthesia unless an anaesthetic agent is itself the subject of the test. The number of such cases is likely to be small. The purpose of an LD50 test is to determine the toxicity of a particular substance and the administration of an anaesthetic — which is itself toxic — would probably invalidate the result. Even if anaesthetics were compatible with the test, it would be difficult to calculate an appropriate dose because of the unpredictable duration of the test.

The Government welcome and encourage the replacement of LD50 tests by other forms of acute toxicity test wherever possible. In the limited circumstances where it is still necessary to perform LD50 tests, they are carried out under the terms of the Cruelty to Animals Act 1876. The pain condition under the Act requires any animal in severe and enduring pain to be immediately and painlessly killed.

Strip Searches

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many strip searches were made on women prisoners in England and Wales in Her Majesty's prisons for each of the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, distinguishing between prisoners held on remand and sentenced prisoners.

Mr. Mellor: This information is not recorded centrally.

Lynn Barlow

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost to the taxpayer of flying Lynn Barlow and a police officer to Glasgow after her arrest on the support the miners' march in London on 25 February.

Mr. Ancram: I have been asked to reply.

Lynn Barlow was arrested in London after failing to appear at Dumbarton sheriff court on 4 December 1984. I understand from the chief constable of Strathclyde police that the travel costs associated with returning her to Scotland to answer the charges against her totalled £180.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Tourism Policy

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will state the objectives of Her Majesty's Government in tourism policy.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Government's overall objective is to encourage the maximum development and international competitiveness of the United Kingdom as a tourist destination. The Government aim to do this by removing obstacles to tourism and supporting the tourist boards. The vast majority of tourism investment will of course be funded by the private sector, which I hope will increasingly recognise the growth potential of tourism and leisure.

Information Technology (Small Firms)

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will review the problems presented for the development of information technology by the bias in the Alvey programme against the funding of contracts with small companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: Participants in the Alvey programme are selected on their ability to contribute to the research programme, not on their size. In fact, firms of all sizes are active in the programme and so far about 20 small firms are directly involved in approved projects.

Sanitary Ware (Imports)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much Belgian sanitary ware was imported in 1979 and 1983; what proportion of the imports came from the Belgian company Boch SA; whether he has any evidence that Boch SA was given state aid by the Belgian Government on terms contrary to the treaty of Rome; what representations his Department has received about alleged dumping of the Belgian sanitary ware; what action he has taken; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: Imports of sanitary ware from Belgium (and Luxembourg) totalled £175,595 in 1979 and £2,788,706 in 1983. Statistics of imports of the products of individual companies are not easily obtainable.

On 16 February 1983 the European Commission took a formal decision that state aid in the form of the acquisition of a holding amounting to BF 475 million in Boch SA was incompatible with the Common Market within the meaning of article 92 of the EEC treaty and must therefore be withdrawn. On 28 February 1984 the Commission brought an action before the European Court of Justice against Belgium to declare that by not complying within the prescribed period with that decision Belgium had failed to fulfil its obligations under the treaty.

On 24 October 1984 the European Commission took a further formal decision that state aid granted to Boch SA in the form of a subscription of BF 83 million of new capital was incompatible with the Common Market within the meaning of article 92 of the treaty and must therefore be withdrawn. On 11 February 1985 Belgium brought an action before the European Court of Justice against the Commission to have that decision declared void.

My Department has received a number of complaints about imports of subsidised Belgian sanitary ware.

We have repeatedly made clear to the Commission our concern about the distortions of competition resulting from the state aid that has been granted; about its impact on intra-Community trade; and about the adverse effects on United Kingdom producers. I last raised this matter with Commissioner Sutherland on 28 February.

It is wholly unsatisfactory that this aid should have been granted in the first place and that this situation should not yet have been dealt with effectively. We shall continue to press the Commission to bring matters to an early and acceptable conclusion.

EC (Manufactures)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what percentage of the original six European Economic Community members' market for manufactures was provided by the United Kingdom in 1984; and what was the comparable percentage in 1972;

(2) what percentage of the current European Economic Community members' market for manufactures was provided by the United Kingdom in 1984; and what was the comparable percentage in 1972.

Mr. Channon: Information in respect of 1984 is not yet available. The most recent information, which relates to 1983, is as follows:

*United Kingdom share of other European Community members' imports of manufactures

	Original six members per cent.	Current membership per cent.
1972	6·1	7·4

* Standard International Trade Classification sections 5 to 8.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State of Trade and Industry if he will publish a table showing, in respect of each year from 1970 to 1984, the total amount of the United Kingdom's manufactured exports to and imports from the current European Economic Community nations; and if he will publish a further table showing the annual deficits or surpluses in manufacturing trade which these figures produce.

Mr. Channon: The information is in the table.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what study he has made of the consequences for employment in the United Kingdom of the £10 billion deficit in the nation's manufacturing trade with the Common Market.

Mr. Butcher: Developments in trade performance are kept under continual review. The deficit in our balance of trade in manufactured goods with the European Community reflects many inter-related factors, including the pattern of our trade in other goods and with other areas. It is not possible to assess what consequences it may have had for employment.

EC (Steel Industries)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to the percentage reduction in the numbers employed in the steel industries of the various Common Market countries since the Council of Ministers agreed on a plan to reduce and restructure the industry; and if he will make a statement outlining the extent to which the various nations have fulfilled their agreed obligations in this area of policy.

Mr. Channon: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Inner German Trade Agreement

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the principles and operation of the inner German trade agreement; and if he is satisfied that its operation is not injurious to British trade and industry.

Mr. Channon: A protocol on German internal trade and connected problems forms an integral part of the EC treaty. The effect of internal German trade on other member states of the EC is subject to the provisions of this protocol. The protocol provides powers for the member states to take preventative measures should they encounter difficulties arising from such trade.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if any separate record is kept by Her Majesty's Government of the volume of exports from Germany which originate from East Germany and which have tariff and levy free access to the Common Market under the terms of the inner German trade agreement.

Mr. Channon: Her Majesty's Government maintained no records of trade conducted under the inner German trade agreement.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the total value of imports from West Germany and East Germany, respectively, in each of the past 15 years; and how much of the West German total consists of goods which entered the Common Market through the inner German trade agreement.

Mr. Channon: Figures of United Kingdom imports from the Federal Republic of Germany and from the German Democratic Republic are shown in the table. The other information requested is not available.

United Kingdom Imports
£ Million OTS basis

	Federal Republic of Germany	German Democratic Republic
1970	549·5	16·1
1971	647·7	19·6
1972	840·7	21·7
1973	1,352·5	26·4
1974	1,908·7	44·1
1975	2,007·7	38·8
1976	2,772·8	60·4

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if goods and materials entering Germany from East Germany in terms of the inner German trade agreement are subject to the Common Market's anti-dumping procedures; and if the Common Market Commission has any role in supervising these arrangements.

Mr. Channon: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Night-clothes (Flame Resistance)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why standards governing the flame resistance of children's night-clothes differ between nightgowns and pyjamas.

Mr. Fletcher: The existing regulations, which date from 1967, are concerned only with the safety of nightdresses, which because of their loose fitting design have been the cause of more accidents. Pyjamas fit more closely to the body and do not pose so great a risk. Moreover cotton, which is the most popular fabric used for pyjamas, has to be chemically treated to enable it to meet the flammability standard and the treatment available at present would not only affect the feel and comfort of the fabric but also increase its cost. Mandatory compliance would therefore restrict consumers' choice.

Nevertheless, in the current review of the regulations I am proposing that suppliers of pyjamas shall in future be required to attach a label to them which indicates their flamability, so that purchasers will be able to identify the safer ones.

British Aerospace

Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what parliamentary procedure will be necessary to enable him to implement his intention to dispose of the Government's residual shareholding in British Aerospace.

Mr. Pattie: No parliamentary procedure will be necessary. Under sections 3(4) and 5(3) of the British Aerospace Act 1980 the Secretary of State may dispose of his shares with the consent of the Treasury. No parliamentary procedure is provided for.

Research Establishments

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why he does not allow the Government research establishments referred to in his answer of 1 March, Official Report, column 319, which are to be encouraged to undertake paid work for private clients, to retain what they earn in order to expand their research activities.

Mr. Butcher: The Department's research establishments are encouraged to undertake paid work for private clients and they are given credit for receipts up to levels approved by Parliament when it votes the annual Supply Estimates. The Supply Estimates provision for the research establishments is cash limited. If there are receipts above the levels voted for in any one year, they have to be surrendered to the Consolidated Fund.

Franchising Contracts

Mr. Fry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the Commission of the European Communities consulted Her Majesty's Government on case 161/84 Pronuptia de Paris v Schillgalis, referred to the European Court of Justice by the Federal Court of Karlsruhe, on whether article 85(1) of the treaty of Rome is applicable to franchising contracts, and in consequence whether regulation 67/67/EEC is applicable to such contracts; and what was Her Majesty's Government's response.

Mr. Fletcher: The Commission has not consulted Her Majesty's Government about the case in question. It is not a requirement or current practice for the Commission to consult member states about cases referred to the European Court of Justice by national courts.

Trade (Departmental Promotion)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the successes of his Department in stimulating increased trade and, in particular, exports in the north west of England during 1984.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to his reply, 14 March 1985, c. 208]: North-west firms have shared in expenditure on a number of departmental schemes aimed at increasing export sales. Knowledge of business achieved as a result of official trade promotion is considered to be confidential between the Department and the companies concerned. However, participants in the eight north-west based trade missions sponsored by the British Overseas Trade Board in 1984 reported initial orders amounting to £2·86 million, with longer-term business expected to be considerably in excess of this figure.

WALES

Hospital Waiting Lists

8. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on hospital waiting lists in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I am encouraged by the substantial rise in the number of people treated by the NHS in Wales, including the 17·5 per cent. increase of inpatient cases in the five years to September 1984. I also welcome the 5·6 per cent. reduction in the year to September 1984 in the number of urgent inpatient cases awaiting treatment. Progress still needs to be made in tackling the numbers of outpatients and reducing waiting times for some specialties and in some areas. The Welsh Office is encouraging health authorities to take the necessary management action for which they are responsible.

Primary Schools (Expenditure)

10. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has as to the per capita expenditure on supplies and equipment in primary schools in Gwynedd and for the whole of Wales, for the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: In 1983-84 expenditure per primary pupil on books, educational equipment, stationery and materials was £15·8 for Gwynedd and £19·8 for Wales.

Personal Social Services

18. Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much was spent on personal social services in Wales in the last year for which figures are available; and how this figure compares with that for each year since 1978-79.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Net expenditure by local authorities on personal social services in Wales was just over £121 million in 1983-84. In cost terms, this compares with expenditure of £116 million, £114 million, £115 million, £112 million and £109 million in the preceding years to 1978-79 and represents a real growth of about 11·7 per cent. over the period.

Mid-Wales Development

19. Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he last met the chairman of Mid-Wales Development; and what was discussed.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: My right hon. Friend and I have met the chairman of the Development Board for Rural Wales on a number of occasions in recent months. A wide range of matters was discussed.

Road Improvement Programmes

20. Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what recent revisions have been made in the starting dates of road improvement programmes in south-west Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Tenders are shortly to be let for the A48 Cross Hands-Llanddarog improvement, which when completed will substantially improve communications with south-west Wales. Twelve other major schemes in south-west Wales were listed in tables 2 to 5 of "Roads in Wales 1983", of which the A40 Whitland bypass and Treffgarne Rocks improvement will start later than indicated there.

Welsh Language

21. Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales what his Department has done to support the Welsh language since 1979.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: In a speech in 1980 my right hon. Friend undertook that while there were people who want to speak the Welsh language the Government would respond with the means of supporting it and giving it strength. That promise has been kept. Support since 1979 has amounted to £8·5 million and a further £2·5 million is planned for the next financial year, enabling a variety of bodies to undertake practical and constructive projects in the Welsh language field. It is a level of support of which we are proud and from my regular contact with bodies in receipt of grant is, I know, widely appreciated.

Livestock and Dairy Farming

22. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he last discussed the problems of the livestock and dairy sectors with members of the National Farmers Union in Wales and the Farmers Union of Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I met both the National Farmers Union and the Farmers Union of Wales on 18 January and the National Farmers Union in Wales again on 15 March for discussion of a number of topics of common concern, particularly the problems of the livestock and dairying sectors.

Highmead Home, Cardiff

23. Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the investigation he has caused to be made into the Highmead Home, Cardiff.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Following allegations made in the House, my officials made informal inquiries with the South Glamorgan county council, which has statutory responsibilities in relation to the provision of private residential care. These inquiries have brought forward no evidence to substantiate the allegations and, at this stage, my right hon. Friend does not propose any further action.

Students

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish figures showing for 1982-83, 1983-84 and an estimate for 1984-85 of the numbers of (a) full-time and (b) part-time students in Wales.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The numbers of students in universities and colleges of further and higher education in Wales were as follows:

	1982	1983
Full-time and sandwich	50,153	50,110
Part-time (including evening only)	46,675	52,228

Note: November-December of each year.
Figures exclude the Open University.
Figures for 1984 are not yet availble.

Job Creation

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will state the total of new jobs created in Wales since 1979; how many of these jobs were in manufacturing and how many in service industries; and how many in industries connected with modern technology.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Comprehensive information on jobs created is not available. However, since 1 May 1979 projects for which offers of selective financial assistance were accepted, or which were allocated Government-financed factories, promised to provide over 72,000 jobs. A split between manufacturing and service sectors is not readily available, but just over 11,000 jobs relate to projects in the fields of telecommunications, radio, electronics and aerospace industries. These figures do not include all the self-employed or jobs not involving selective financial assistance or Government factories.

Teachers (Pay Dispute)

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the extent of the teachers' pay dispute in Wales; and what progress has been made towards a settlement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Responsibility for the pay and conditions of service of teachers in England and Wales rests with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science. There was a half day strike by members of the NAS/UWT on 26 February which involved all counties in Wales and members of the same union have been on strike in selected schools in Dyfed for the last fortnight and in Clwyd this past week. Members of the NUT have had three-day strikes in selected schools in Clwyd and Dyfed for the past three weeks and in Gwynedd and Powys for the last two weeks. There has also been disruption in schools in all counties as a result of the withdrawal of goodwill.

Milk Quotas

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his assessment, up to the latest convenient date, of the consequences in Wales of the introduction of the milk quota scheme; what has been the change in the number of milk producers and upon the volume of milk produced in the Principality; and if he is satisfied with the results of arrangements for outgoers.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The consequences in Wales of the introduction of milk quotas will differ from farm to farm, according to the decisions taken by individual farmers. The number of registered milk producers in Wales at 31 December 1984 was 7,262, a decrease of 2·2 per cent. over December 1983. From April 1984 to January 1985 milk production was estimated to be 8·3 per cent. below year earlier levels. I am satisfied with the arrangements for outgoers.

Brynhyfryd Hospital, Forden

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals there are for the future of Brynhyfryd hospital, Forden; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Powys health authority is carrying out an appraisal of mental health provision in the district, and this will include the role of Brynhyfryd.

Pen y Ffordd Bypass

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he proposes to announce the result of the public inquiry into the compulsory purchase orders connected with the Pen y Ffordd bypass A550; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The report of the inspector who held the inquiry into the compulsory purchase order and the associated side roads order has been submitted to our Department and is under active consideration. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's decision will be issued in due coure and all interested parties will receive notification. I shall also arrange for the hon. Gentleman to receive a copy of the decision letter.

TRANSPORT

Road Construction

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the trend, from the first quarter of 1980 to the most recent practicable date, in road tender prices, road material prices and road output prices.

Mrs. Chalker: Road tender prices have been volatile, rising and falling in successive years to their level in the first quarter of 1984, 1 per cent. below that in the first quarter 1980. The rate of increase in road material prices has fallen from 19 per cent. in 1980-81 to 7 per cent. in 1984-85. The index for road output prices, which combines the two above, has increased over the period by 19 per cent.

Rail Electrification

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations have been received from British Rail for a scheme to electrify forthwith the midland main railway line between Bedford and Market Harborough.

Mr. David Mitchell: None.

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has received from the British Railways Board as to the cost of electrifying the midland main railway line between Bedford and Market Harborough.

Mr. David Mitchell: We have received no such information from the Board.

Passenger Transport Authorities

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the total level of subsidy given by central Government to passenger transport authorities.

Mrs. Chalker: Expenditure on highways and transport by the six English metropolitan county councils in 1984-85 has been supported by Transport Supplementary Grant (TSG). The amounts of grant are as follows:

	£ million
Greater Manchester	22,875
Merseyside	26,628
South Yorkshire	7,413
Tyne and Wear	9,084
West Midlands	17,831
West Yorkshire	22,130
Total	105,961

The councils also receive Rate Support Grant. From 1985-86 TSG will be confined to highways capital expenditure.

Road Construction

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the total level of expenditure planned for the construction of (a) motorways and (b) all other new roads in each of the next five years.

Mrs. Chalker: The public expenditure White Paper — Cmnd. 9428 — contains the following total net planning figures for all expenditure on trunk motorways and other trunk roads in England for the next three years:

	£ million
1985-86	824
1986-87	870

1985-86

Of the £824 million net provision for 1985-86, £598 million is for the new construction of motorways and trunk roads. The gross equivalent provision is £620 million of which some £280 million is attributable to motorway schemes.

1986-87-1987-88

Planned provision for new construction in these years is not separately identified between motorways and trunk roads.

Local Roads

Cmnd. 9428 also gives planning totals for local transport capital expenditure in the period 1985-86 to 1987-88. Capital expenditure on road construction in 1985-86 is shown as £502 million, but is not separately identified for the two further years.

Archway Road, London

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to arrange for the renovation of his Department's property at Archway Road, London N6.

Mrs. Chalker: I am considering what would be appropriate in the light of the district valuer's report will make an announcement as soon as possible.

East London Road Assessment Study

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the cost of the consultation exercise in respect of the east London road assessment study.

Mrs. Chalker: £11,500 has been spent on press advertising and leaflet distribution inviting people to express their views on the problems.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport which organisations have been invited to give evidence to the east London road assessment study.

Mrs. Chalker: Press advertisements and distributed leaflets have invited views on transport-related problems from all who live, work and travel in the study area. In addition, specific aproaches have been made to a large number of national, London-wide and local interests.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the results of the east London road assessment study are expected to be announced.

Mrs. Chalker: The consultants' report on phase I of the study—identification of problems—is expected in the summer and will be published shortly thereafter. In advance of receiving this I cannot predict the duration of the next stage to explore and report on possible solutions, but I would expect this to take some time.

Helicopter Accident (Isles of Scilly)

Mr. Harris asked the Secretary of State for Transport which of the eight safety recommendations in the report of the inquiry into the British Airways helicopter crash off the Isles of Scilly has not been accepted by the Civil Aviation Authority; and what stage has been reached in implementing the other seven.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The only safety recommendation not accepted by the Civil Aviation Authority is that concerning the use of aerodrome pressure setting (QFE) by BAH helicopters on low level aproaches to St. Mary's prior to crossing the coast.

Of the other seven recommendations, two will be implemented through amendments to legislation to be presented to Parliament shortly; they are the inclusion of audio warning for radio altimeters and revisions of requirements for the carriage of survival beacons. The CAA is revising weather minima and instrument monitoring procedures and investigating the practicability of relocating radio altimeters and the provision of lifejackets suitable for continuous wear. For the longer term, consideration is being given to the developement of a helicopter ground proximity warning system and the strengthening of passenger seats.

Liverpool Airport

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement outlining the Government's proposals for the future control of Liverpool airport after local government reorganisation takes place.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Local Government Bill provides for the transfer by order of metropolitan county council interests in airports to the districts comprising any such county, provided that those districts can agree among themselves both on the operation of the airport by a committee of all or any of them and the transfer or division of the interests. Failing such agreement, the interest will be transferred by order to the relevant passenger transport authority. It is therefore for the districts within Merseyside county council to decide together whether they can agree on terms for assuming control of Liverpool airport after abolition of the Merseyside county council.

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about Government policy on Liverpool airport.

Mr. Michael Spicer: It is Government policy to encourage the maxium use of regional airports. Liverpool airport is no exception, and has received substantial Government capital expenditure allocations for its rationalisation.

Wharves and Inland Waterways (Grants)

Mr. Crowther asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many grants have been (a) applied for and (b) made, under section 36 of the Transport Act 1981, for the installation or expansion of wharf facilities on inland waterways.

Mr. David Mitchell: Four formal applications for section 36 grants have been received, and three of these have been approved. the fourth, only recently received, is still being considered.

Motor Cyclists

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make arrangements to collect information on the average length of time taken by motor cyclists between passing part one and taking or passing part two of the driving test.

Mrs. Lynda Chalker: No. The average length of time between a motor cyclist passing part one and taking part two will not, in practice differ markedly from the average wait for part two of the test. This is similar to that for L tests for which figures are readily available. The additional cost of collecting these further data could not be justified.

Traffic area offices, who book the tests, already aim to ensure that motor cyclists who are reaching the end of the two-year period on their provisional licence are offered early test appointments within the period remaining.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make arrangements to collect information on the number and proportion of motor cycle provisional licences issued from 1 October 1982 which have been (a) replaced by a full licence and (b) allowed to lapse.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The range of statistical information available from drivers' records held on DVLC's computers at Swansea is to be reviewed. A study will begin, later this year, when work on replacing obsolete equipment at the centre is sufficiently advanced. It will include consideration of the information requested.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Supergrass Trials

Rev. William McCrea asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons have been released in converted terrorist supergrass trial cases in the Province.

Mr. Scott: Ninety-nine persons have been acquitted since 1982 following trials or appeals in cases where the evidence of a former accomplice was presented on behalf of the Crown. Information on how many of these were released on their acquittal could be obtained only at a disproportionate cost.

Rev. William McCrea asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will name those convicted and imprisoned because of evidence given by converted terrorists;

(2) if he will name those persons convicted on evidence of converted terrorists and the appropriate sentences passed on them.

Mr. Scott: No. It would not be appropriate to give the names of individuals in this connection.

District Councillors (Allowances and Expenses)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his reply of 5 March, Official Report, column 489, on the allowances and expenses for which members of district councils qualify, what are the rates of remuneration for each of attendance, special responsibility, special loss, travel and subsistence allowances; and what is the rate of remuneration for expenses incurred in attending conferences and meetings.

Mr. Chris Patten: The current rates of allowances are as follows:

1. Attendance and Financial Loss Allowances

Period	Attendance allowance £	Financial loss allowance £
Not more than four hours	7·76	11·25
More than four hours	15·52	22·50

2. Special Responsibility Allowances

A district council with a population	Total amount payable in a financial year £	Maximum payable to individual members £
Exceeding 100,000	4,435	One-third of £4,435
Not exceeding 100,000	1,105	445

3. Travel Allowance

Type of vehicle	Rate (pence per mile)
i. A motor car or tri-car exceeding 1199 cc cylinder capacity	20·0
ii. A motor car or tri-car exceeding 999 cc but not exceeding 1199 cc cylinder capacity	18·2
iii. A motor car or tri-car exceeding 500 cc but not exceeding 999 cc cylinder capacity	16·8
iv. A motor car not exceeding 500 cc cylinder capacity	16·8
v. A solo motor cycle exceeding 150 cc but not exceeding 500 cc cylinder capacity	6·4
vi. A solo motor cycle exceeding 120 cc but not exceeding 150 cc cylinder capacity	4·4
vii. A solo motor cycle not exceeding 120 cc cylinder capacity	4·2

Additional allowances are (a) 0·4 pence per mile for each additional passenger (b) 29·0 pence per night for garaging a motor car or tri-car and (c) 17·5 pence per night for garaging a motor vehicle of any other type.

4. Subsistence Allowances

(a) Day subsistence rates
An absence not involving an absence overnight from the usual place of abode
i. of more than four but not more than eight hours	4·00
ii. of more than eight but not more than 12 hours	7·00
iii. of more than 12 but not more than 16 hours	10·00
iv. of more than 16 hours	12·00
(b) Night Subsistence Rates
In any period of 24 hours:
An absence involving an absence overnight from the usual place of abode
a.i. in the British Islands	44·50
ii. elsewhere than in the British Islands	as determined by the Department of the Environment in respect of each specific case
b. An absence involving an absence overnight in London or in any other place in the British Islands approved by the Department	50·75

5. Expenses

There is no fixed rate of remuneration for expenses incurred in attending conferences and meetings. The level of reimbursement is determined by individual councils with the purpose of meeting the cost

Terrorism

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will list the number of murders, attempted murders and explosions believed to be attributable to Republican terrorist groups for each of the years 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984;

(2) if he will list the number of murders, attempted murders and explosions believed to be attributable to Loyalist terrorist group for each of the years 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Scott: The information available suggests that responsibility for these crimes can be attributed as follows:

Year	Murder		Attempted Murder		Explosions
	Republican	Loyalist	Republican	Loyalist	Republican	Loyalist
1980	33	13	188	15	260	20
1981	69	12	461	26	159	3
1982	71	13	401	12	212	7
1983	34	7	286	13	178	6
1984	40	7	185	22	189	3

Students, Apprentices and Trainees

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish figures showing for 1982-83, 1983-84 and an estimate for 1984-85, the numbers of (a) full-time students, (b) part-time students, (c) full-time trainees, (d) apprentices and (e) trainees on day-release courses.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is as follows:

	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85
(a) Full-time students (Excluding YTP Students)	26,618	26,092	*28,926
(b) Part-time students (Excluding YTP day release students)	91,039	89,982	*94,532
(c) Full-time trainees (Including YTP students)	15,797	16,471	†17,081
(d) Apprentices	6,540	5,999	†3,137
(e) Trainees on day release courses	8,633	9,157	†8,470

YTP = Youth training programme.

Armagh Women's Prison

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make it Her Majesty's Government's policy to introduce the use of sniffing machines in Armagh women's prison, instead of strip searching; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: Equipment for detecting explosives is available to the prison service in Northern Ireland, but such equipment as has been produced does not provide a level of security which would obviate the need for other forms of searching.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give the monthly breakdown since November 1982 of the number of women held in Her Majesty's prison, Armagh, indicating for each month the number held on remand and the number sentenced and distinguishing between those remanded or sentenced for scheduled and non-scheduled offences.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Kilroot Power Station

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the implications for employment in the heavy engineering and plant fabrication industries in Northern Ireland of the possible conversion of Kilroot power station from oil to coal or lignite firing; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply which I gave him on 14 March at column 221.

Scheduled Offences

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish in the Official Report for the years 1984 and 1985 to the nearest convenient date the number of persons charged with scheduled offences whose cases were concluded and who were (a) charged with scheduled offences and pleaded guilty, (b) charged with scheduled offences and pleaded not guilty, (c) found guilty of scheduled offences and (d) found not guilty of scheduled offences having pleaded not guilty.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Contracts

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many contracts advertised during the 1983-84 financial year were cancelled after tenders were received; and if he will list them;

(2) how many contracts advertised during the present financial year were cancelled after tenders have been received; and if he will list them.

Dr. Boyson: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Orlit Houses

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current position regarding the repair and upkeep of Orlit houses currently in Housing Executive ownership.

Mr. Chris Patten: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Strabane (Housing)

Rev. William McCrea asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Southern Irish Army soldiers are living in Northern Ireland Housing Executive houses in the Strabane area.

Mr. Chris Patten: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Housing (Resource Allocations)

Rev. William McCrea asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he makes of the relative costs of public and private housing when deciding on the level of allocation of resources to public sector housing in the Province; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The cost of houses in the private sector is not a determining factor in the allocation of resources to public sector housing programmes. The Government will continue to ensure, however, that expenditure on public sector programmes and on schemes to encourage the private sector represents good value for money.

Capital Grants Scheme

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what decisions he has reached as a result of the review of the standard capital grants scheme.

Dr. Boyson: I have placed in the Library copies of a paper outlining the results of the review of the standard capital grants scheme by the Department of Economic Development and the details of the revised scheme which will be introduced. I believe that the new arrangements will improve the cost effectiveness of the scheme while retaining its straightforward nature.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Televised Proceedings

Sir David Price asked the Lord Privy Seal if, in the light of the progress of the House of Lords experiment in televising the proceedings in their Lordships' Chamber, he will make a statement on the possibility of televising the proceedings in the Chamber of the House of Commons.

Mr. Biffen: It is for each House to make its own decision. I anticipate that this House will wish to consider this issue further in due course.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

British Telecom

Mr. Gould asked the Attorney-General if he will publish a list of those persons and institutions whose activities in applying for British Telecom shares have been referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions.

The Attorney-General: No. A report was sent on 20 March 1985 to the Director of Public Prosecutions from the Department of Trade and Industry about this matter and is under consideration. It would not be right to make information public about individual cases in which there may be reason to suspect that criminal offences may have been committed.

Legal Aid Act

Ms. Harman asked the Attorney-General if he has any plans to repeal section 22 of the Legal Aid Act.

The Attorney-General: My right hon. and noble Friend the Lord Chancellor has no such plans.

Ms. Harman asked the Attorney-General if he has authorised any prosecutions for breach of section 22 of the Legal Aid Act; and whether he intends to prosecute anyone for breach of section 22 of the Legal Aid Act.

The Attorney-General: I assume that the hon. Member is referring to the cases where legal aid assessment officers, acting bone fide in reliance on certain departmental instructions first drawn up in 1951, passed information on legal aid applicants to other officials. Having consulted the Director of Public Prosecutions, I have decided that it would not be right to prosecute in these cases. I have also decided that it would not be right to prosecute those who drew up the instructions, since they did so on legal advice.

Criminal Proceedings

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Attorney-General if he will introduce legislation to permit a person who is aggrieved at the refusal of the Director of Public Prosecutions to institute criminal proceedings to challenge the decision in the courts; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: No. The Director of Public Prosecutions exercises his functions under my superintendence and it would be wrong to make his decisions subject to supervision by the courts and thus bring the courts into the prosecution process.

EMPLOYMENT

Industrial Injuries (Inquiries)

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the average length of time taken by the Factories Inspectorate to investigate cases of industrial injury and to process compensation claims; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No data is available from which the average period of time for the investigation of cases of industrial injury can be derived. Matters on claims for industrial compensation should be referred to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

EC (Social Fund)

Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for Employment what estimate he has made of the effect on the amount of European social fund money received by the United Kingdom of the possible entry of Spain and Portugal to the European Economic Community.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is impossible to predict with any accuracy the effect of enlargement on United Kingdom receipts for the European Social Fund, because this will depend on many factors, including the size of fund and the rules and guidelines in force at the time.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total number of persons unemployed at the most recent date for which figures are available; and what was the comparable total for the same date in the year immediately preceding the United Kingdom's membership of the Common Market.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 10 February 1985, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,323,676. The corresponding number of unemployed in February 1972 is estimated to have been 936,600. This information is also available from the Library. The comparison is affected by the 1983 Budget provisions which mean that some men, mainly aged 60 and over, no longer need to sign on in order to receive supplementary benefit or national insurance credits. The estimated effect of these measures, which accumulated between April and August 1983, is 162,000.

Budget (Job Creation)

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is his estimate of the effect of the Budget proposals in reducing unemployment.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Budget contains a coherent and wide-ranging set of measures to help generate employment and tackle unemployment. These include the expansion of the youth training scheme and the community programme, as well as substantial reform of the structure of national insurance contributions and raising the tax thresholds. These will help create the conditions for substantial numbers of new jobs without taking any risks with inflation. By 1986-87 our employment and training measures together will be providing help for 1 million people.

Strikes

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on his assessment of the relationship between strikes and employment.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: While it is impossible to make an accurate estimate, strikes definitely put employment at risk. In the short term, output is lost and orders go to competitors—in the case of national strikes, particularly to overseas competitors. Export orders are lost and some of the orders lost in previous strikes have not been recovered.

Balloting Procedures

Sir Humphrey Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many times in the past 12 months he has met representatives of the Trades Union Congress to discuss balloting procedures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I shall reply to my right hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Youth Training

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many and what percentage of school leavers have been on youth training or youth opportunity schemes for each of the last five years for which records are available; whether he will break these figures down into the following areas: (a) west midlands, (b) east midlands, (c) Scotland, (d) Northern Ireland, (e) north, (f) north-west, (g) Yorkshire and Humberside, (h) East Anglia, (i) south-east, (j) Wales and (k) south-west; and of these, how many trainees were (i) offered jobs with sponsors, (ii) found work, (iii) registered for employment and (iv) found places on other schemes on completion of their periods of training.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) on what basis he calculates that a second year of youth training will cost £125 million in 1986-87 and £300 million in 1987-88;

(2) if his estimate of the costs of a second year of the youth training scheme assumes employers pay (a) 25 per cent., (b) 50 per cent. or (c) 75 per cent. of the cost of training.

Mr. Peter Morrison: We have not predicted what the cost of extending the youth training scheme would be. The Government is prepared to put £125 million in 1986-87 and £300 million in 1987-88, in addition to spending on the existing youth training scheme, towards the cost of the new scheme; but we are looking to employers, who stand to gain a great deal from this advance in our training arrangements, to pay their fair share as well. The total cost, and the exact contribution required from employers, will depend on the outcome of the consultations which the Manpower Services Commission will be carrying out.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what proposals he has for improved training on the extended youth training scheme;

(2) how the youth training allowance for the second year of the youth training scheme will compare with the present youth training scheme allowance.

Mr. Peter Morrison: We have asked the Manpower Services Commission to draw up detailed proposals for the new scheme, including recommendations on training content and the trainee allowance. As under the existing scheme, however, the more that available resources are devoted to training, rather than to the allowance, the greater will be the benefit to young people.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether his proposals for a second year of youth training will be made after consultation with the Trades Union Congress.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Yes. The Manpower Services Commission will consult with the TUC in developing its proposals.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many additional places in the community programme he expects to be created by the end of 1985 and, of these, how many will be allocated to Scotland.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend has written to the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission and has asked him to proceed so that an additional 50,000 places can be filled by December 1985, with extra provision in all areas, but to let him have the commission's views as soon as possible on the best means to distribute available places.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many additional (a) 16-year-olds and (b) 17-year-olds he expects to join the expanded youth training scheme in 1986-87 and 1987-88.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The number of young people entering the expanded youth training scheme will depend on the outcome of the consultations which the Manpower Services Commission will be carrying out. We have, however, estimated that there might be around 200,000 more young people in training at any given time.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment what he estimates to be the saving from the abolition of the young workers' scheme.

Mr. Alan Clark: The savings in a full year from the abolition of the young workers' scheme, announced in the Budget statement, were estimated as £25 million.

Mines and Quarries Act

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Employment if the National Coal Board has applied for any alteration or exemption to the Mines and Quarries Act or other such legislation relating to the coal mining industry in the last six months.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Maternity Pay Fund

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Employment what research his Department is currently supporting into the effects on health of those operating visual display units; and if he has considered asking the Health and Safety Commission to review matters in order to establish the facts.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [pursuant to his reply, 21 March 1985, c. 556]: The Health and Safety Executive published a research paper in 1980 and a guidance note in 1983, both of which consider the health aspects of operating VDUs. Further guidance is to be published shortly. Current work being undertaken by the executive includes studies on skin problems in VDU operators, possible reproductive problems, the ergonomic design of VDU equipment and the design of workplaces and lighting for VDU operation. The commissioning of further research into aspects of VDU job design is being considered. The Health and Safety Executive continues to keep the subject under review.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

UN Development Programmes

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment of the cost-effectiveness of United Kingdom contributions to United Nations development programmes he has made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: I regret the delay in answering this question. The British contribution to the United Nations development programme cannot be separately evaluated, as it comprises an unconditional grant to the programme's central funds.

We have not made an independent assessment of the cost effectiveness of the programme. The United Nations development programme has its own evaluation process, and an annual report is made on this work to the governing council, of which the United Kingdom is a member. I am sending a copy to the hon. Member.

The United Nations development programme is also subject to inquiry from within the work programme of the United Nations' joint inspection unit.

Famine Victims

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish a complete list of what Her Majesty's Government are doing to help famine victims.

Mr. Raison: I am arranging for a list to be placed in the Library.

Ethiopia

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Royal Air Force's commitment to food distribution in Ethiopia is to continue.

Mr. Raison: We have offered the Ethiopian Government a continuation of the RAF operation beyond the end of March and are assessing how long we shall stay.

CIVIL SERVICE

Visual Display Units (Pregnancies)

Mrs. Beckett asked the Minister for the Civil Service if the Civil Service medical advisory service is aware of any clusters of abnormal pregnancies among women users of visual display units in the Civil Service other than that at the Department of Employment's offices in Runcorn; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: No. The Civil Service medical advisory service is not aware of clusters of abnormal pregnancies among women users of visual display units in the Civil Service, either in the Department of Employment's offices in Runcorn or elsewhere.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he will now publish the report, including the recommendations of the Civil Service medical advisory service, on the cluster of abnormal pregnancies which occurred at the Department of Employment's offices in Runcorn among women users of visual display units.

Mr. Hayhoe: The report of the Runcorn survey was presented at an international meeting which examined the allegations of reproductive hazards from VDUs and was held in London on 29-30 November 1984. The papers of the conference have been published and are available from Humane Technology, P.O. Box 2, Quorn, Leicestershire LE12 8EG at a cost of £15. Medical and scientific consensus at the meeting was that VDUs do not constitute a reproductive hazard. An account of the meeting was also published in the Health and Safety Information Bulletin — IRS 67 Maygrove Road, NW6 2EJ — on 8 January 1985.

The study of 169 pregnancies in 113 women who had worked in a Department of Employment office in Runcorn over a nine-year period showed that rates of miscarriages, foetal abnormalities and stillbirths in the "exposed" pregnancies were within normally accepted limits, and no clustering of abnormal pregnancies was apparent. There was an unusually low rate of miscarriage of "control" pregnancies, a feature of other studies which have relied largely on mothers' own memories for information about past pregnancies.

The recommendations of the Civil Service medical advisory service are that the outcome of the large scale prospective studies of VDT operators currently under way in north America should be closely reviewed and that further studies on the Runcorn model in the Civil Service are inappropriate. Their close review of international medico-scientific literature and their close co-operation with the Health and Safety Executive on questions of adverse outcome of pregnancy associated with occupation will continue.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Minister for the Civil Service if, in the light of further clusters of abnormal pregnancies occurring at fire brigade headquarters in Manchester, he will now reconsider the decision not to continue the Civil Service medical advisory service research on the occurrence of such clusters among women users of visual display units; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I understand that the report of possible clusters of abnormal pregnancies occurring at the fire brigade headquarters in Manchester is based on anecdotal evidence gathered during a survey by the Fire Brigades Union. It appears that the report has not been submitted to the occupational health medical officer for Greater Manchester council nor to a professional journal for medical and scientific assessment. The Civil Service medical advisory service will take into account the findings of the study, after publication in a scientific journal, in its assessment of possible reproductive hazards which might be attributed to VDU usage. The current medical and scientific consensus is that no such hazards exist.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Minister for the Civil Service whether the Civil Service medical advisory service has studied the results of American research about the clusters of abnormal pregnancies occurring among the wives of male users of visual display units; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: An intensive search of medico-scientific literature has not elicited the information stated and neither the Civil Service medical adviser nor the chairman of the scientific advisory committee of the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists is aware of scientific studies reported in the medical literature which support the assertion.

Birth Defects (Research)

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Minister for the Civil Service whether research is to be restarted into the two clusters of women whose children have birth defects in Runcorn and Manchester.

Mr. Hayhoe: For the reasons given in my recent replies to the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) research concerning women civil servants operating VDUs in Runcorn is not being continued.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Minister for the Civil Service why the decision was taken to stop research into the cluster of confirmed birth defects at the Department of Employment, Runcorn.

Mr. Hayhoe: For the reasons given in my recent replies to the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), research in VDU usage in the Department of Employment, Runcorn is not continuing. No clustering of birth defects has been confirmed.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Discretionary Grants

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has for each local education authority in England and Wales about the total number of applications made for discretionary grant awards, the number granted in full and the number granted in part, for the last year in which figures are available.

Mr. Brooke: No information is collected regarding the number of applications which are made. The table shows for 1982-83 the number of new full-value and lesser value discretionary awards actually made, and expressed per 1,000 of the average of the 18 and 19-year-old population for each local authority in England and Wales.

General Certificate of Secondary Education

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what consideration he has given to possible increased work loads on teachers arising from his proposal to introduce the new general certificate of secondary education.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend is conscious of the need to ensure that the total work load on teachers is reasonable. The general criteria for the GCSE provide accordingly that syllabuses and methods of assessment must not make unreasonable demands on human and financial resources.

Teachers

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list his Department's estimates of the membership figures for each of the teacher unions represented on the Burnham committee, the date and source of such figures and his estimate of the number of teachers not in a union.

Mr. Dunn: The Department does not estimate the size of the membership of the teacher unions. Actual figures are supplied by the unions themselves to the Certification Office and these were given in my reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) on 12 February, at column 116. We are not able to estimate the number of teachers not belonging to a union.

Pupil-Teacher Ratios

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage change there has been in pupil-teacher ratios in the period from 1975 to 1984 in all types of schools.

Mr. Dunn: The percentage changes in pupil-teacher ratios between January 1975 and 1984 within schools in England are as follows:

	January 1975 PTR	January 1984 PTR	Percentage reduction
All maintained schools	20·6	18·7	9·2
Nursery	21·6	19·8	8·3
Primary	24·2	22·1	8·7
Secondary	17·2	16·2	5·8
Independent schools	13·5	11·6	14·1
Special schools	9·1	7·1	22·0
All schools	19·7	17·6	10·7

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information is available to his Department as to the pupil-teacher ratio in secondary schools participating in the assisted places scheme.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 19 March 1985, c. 480]: The average pupil-teacher ratio at assisted places schools was 11·6 in January 1984, the most recent date for which figures are available.

Student-Staff Ratios

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage change there has been in the student-staff ratio in the polytechnics over the period 1975 to 1984.

Mr. Brooke: The percentage change in the student-staff ratio (SSR) for advanced level work in the polytechnics between 1974-75 and 1983-84 was as follows:

(SSR)

1974-75	1983-84	Percentage change
7·0	11·1	58·6

The ratios are calculated as full-time equivalent student load divided by the full-time equivalent number of lecturers who are involved in teaching.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage change there has been in student-staff ratios in universities over the period 1975 to 1984.

Mr. Brooke: The percentage change in the student-staff ratio (SSR) in universities in Great Britain between December 1975 and December 1983, the latter date for which information is available, was as follows:

(SSR)

1975	1983	Percentage change
8·8	10·2	16·2

This ratio is defined as the full-time equivalent of undergraduate and postgraduate students divided by full-time academic staff funded wholly from university funds.

A-Level Biology (Animal Dissection)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions have taken place between his Department and secretaries of the General Certificate of Education examining boards concerning the removal of animal dissection from the A-level biology syllabus; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Representatives of the GCE examining boards recently brought officials of the Department and of the Secondary Examinations Council up to date on the current position on requirements for dissection in A-level biology syllabuses. It was made plain by the Department at that meeting that decisions on such requirements are for the GCE examining boards themselves.

The issue of the inclusion of a limited amount of dissection in A-level biology syllabuses is a difficult one, and merits discussion by all of those professionally concerned. The Government have no plans to seek to issue guidance on it.

Pupil Statistics

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many, and what percentage, of school pupils attended (a) public sector schools and (b) assisted and independent schools for each of the last five years for which records are available.

Mr. Dunn: The number and percentage of pupils in maintained and independent schools in England in the years 1980 to 1984 are as follows:

Number of pupils in schools in England

	Maintained		Independent
	Number of pupils	Percentage	Number of pupils	Percentage
1980	8,397,059	94·0	535,974	6·0
1981	8,185,094	93·9	535,029	6·1
1982	7,972,907	93·8	528,620	6·2
1983	7,752,217	93·7	523,885	6·3
1984	7,573,841	93·5	522,392	6·5

Schools (Expenditure)

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what have been the levels of both direct and indirect spending on (a) public sector schools and (b) assisted and independent schools by (i) central Government and (ii) local education authorities for each of the last five years for which records are available.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested is given in the following table:

	1979-80 £ million	1980-81 £ million	1981-82 £ million	1982-83 £ million	1983-84 £ million
Expenditure by:
Central Government
on maintained schools	35	37	40	34	34
on other schools	10	8	9	13	18
Local education authorities
on maintained schools	5,374	6,514	7,032	7,479	7,831
on other schools	93	116	127	127	130

Notes:

1. Expenditure includes capital as well as current spending, and assistance with pupils' fees as well as direct expenditure on the provision of education.
2. "Other schools" includes non-maintained special schools and direct grant schools as well as independent schools.

School Leavers (Further and Higher Education)

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to the numbers and percentages of school pupils attending (a) public sector schools and (b) assisted and independent schools who subsequently attended (i) Oxford, (ii) Cambridge, (iii) all other universities, (iv) polytechnics and (v) all other higher and further education establishments for each of the last 10 years for which records are available.

Mr. Dunn: Information on the intended destination of school leavers is given in the table:

English Teaching

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will introduce legislation to make mandatory the teaching of English in all schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend takes the view that English should be a compulsory element of the curriculum for all pupils of statutory school age. He sees no evidence that legislation is required to secure this.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what studies are being undertaken by his Department to assess the proportion of (a) potential O-level candidates and (b) potential A-level candidates leaving the maintained sector for the assisted places scheme and the effects on the maintained schools so affected;

(2) to what conclusions he has come concerning educational standards as a result of the assisted places scheme;

(3) how he estimates the marginal benefit accruing to a child educated under the assisted places scheme of the extra cost to his Department of so educating a child;

(4) what criteria he uses to gauge that the quality of education available to pupils educated under the assisted places scheme exceeds that which is available to those pupils in the maintained sector.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 19 March 1985, c. 480]: Schools are selected to participate in the assisted places scheme because of their high standard and good academic records, from which assisted pupils will benefit. The cost of the scheme is more than justified by the consequent widening of parental choice and increase in the educational opportunities for able children from low-income families. The size of the scheme means that its implications for maintained schools are negligible.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what information he has as to the average income represented by fees paid by his Department under the assisted places scheme for those schools participating in the scheme for which the 60 per cent. requirement has been relaxed;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report the fee income to each school participating in the assisted places scheme as a result of the scheme; and what percentage of each school's fee income this represents for 1984-85.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 19 March 1985, c. 480]: The latest estimated amounts to be paid to each school in respect of remitted fees for the school year 1984-85, and an estimate of the proportion of the school's fees income which that represents are as follows. Those schools which have been granted dispensation from the 60 per cent. rule for 1984-85 are indicated with an asterisk.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East of 11 March, Official Report, column 32, if he will now give for each year of the operation of the assisted places scheme the names of schools which have been granted dispensation from the 60 per cent. rule and the percentage of assisted places pupils formerly attending maintained schools in each case.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 19 March 1985, c. 480]: The rule requires participating schools to recruit assisted pupils who, at the time of their selection, are attending a publicly-maintained school and have done so for two years or more so that these form at least 60 per cent. of all the school's assisted pupils. Dispensations granted from this rule are as follows. For those cases in italic figures, the dispensation granted on a contingency basis was not, in the event, needed.

Higher Education

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many places were available in further and higher education for each of the last five years in (a) universities, (b) polytechnics and (c) other institutions; and how many and what percentage of the students concerned were studying for each category of qualification for which records are available.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 20 March 1985, c. 493]: The numbers and percentages of students enrolled on courses leading to qualifications for which information is readily available for each of the last five years, at universities in Great Britain and polytechnics and other colleges of further education in England in 1981 to 1983 and in England and Wales in 1979 and 1980, are given in the tables.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Santo Domingo

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what property is currently rented by Her Majesty's Government for Her Majesty's embassy, Santo Domingo; what arrangements have been made for the termination of the leases; and whether any cost is involved in such arrangements;

(2) what buildings are currently occupied by Her Majesty's embassy, Santo Domingo.

Mr. Renton: We rent our offices, the ambassador's house, and one other house in Santo Domingo. Arrangements have been made for the termination of all the leases without financial penalty at the end of March 1985.

European Community

Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has made any proposal to the Council of Ministers for changes in the size, representation or composition of European Economic Community institutions following the possible entry of Spain and Portugal to the Community.

Mr. Rifkind: Yes. The United Kingdom has proposed a reduction in the size of the European Commission to one Commissioner per member state after enlargement. The United Kingdom also suggested that on accession the size of some institutions should be held at roughly their present size and the places reallocated to accommodate Spanish and Portuguese nationals. But the Community has now agreed with Spain and Portugal that increases should be on a pro rata basis according to the relative sizes of those countries.

Restored Historic Buildings, Leningrad (Exhibition)

Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will arrange for an exhibition relating to restored historic buildings in Leningrad to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Rifkind: I understand that arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House for such an exhibition proposed by the hon. Member to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 15-19 April.

Diplomatic Representation

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign annd Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing, for each country with diplomatic representation in the United Kingdom, and for each country where the United Kingdom has diplomatic representation, the respective numbers of diplomats in post in each country on 31 January in each of the last five years.

Mr. Renton: The attached table A shows the number of foreign and Commonwealth diplomatic agents in each mission in London on the date in each of the past five years at which our records were updated.

We do not keep precisely comparable records of United Kingdom-based diplomatic representation in posts overseas. The attached table B, which is based on information in "Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service Overseas Reference List" (a copy of which is available for reference in the Library), shows the numbers of United Kingdom-based diplomatic staff of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and other Government Departments in each overseas capital on 31 October of each of the past five years. These figures do not include non-resident representation, except for Chad.

Diplomatic Immunity

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to respond to the report of the Foreign Affairs Committee on the abuse of diplomatic immunities and privileges.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We expect to give our considered reply to the Foreign Affairs Committee report shortly after the Easter recess.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British diplomats abroad, broken down by country of posting, have had fixed penalty notices for traffic offences cancelled on grounds of diplomatic immunity in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: It is our policy to ensure wherever possible that members of our overseas missions do not incur fixed penalty notices for traffic offences. Records are not available centrally of such notices as have nevertheless been incurred, and information on them could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British diplomats abroad, broken down by country of posting, have had proceedings or inquiries by the police regarding traffic offences, other than fixed penalty notices, cancelled on grounds of diplomatic immunity in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Our policy is that we would not expect diplomatic immunity to be unreasonably maintained in cases where waiver would be without prejudice to the work of the mission. It is not our practice to give details of individual cases where facts have not been established in court. But in the past five years we know of only one case where proceedings or inquiries by the police have been cancelled on grounds of diplomatic immunity.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, pursuant to the answer of 14 March to the hon. Member for Leicester, East, Official Report, column 248, concerning diplomatic immunity, he will specify the offences allegedly committed by persons enjoying diplomatic immunity in 1984 included within the category "other".

Mr. Renton: The three alleged offences in this category were indecent assault (two cases) and gross indecency. All three alleged offenders have been transferred from the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what, of the information sought by the hon. Member for Leicester, East regarding years prior to 1984 about offences allegedly committed by persons claiming diplomatic immunity, Official Report, columns 248-9, can be provided without incurring disproportionate cost.

Mr. Renton: Details of alleged offences committed before 1982 by persons enjoying diplomatic immunity were given in June 1984 to the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs. The information which could not be provided except at disproportionate cost relates to the number of diplomats transferred before 1982 following representations by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why his Department did not keep centralised records of offences alleged to have been committed by persons claiming diplomatic immunity prior to 1982; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Centralised records of offences alleged to have been committed by persons claiming diplomatic immunity have been kept since 1974 by the Home Office. Details were supplied to the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs in June 1984.

Gibraltar

Mr. George Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has received from the Government of Spain any proposals regarding the possible future status of Gibraltar; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. and learned Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie) on 20 March at column 535.

Peter Nadin

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Islington, North, on 8 February, Official Report, column 750, if he has yet received a statement from the Greek Government on the death of Peter Nadin; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Her Majesty's embassy in Athens has drawn the attention of the Greek Ministry of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Nadin's death, and asked for that Ministry's co-operation and that of the appropriate Greek authorities in reviewing the investigations so far made, and to consider what scope there may be for further inquiries into the circumstances of Mr. Nadin's death.

I shall write to the hon. Member, and inform Mr. Nadin's next of kin, when the Greek reply is received.

Inner German Trade Agreement

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the purpose and objective of the inner German trade agreement.

Mr. Renton: Inner German trade is based on a number of agreements and laws, including the Berlin agreement of 20 September 1951 — 16 August 1960, which regulates trade in goods, services and payments between the deutschmark and east mark areas.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the United Kingdom has ever been provided with the opportunity of approving or reviewing the inner German trade agreement.

Mr. Renton: Inner German trade continues to be regulated in part by allied legislation. A protocol on German internal trade and connected problems forms an integral part of the EEC treaty, to which the United Kingdom became a party on 1 January 1973.

Human Rights Conference

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about United Kingdom participation in the European ministerial conference on human rights, organised by the Council of Europe in Vienna on 19 and 20 March.

Mr. Renton: My hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General and I represented the United Kingdom at this conference, the purpose of which was to evaluate and consolidate the work of the Council of Europe in the field of human rights. I signed (subject to ratification) the eighth protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights, which introduces improvements in the procedures of the European Commission on Human Rights with a view to reducing delays. There was significant support for the view expressed by the Solicitor-General that a period of consolidation was required rather than radical reform of the machinery. The United Kingdom will play a full part in examining the possibility of further improvements to control machinery of the convention in the appropriate Council of Europe committees. The conference also considered the challenge to human rights posed by new developments in science particularly in biology, medicine and biochemistry. The United Kingdom contributed expert papers including the Warnock report on human fertilisation and embryology.

SCOTLAND

EC (Agriculture Structure Plan)

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when proposals for the new structure plan for agriculture are expected to come from the EC.

Mr. Younger: Agreement on a new structures regulation was reached at the meeting of the EC Council of Agriculture Ministers on 11-12 March. Agriculture Departments are currently drawing up proposals to give effect to the new regulation and consultations with interested parties on these proposals will be taking place shortly.

Women Prisoners

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many women were held in prisons in Scotland for the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, distinguishing between those held on remand and sentenced prisoners.

Mr. Ancram: The information requested on the numbers in custody in Scottish penal establishments in 1982 was published in appendix No. 3 to the "Prisons in Scotland Report for 1982", Cmnd. 8980. Figures for 1983 were published in table 2 of Scottish Home and Health Department Statistical Bulletin No. 2/1984, "Prisons Statistics Scotland 1983". Copies of both documents are in the Library. During 1984, the average daily population of women held in Scottish penal establishments was 132, of whom 49 were on remand and 83 were persons under sentence; of those 64 were adult prisoners.

Protected Areas

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland which areas of the west coast of Scotland in the Clyde estuary are protected areas under the Inshore Fishing (Scotland) Act 1984.

Mr. Younger: The Inshore Fishing (Scotland) Act 1984 had not yet been brought into force. The Government are currently studying the comments of interested parties on their latest proposals, which did not include area restrictions within the Clyde estuary, and once decisions are made will publish the necessary orders.

Tranquillisers and Sedatives

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those voluntary organisations concerned with those who have become addicted to prescribed tranquillisers and sedatives; which of them have applied to his Department for grants; what sum was applied for in each case; for what purpose; and what has been the result.

Mr. John MacKay: I am not aware of any voluntary organisations in Scotland concerned solely with people who have become addicted to prescribed tranquillisers and sedatives; and no such organisation has applied to my Department for grant. There are, however, several voluntary organisations in Scotland receiving Government grants for assisting problem drug takers, and I understand that some of these bodies do offer help to persons who have become addicted to tranquillisers and sedatives.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of prescriptions for and the total amount prescribed of (a) tranquillisers and (b) sedatives in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. John MacKay: The numbers of prescriptions for sedatives and tranquillisers dispensed in Scotland in the years 1975-83 are as follows:

Thousands

Year	Prescriptions
1976	2,282
1977	2,370
1978	2,376
1979	2,332
1980	2,116
1981	2,098
1982	2,078
1983	1,752

* Prior year's figures not complete.

It is not possible to provide separate figures for tranquillisers and sedatives or to give quantities without incurring disproportionate costs. The 1984 figure is not yet available.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will undertake an inquiry into the incidence of addiction to prescribed tranquillisers and sedatives in each region.

Mr. John MacKay: A fieldwork survey has recently been carried out into the prevalence of drug misuse generally in the Greater Glasgow health board area; and a similar survey is now being undertaken in Edinburgh. Both of these inquiries are being funded by the Scottish Home and Health Department. There are at present no proposals to conduct such inquiries in other areas.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the number of persons addicted to prescribed tranquillisers and sedatives.

Mr. John MacKay: No statistics are available centrally which would enable such an estimate to be made.

Strip Searches

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many strip searches were made on women prisoners in Her Majesty's prisons in Scotland for each of the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, distinguishing between prisoners held on remand and sentenced prisoners.

Mr. Ancram: The number of strip searches of female prisoners made in Scotland in 1983 and 1984 was 3,816 and 5,110 respectively. Similar information is not available for 1982 nor is it possible to distinguish in the succeeding years between prisoners held on remand and sentenced prisoners.

Local Authorities (Expenditure)

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of the total expenditure of local authorities in Scotland and of revenue expenditure is met by central Government support in the latest year for which figures are available; and what was the comparable figure in the year 1979-80.

Mr. Younger: On the basis of budget information contained in the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy publication "Rating Review", the percentage of total local authority expenditure met by central Government support in 1979-80 and 1984-85 is as follows:

	per cent.
1984-85	55·4

Notes:

1. For the purpose of this question, total local authority expenditure is relevant expenditure for rate support grant purposes, including loan charges, total rate fund contributions to the housing revenue account and total rate fund contributions to other non-relevant services.
2. Central Government support is specific revenue grants and rate support grant.
3. Actual expenditure and grant may differ from the estimates provided.

Agriculture (Research and Development Funding)

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will institute an inquiry into the delivery and funding of agricultural research and development and advisory services in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: My noble Friend the Minister of State is currently reviewing the organisation and funding of these services, in consultation with the interests concerned.

Council House Sales

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is satisfied that local authorities in Scotland are processing council house sales expeditiously and efficiently; and how many sales are in process within the Banff and Buchan constituency.

Mr. Ancram: The average time taken to process sales in Scotland continues to show an improvement, with sales completed during 1984 taking on average 9·7 months from application to completion. Within the Banff and Buchan constituency, 410 applications to purchase are currently being processed with missives having been concluded in 50 of these.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to carry out a promotion programme on council house sales in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: To help promote sales of council houses this spring, we have arranged further screenings of the television advertisement which was the centrepiece of last summer's major campaign to remind tenants of their right to buy and to inform them of the improvements in discounts and eligibility introduced by the Tenants' Rights, Etc. (Scotland) Amendment Act 1984. We intend to mount a further publicity campaign in the autumn.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many persons in the Banff and Buchan constituency are on waiting lists for treatment for hip conditions in National Health Service hospitals in Aberdeen; and what is the average period of time such persons have to wait before treatment is performed;

(2) how many people in the Banff and Buchan constituency have been on waiting lists for treatment for eye defects for less than three months;

(3) how many persons within the Grampian health board area are on waiting lists for treatment for hip conditions in National Health Service hospitals; and what is the average period such persons are required to wait before the treatment is performed;

(4) how many persons are on hospital waiting lists in Scotland in respect of treatment for hip conditions; and what is the average period of time such persons are required to wait before treatment is given.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people in the Banff and Buchan constituency have been on hospital waiting lists for treatment for hip conditions for over six months.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is not available centrally.

Grampian Health Board

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) why a board table has been purchased by the Grampian health board for £13,000; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what sums of money have been spent in the years 1983, 1984 and 1985 by the Grampian health board on the upgrading and refurbishment of the board room used by that authority.

Mr. John MacKay: Provision of board room furniture and accommodation is a matter for individual health boards.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will call for a report from the Grampian health board on the conditions of the staff houses at Ladysbridge hospital, by Banff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Provision of staff accommodation is a matter for individual health boards.

Labour Statistics

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of job opportunities available to young persons in the 17 to 23-year age group in the Banff and Buchan constituency (a) at the start of 1985 and (b) at the latest available date.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information requested is not available; statistics on vacancies are not classified by age group. Opportunities for young people will be enhanced by the expansion of special employment and training measures announced in the Budget.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list in the Official Report the numbers, separating male and female, of young people unemployed in the Banff and Buchan constituency in the years 1983 and 1984; and what are the latest figures for 1985;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report the numbers, showing male and female separately, of the adult population in the Banff and Buchan constituency who were unemployed for more than six months in the years 1983 and 1984; and what are the latest available figures for 1985.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I regret the information is not available in the precise form requested. Unemployment figures for parliamentary constituencies are available only from September 1984 and can be obtained from the House of Commons Library.

Information on the number of unemployed claimants by sex, age and duration in the Banff, Fraserburgh and Peterhead jobcentre areas, within which the Banff and Buchan constituency is located, is available in the House of Commons Library for the periods requested.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he proposes to take in order to reduce the rate of unemployment for both male and female persons in the Banff and Buchan constituency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The best means of improving employment prospects lies in the Government's strategy, reiterated in last week's Budget statement, of keeping inflation down, offering real incentive for enterprise and restoring competitiveness to industry. This strategy will help the Banff and Buchan constituency as much as the rest of the country. The Government's full range of employment and training measures is available to people in the constituency through the Manpower Services Commission. The Fraserburgh project, a three year self-help initiative, funded by the Scottish Development Agency and the private sector, was launched in October 1984 with the aim of creating 450 jobs and safeguarding another 200 in the next three years.

School Meals

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many school children received free school meals in (a) the Grampian region and (b) the area covered by Banff and Buchan district council.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The latest information from the school meals census held in January 1984 is that 4,318 pupils in Grampian region received free school meals, of whom 1,124 were in the area covered by Banff and Buchan district council.

Tourism

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if any grants or loans have been made by the Scottish Tourist Board to the Banff and Buchan district council for the promotion of tourism in that area.

Mr. John MacKay: The Scottish Tourist Board has recently given grant assistance to enable Banff and Buchan district council to make improvements to several of its tourist imformation centres and to provide coastal route road signs and a viewpoint indicator panel, and approved grant assistance for conversion of a hostel to a hotel.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is satisfied with the liaison between the Scottish Tourist Board and local tourist boards which have been set up by district councils in Scotland; and what joint promotional programmes are in being.

Mr. John MacKay: Liaison between the Scottish Tourist Board and the are a tourist board network is excellent. The Scottish Tourist Board is represented on all area tourist board committees at local level; at national level, co-ordination is achieved through the Scottish Confederation of Tourism, and through joint management meetings, working groups and newsletters.

Current joint promotional schemes include Scotland's travel trade fair, roadshows and exhibitions, and a major new joint advertising campaign.

National Farmers Union (Meeting)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the president and officers of the National Farmers Union of Scotland to discuss the problems of the livestock and dairy sectors in the industry; and what was the outcome of that meeting.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend met the president of the National Farmers' Union of Scotland on Tuesday 20 March for a useful discussion on the full range of the 1985-86 common agricultural policy price proposals, in which the livestock and dairy sectors featured prominently.

Roads Programme

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the up-to-date roads programme for which he has responsibility for (a) the Grampian region and (b) Banff and Buchan constituency.

Mr. Ancram: In addition to the Laurencekirk bypass and the Scotston to Candy schemes on the A94 which are now under construction, the Scottish Development Department's trunk road programme includes the following major road improvement schemes in Grampian region:

Route and Scheme	*Expected to be ready to start in financial year
A92 —Tipperty	1986-87
A92 —Ellon Bypass	1986-87
A92 —Murcar to Balmedie	1986-87
A94 —Candy to Stonehaven	1986-87
A952—Inverugie to Balmoor†	1987-88
A952—Midmill†	1987-88
A96 —Bucksburn to Tyrebagger	1986-87
A96 —Forres Bypass	1986-87
A96 —Inverurie Bypass	1987-88

* Actual start dates for schemes depend on the satisfactory completion of design and statutory procedures and on the availability of finance within the Scottish Trunk Road Programme.

† Schemes within the constituency of Banff and Buchan.

Teachers (Dispute)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the number of pupil hours lost in Scotland as a result of the present teachers' pay dispute.

Mr. Allan Stewart: We estimate that approximately 4 million pupil hours were lost between 15 January and 14 March 1985 as a result of strike action by Scottish teachers.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the most recent arrangements he has made, in the light of the strike by certain teachers' unions, for pupils in Scotland entered for (a) the SCE examinations and (b) the CSE examinations; and what are the implications of these arrangements for pupils engaged in standard grade courses.

Mr. Allan Stewart: In view of the instructions which were given by certain unions to Scottish teachers to disrupt procedures associated with the Scottish Certificate of Education examinations in 1985 the Scottish Examination Board put in hand a number of contingency arrangements which were set out in the answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Corrie) on 4 February, at columns 430-31. In addition, the board announced on 7 March that it would, exceptionally, extend its appeal arrangements to allow loss of teaching time before the examinations to be taken into account and to allow appeals for band A and B awards from schools which have suffered seriously from closures this session, provided that in the judgment of the head teacher the disruption was severe enough to have had a significantly adverse effect on the candidate's performance in the examination. The board's awarding standards will be maintained, however, and appeals decisions will depend on the evidence available in terms of either class work or examination script performance.

I understand that those authorities which have a policy of presenting certain candidates for the Certificate of Secondary Education examinations operated by the English examination boards are discussing the possible problems with the examination board concerned and are considering what steps might be taken to safeguard the interests of the pupils.

In addition the Scottish Education Department has written to all education authorities asking them urgently to take steps to limit the harm being done in the present dispute to the prospects of those pupils who are due to sit public examinations this year and next.

The Government is giving urgent consideration to the implications of the teachers' boycott of curriculum development for those pupils now studying standard grade courses for first certification in 1986. Our principal concern is that the arrangements should give all pupils fair opportunity for certification which recognises their achievements, whether or not they have been affected by the teachers' actions; and a further announcement will be made as soon as possible.

Road Construction

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when the dual carriageway from Perth to Aberdeen will be completed; and if he has any plans to extend this route to include a dual carriageway from Aberdeen to Peterhead, St. Fergus and Fraserburgh.

Mr. Ancram: On present plans, approximately nine-tenths of the Perth-Aberdeen route should be dual carriageway by the end of the decade and the remainder will be completed as soon as possible thereafter. Dual carriageway proposals north of Aberdeen are in hand for the A92 at Tipperty, between Murcar and Balmedie, and on the southern section of Ellon bypass. The Scottish Development Department has no plans to extend the dual carriageway beyond Ellon to Peterhead, St. Fergus and Fraserburgh.

Replacement Hip Operation (Cost)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the average cost of a replacement hip operation at a National Health Service hospital in Aberdeen inclusive of all medical and other ancillary charges; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The average cost of a replacement hip operation at Woodend hospital—the only hospital in Aberdeen at which this type of operation is performed—is £776.

Teachers (Pay)

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average salary of (a) full-time primary school teachers and (b) full-time secondary school teachers, excluding those in promoted posts, in each year since 1973; and if he will give the figures in current prices and in constant prices as at April 1984.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Information about the average salaries of unpromoted teachers and separate figures for primary and secondary teachers prior to 1978 are not available. Details of the average salaries of all teachers from 1978 are set out in the table below:

Average Salary of Full Time Teachers

	Primary		Secondary
At October	£	*Value at April 1984 £	£	*Value at April 1984 £
1978	4,313	7,959	5,349	9,871
1979	4,761	8,035	5,904	9,964
1980	6,868	9,791	8,037	11,458
1981	7,560	9,534	8,725	11,003
1982	8,094	9,113	9,274	10,442
1983	8,614	9,243	9,800	10,515
1984	†9,049	9,236	†10,155	10,365

* Values are based on the movement in the Retail Price Index between January of the relevant year and April 1984.

† Figures for 1984 are estimated as one return is still outstanding.

Urban Aid Programme (Glasgow)

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give early consideration and approval of the urban aid programme submitted by Glasgow district council to his Department on 15 February for a director of the Woodlands Community Trust to assist the revitalisation of this area.

Mr. Ancram: An application for the Woodlands Community Trust project was received from Glasgow district council on 20 February along with other applications. It has been examined but additional information has still to be provided. The Scottish Development Department will be discussing the application with Glasgow district council in the near future.

Peterhead Prison

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what investigation he has initiated into the causes of the disturbances at Peterhead prison in January and March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: I have, as is usual in such cases, called for reports from the governor. Criminal proceedings are still pending as a result of both disturbances.

Revaluation

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions during the last 20 years a revaluation has taken place; and on how many occasions the results of a revaluation have been implemented.

Mr. Ancram: In relation to all the revaluations in Scotland in the last 20 years—in 1966, 1971, 1978 and 1985 — the results have been implemented. The revaluations of 1978 and 1985 would each have been two years earlier if special steps had not been taken to postpone them.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Attendance Allowance

32. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the procedures by which medical officers assess claims for attendance allowance in Wales.

Mr. Newton: The procedures used in Wales for deciding the medical conditions for attendance allowance are identical to those used in other parts of Great Britain. They are kept under review to identify areas where improvements can be made but we have no reason to believe they are unsatisfactory. If the hon. Member has a particular difficulty in mind and will write to me I shall be happy to look into it.

Mr. Higgins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will investigate the reasons why an application for attendance allowance by a constituent of the right hon. Member for Worthing has taken more than six months to process; and if he will take steps to reduce the delay in processing such applications.

Mr. Newton: I regret that, without the necessary identity details, it has not proved possible to trace the application to which my right hon. Friend refers. If he will let me have the details, I shall have the matter investigated and write to him.

With regard to the general position, we have taken a number of steps to speed up the processing of claims for attendance allowance. Currently, the average time taken to deal with an initial application is 10 weeks. This applies to about 95 per cent. of all cases dealt with. Reviews following disallowance take longer because of the need to obtain further medical evidence in support of the claim.

Polish Home

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many residents and staff there were in the Polish home run by his Department in 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980 and the present time; and how much the Polish home cost, gross and net, in the latest financial year for which figures are available.

Mr. Whitney: The numbers of residents and staff in the Ilford Park Polish home for the years in question were as follows:

	Residents	Staff
31 March 1965	480	*
31 March 1970	374	44½
31 March 1975	281	79
31 March 1980	199	78
March 1985	133	63

* Information not available.

These figures include residents formerly housed on the site on a self-contained basis; they exclude nursing staff employed by the Torbay district health authority in the hospital unit.

The cost of running the home for the year 1983-84 was £1,116,530 gross, £704,279 net.

Board and Lodging Payments

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from directors of institutions for the elderly and mentally disturbed concerning his recent decision to impose a freeze on all board and lodgings payments for residents.

Mr. Whitney: I assume the hon. Member has in mind the proposals on supplementary benefit board and lodging payments which we referred to the Social Security Advisory Committee for consultation in November last year. A list of all those who made representations to the committee is included in its report which was published on 21 March (Cmnd. 9466).

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make it his policy to allow a period of at least one month between publishing new board and lodging payment regulations and their implementation.

Mr. Whitney: I refer the hon. Member to my hon. Friend's statement to the House on 21 March, at column 1008.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many (a) single people aged 16 or 17 years, (b) single people aged between 18 and 25 years, (c) single people aged between 26 years and retirement age, (d) single people aged over retirement age, (e) couples without dependent children, (f) single parents with one dependent child, (g) single parents with two dependent children, (h) single parents with three or more dependent children, (i) couples with one dependent child, (j) couples with two dependent children, and (k) couples with three or more dependent children in receipt of supplementary benefit were assessed as boarders living in (i) private rented accommodation, (ii) bed and breakfast accommodation and hotels, (iii) hostels and (iv) common lodging houses in (a) December 1982 and (b) December 1983; and if he will give this information for Great Britain as a whole, and for each social security region;

(2) what were the average weekly supplementary benefit payments, exlusive of personal allowances, paid to (a) single people, (b) couples without dependent children, (c) single parents with one dependent child, (d) single parents with two dependent children, (e) single parents with three or more dependent children, (f) couples with one dependent child, (g) couples with two dependent children and (h) couples with three or more dependent children who were assessed as boarders living in (i) private rented accommodation, (ii) bed and breakfast accommodation and hotels, (iii) hostels and (iv) common lodging houses in (a) December 1982 and (b) December 1983; and if he will give this information for Great Britain as a whole, and for each social security region.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what were the total supplementary benefit payments, exclusive of personal allowances, paid to (a) single people aged 16 or 17 years, (b) single people aged between 18 and 25 years, (c) single people aged between 26 years and retirement age, (d) single people aged over retirement age, (e) couples without dependent children, (f) single parents with one dependent child, (g) single parents with two dependent children, (h) single parents with three or more dependent children, (i) couples with one dependent child, (j) couples with two dependent children and (k) couples with three or more dependent children assessed as boarders living in (i) private rented accommodation, (ii) bed and breakfast and hotel accommodation, (iii) hostels and (iv) common lodging houses during (a) the calendar years 1982, 1983 and 1984 and (b) the financial years 1981-82, 1982-83 and 1983-84; and if he will give this information for Great Britain as a whole, and for each social security region.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that the information requested is not available.

NHS (Private Patients)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidelines he has issued to regional health authorities to scrutinise procedures for monitoring and charging private patients for treatment within the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) on 21 March, at column 592.

NHS (Spectacles)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to monitor the level of prices in respect of spectacles after the proposed abolition of National Health Service glasses; and what criteria will be used in deciding which citizens, apart from students under the age of 19 years and social security claimants and children under the age of 16 years, will be eligible for assistance in meeting the cost of buying frames and lenses privately by means of the vouchers which will be available from his Department's offices.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We wish to observe the development of the new market in spectacles before we take final decisions on the nature, scope and date of introduction of the voucher or cash aid system which will eventually replace the general ophthalmic services supply arrangements.

AIDS

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of acquired immune deficiency syndrome have occurred in West Yorkshire in each of the last three years; and in which district health authority area they have occurred.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: There have been no known cases of acquired immune deficiency syndrome in West Yorkshire in the last three years.

Inequalities in Health

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why, pursuant to his reply of 14 March, Official Report, column 241, it is no longer possible to produce costings compatible with the figures given earlier for the Black report's recommendations 10, 12, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28 and 29; and what is the likely present cost of implementing the same recommendations.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The estimates given earlier of the costs of implementing these recommendations were either updatings of figures given in the report, which themselves were not always precise estimates, or were based on arbitrary assumptions about demography and benefit rates. Since the Black report was produced in 1980, there have been policy changes which affect what might be involved in implementing these recommendations, and there is more recent demographic information. The earlier estimates do not therefore form a realistic basis for further useful estimates. The recommendations would certainly result in expenditure on a scale which it would be unrealistic to contemplate and we do not consider the work of producing detailed estimates of present costs would be justified.

Community Health Councils

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his policy regarding misconduct as it relates to the dismissal of community health council members under regulations which will become effective on 1 April.

Mr. John Patten: Under the new Community Health Council Regulations it will be for each regional health authority to determine, in the light of views sought from the appointing body and the community health council itself, whether the personal or professional misconduct of a CHC member renders him unfit to be a member and therefore justifies dismissal. The provision was introduced following criticism in the courts of its absence from earlier regulations. Copies of the National Health Service (Community Health Council) Regulations 1985 and the explanatory circular HC(85)11 are in the Library.

Drug Misuse

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much of the £10 million central initiative for drug misusers has (a) been applied for and (b) been allocated.

Mr. John Patten: To date £7·5 million has been approved.

Tranquillisers and Sedatives

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will undertake an inquiry into the incidence of addiction to prescribed tranquillisers and sedatives in different parts of the United Kingdom.

Mr. John Patten: We have no plans to undertake an inquiry. We are, however, aware of research being carried out into dependence on prescribed tranquillisers and sedatives at the institute of psychiatry at the Maudsley hospital.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the number of persons addicted to prescribed tranquillisers and sedatives.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Severe Weather Payments

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will publish in the Official Report a table similar to that shown in paragraph 7429 of the "S Manual," covering the period from 6 January to 9 March for each area affected by the exceptionally severe weather conditions.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is set out by weather station in the following table. The DHSS local offices served by each weather station were listed in my reply to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) on 18 February, at columns 389-93.

North-West RHA (Membership)

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many of the Minister's nominations to the North-West regional health authority over the last 10 years from Bolton have had political affiliations to Labour, Conservative or other political parties; and when the last person with Labour political affiliations was nominated.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Since we appoint all regional health authority chairmen and members for their personal qualities and not to represent sectional or particular interests, we do not hold full records of political affiliations.

Private Nursing Homes

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people over the statutory retirement age are currently residing in private nursing homes in Cheshire the charges for which are borne wholly or partly by his Department.

Mr. Whitney: Separate figures for supplementary pensioners in private nursing homes in Cheshire are not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total cost to the Government of subsidising the maintenance charges for elderly people in private nursing homes in each of the last three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Whitney: Expenditure on supplementary pensioners in private and voluntary residential care and nursing homes, based on December figures for each year, is as follows:

	£ million
1981	23
1982	34
*1983	90

* Provisional.
Source: Annual Statistical Inquiries.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people over the statutory retirement age are currently resident in private nursing homes in England and Wales and for whom maintenance costs are borne wholly or partly by the Department of Health and Social Security.

Mr. Whitney: Information is not available in the form requested. At December 1983 it is provisionally estimated that some 23,000 pensioners were resident in private and voluntary residential care and nursing homes in Great Britain and were in receipt of supplementary benefit.

Dental Treatment

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services to what factors he attributes the fall in the numbers of teeth crowned by general dental practitioners in England and Wales in 1983.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It is not possible to be definite, but it is very likely that the rise in the price of gold made it uneconomic for a time to prescribe gold crowns. The number of teeth crowned in 1984 however was higher than in 1982.

Therapists

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current shortfall of funded posts for occupational therapists in the National Health Service in total and percentage terms; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Figures in the form requested are not available centrally, but the results of a recent sample survey by health authorities suggest that nationally about 15 per cent. of funded posts for occupational therapists were unfilled after three months.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. John Browne asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will consider the establishment of a local forum in which health authorities can adjudicate individual demands for exceptions to his revised prescribed list of drugs.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are currently discussing with the medical profession the need for and the possible form of an appeal mechanism which would enable a doctor to prescribe drugs not on our selected list at National Health Service expense in exceptional circumstances.

Legal Aid

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether that part of the L code which deals with section 22 of the Legal Aid Act is currently being rewritten; and who is being consulted about it.

Mr. Newton: The rewriting of that part of the L code which deals with section 22 of the Legal Aid Act 1974 has not yet commenced. The L code consists of departmental technical and management instructions for which external consultation is not appropriate.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now revoke that part of the L code that deals with section 22 of the Legal Aid Act.

Mr. Newton: The reference to section 22 of the Legal Aid Act 1974 in the L code will be considered when the relevant part of the code is rewritten. Meanwhile, the authority for legal and assessment officers to pass information to other officers for purposes not specified in section 22(1) of the Legal Aid Act 1974 remains suspended.

Earnings-related Pension

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the total saving in each year until 2000 from the abolition of the state earnings-related pension scheme.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Child Benefit

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the cost in a full financial year of raising child benefit by (a) 6 per cent. and (b) in line with the rise in tax thresholds.

Mr. Whitney: It would cost £200 million to raise child benefit by 6 per cent. and £320 million to raise it in line with the percentage increase in the married man's tax allowance announced in the Budget statement.

Supplementary Benefit (Young Persons)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his most recent estimate of the total yearly cost of supplementary benefit payments to 16 and 17-year-olds; and how many are currently claiming benefit.

Mr. Newton: The most recent estimate of supplementary benefit expenditure on 16 and 17-year-olds is that given in my reply to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) on 11 January, at column 572. The number of 16 and 17-year-olds receiving supplementary benefit at December 1983, the most recent date for which figures are available, was 174,000.

Youth Training

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the precise savings involved in supplementary benefits as a result of the introduction of the second year of the youth training scheme.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) on 22 March, at columns 644-46.

NHS (Pay Scales)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many persons working in the National Health Service are paid less than at a full-time rate of £80 a week, how many of these are full-time or part-time, how many in each case are paid respectively £10, £20, £30 or £40 less than £80 a week, and what would be the cost of raising the incomes of all these persons to £80 a week?

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 18 March 1985, c. 382.]: Information is not available in the form requested. Following is the estimated proportion of full-time staff (including students and trainees) receiving average gross weekly earnings in the pay bands shown:

Average gross Weekly earnings	Percentage of total full-time staff
Under £41	—*
Under £51	0·1(1)

Average gross Weekly earnings	Percentage of total full-time staff
Under £61	0·3(2)
Under £71	1·6(2)
Under £81	5·4

* Less than 0·05 per cent.

(1) Includes apprentice engineers, plumbers and electricians aged 16, and some ancillaries aged 16 or 17.

(2) As for (1), plus clerical officers, typists and machine operators aged 16 or 17 and student technicians.

The estimates are based on returns supplied by 10 English regions and include unpaid absences.

Information is not available on the cost of raising to £80 per week all incomes below £80 and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Cohort Studies (Funding)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will list in the Official Report the cohort studies currently receiving funding from his Department, giving the name of the research body, the name and subject of the research and the amount of funding from his Department in the current year and in total; when the funding is due to expire; and what plans he has to renew it in each case.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 20 March 1985, c. 503]: Following is the information:

Pharmaceutical Price Regulation Scheme

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) why the National Health Service pays for the sales promotion expenditure of companies within the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme at the rate of 9 per cent. of the value of the industry's sales to the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme will be next reviewed; and if he will make a statement;

(3) whether expenditure on advertising expended by the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry in opposing his limited drugs list proposals will be an allowable expenses within the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme; and if he will make a statement;

(4) pursuant to his reply of 28 February, Official Report, column 273, why allowable sales promotion expenditure of companies within the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme is to be reduced to 9 per cent. of the industry's sales to the National Health Service; how the current figure of 10 per cent. was arrived at; when he next plans to review its level; and if he will make a statement;

(5) pursuant to his replies of 25 February, Official Report, column 71, and 28 February, Official Report, column 272, what steps his Department took in the latest year for which complete returns are available to satisfy itself that expenditure incurred by companies within the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme on representatives, advertising, literature and information items was reasonable; when the last comprehensive review of such expenditure took place; and if he will make a statement;

(6) pursuant to his reply of 28 February, Official Report, column 273, if he will explain the nature of the ad hoc formula which is used to control sales promotion expenditure within the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme; how the formula is applied; what are its components; and if he will make a statement;

(7) pursuant to his answer of 9 January, Offocial Report, column 497, what steps his Department takes to satisfy itself that gifts offered by drugs companies and received by general practitioners do not contravene the advice given by the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry; and if he will make a statement;

(8) how he satisfies himself that expenditure on representatives by companies within the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme is reasonable; what assumptions he makes for this purpose about the level and manner of the remuneration of representatives; what is the source of the information upon which he bases these assumptions; and if he will make a statement;

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 18 March 1985, c. 385-87]: Formal limitations on sales promotion expenditure which may, under the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme, be accepted as a legitimate cost in the pricing of National Health Service medicines were first introduced in 1976-77. The limit was initially 12 per cent. of industry turnover, reduced by stages to 10 per cent. in 1979-80. As I announced on 8 December 1983, at column 477-78, from 1 April 1985 the limit is being further reduced to 9 per cent. of turnover as one of a number of measures to achieve savings in the National Health Service drugs bill. The formula for applying the overall limit to individual companies will be a fixed sum of £550,000 plus 6 per cent. of turnover. Companies exceeding the limit will be asked to pay to our Department an amount equivalent to the excess.

This means that control is exercised by laying down a maximum level of permitted expenditure, with a financial penalty for exceeding it. Companies decide how best within the code of practice and other constraints to promote their products. We do not involve ourselves in such details as the remuneration of sales representatives.

Information expenses covering such items as issue of data sheets, samples and material for medical symposia are not classed as sales promotion and are therefore dealt with outside the formula described above. They are subject to a general test of reasonableness: where expenditure is judged to be unreasonably high a proportion may be disallowed. For details of information expenses in 1982 I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to him on 25 February, at column 71-72.

As regards gifts offered by pharmaceutical companies, I refer him to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and the Border (Mr. Maclean) on 9 January, at column 497.

The expenditure incurred by companies in supporting the campaign of the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry against the introduction of a selected list of medicines for prescription under the National Health Service will certainly not be treated as an admissible expense under the pharmaceutical price regulations scheme.

Control of sales promotion costs and other aspects of the operation of the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme will be reviewed from time to time.

General Practitioners (Income and Expenses)

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) pursuant to the reply of 28 February, Official Report, column 272, if he will list the expenses incurred by general practitioners which fall within those described as directly reimbursed expenses; how general practitioners claim such expenses; and if he will make a statement;

(2) pursuant to his reply of 28 February, Official Report, column 272, if he will itemise the services, in respect of which general practitioners were reimbursed indirectly £9,290 in 1983-84; if he will describe the system by which this money is claimed and paid; and if he will make a statement;

(3) pursuant to his reply of 28 February, Official Report, column 272, what was the average total sum which general practitioners actually received from the National Health Service and from all other sources of public money for which he has responsibility, by way of income, fees, expenses or other payments (a) in the period from 1 April 1983 to 31 December 1983 (grossed up to give an annual fugure) and (b) in the year from 1 January 1984.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 18 March 1985, c. 385-87]: Direct reimbursement of expenses incurred in providing general medical services which are allowed by the Inland Revenue may be claimed on the appropriate forms from family practitioner committees for the following:

—trainee practitioner scheme payments;
—the cost of supplying most drugs and appliances;
—doctors' retainer scheme payments;
— the cost of employing locums during a sickness, confinement or prolonged study leave;
—the costs of practice accommodation;
—part of the salaries of certain ancillary staff.

All other allowable general medical services expenses are automatically reimbursed indirectly on an average basis through fees and allowances.

The average sum received by unrestricted general medical practitioners in England in the period 1 April 1983 to 31 December 1983 (grossed up to an annual figure) for the provision of family practitioner services was £41,872. Similarly for the year 1 January 1984 to 31 December 1984 the average sum was £45,588.

Records of sums received by general medical practitioners from health authorities and other sources of public moneys for which my right hon. Friend has responsibility are not held centrally.

VDUs (Health Hazards)

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether his Department will be undertaking research into the health risks for men working on visual display units;

(2) what steps his Department is taking to investigate possible hazards for women working on unprotected visual display units.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have been asked to reply.

The Health and Safety Executive published a research paper in 1980 and a guidance note in 1983, both of which consider the health aspects of operating VDUs. Further guidance is to be published shortly. Current work being undertaken by the executive includes studies on skin problems in VDU operators, possible reproductive problems, the ergonomic design of VDU equipment and the design of workplaces and lighting for VDU operation. The commissioning of further research into aspects of VDU job design is being considered. The Health and Safety Executive continues to keep the subject under review.

NATIONAL FINANCE

EC (Shipping Investment)

Sir Paul Bryan asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has as to the fiscal and other financial regimes applicable to investment in shipping in each of the member countries of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Moore: A study of this subject has been undertaken by the OECD Maritime Transport Committee. I shall arrange for details obtained in connection with that study to be sent to my hon. Friend.

Sir Paul Bryan asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the net present value to the shipowner of the fiscal regimes applicable to investment in shipping in each of the member countries of the European Economic Community, expressed as a proportion of the capital and running costs of a typical ship.

Mr. Moore: Official estimates are not available. I understand that work on this subject has been commissioned by the General Council of British Shipping.

Shipping Industry

Sir Paul Bryan asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received from hon. Members urging the case for improved tax treatment for British shipping; and how many he has received urging him to resist such treatment.

Mr. Moore: Hon. Members have referred to me some 26 representations made to them seeking improved tax treatment for British shipping. Thirteen hon. Members have themselves expressed support. Further views were made known when the shipping industry was debated in the House on 17 December. I am not aware of any other representations on the subject.

Technological Equipment (Tax Concessions)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received advocating tax concessions to firms to encourage them to provide technological equipment to universities.

Mr. Moore: A small number. Tax relief is already available for payments for technical education directly connected with the donor's trade and this covers donations of equipment.

Civil Servants (Pensions)

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the cost of counting in full for pension purposes all service, both unestablished and established, for all serving and retired civil servants (a) immediately, (b) immediately, but with no recalculation of the lump sum payment nor of pension arrears for retired civil servants and (c) on a phased implementation basis over 20 years starting with those retirees over the age of 80 years and with no recalculation of the lump sum nor of pension arrears.

Mr. Hayhoe: An estimate of the cost of allowing unestablished service before 14 July 1949 to reckon in full for Civil Service pension purposes, including the cost of arrears of pension and increased lump sums, is not available. If no arrears of pension were paid to those who have already retired and there is no change in the basis of calculating lump sum retirement benefits, it has been estimated that the first year cost would be of the order of £34 million. Figures based on a phased implementation over 20 years are not available. If the change were made over 10 years, starting with those now aged 70 and over, the first year cost would be about £18 million. The total cost over 25 years has been estimated to be of the order of £550 million, or £460 million if implementation were phased over 10 years.

EC (Contributions and Receipts)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total amount paid by the United Kingdom to the European Economic Community and the total amount received by the United Kingdom in grant during the calendar year 1984.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Payments to the European Community in 1984 total £3,259 million. Receipts including refunds total £2,837 million.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer by what sum the total contributions and payments made by the United Kingdom to the Common Market since 1 January 1973 have exceeded the grants and subsidies received by the United Kingdom from that body over the entire period; and if he will express the net sum as an amount per day of membership.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Net payments in the period 1 January 1973 to 31 December 1984 amounted to £5,458 million. This is about £1·245 million a day since accession.

Whisky and Fuel (Duty)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will indicate the total payable in tax and duties on a bottle of whisky at 40 per cent. volume, 75 cl; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report the total payable in duties and tax of all kinds on (a) four star, (b) three star and (c) two star petrol, and also the total payable in duties and tax of all kinds on Derv oil, expressed in pence and percentages against the new average selling price per gallon.

Mr. Hayhoe: The information is as follows:

	Typical price	Duty and VAT	Percentage
Bottle of whisky	£7·75	£5·74	74
Petrol per gallon
(a) four star	202·5p	108·0p	53
(b) three star	202·5p	107·7p	54
(c) two star	198·4p	107·4p	54
Derv	200·8p	95·1p	47

The Budget increases in the duty on petrol and derv do no more than keep pace with inflation. The increase in the duty on whisky is well below the rate of inflation, in recognition of the current difficulties of the Scotch whisky industry.

Development Land Tax

Mr. Bell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will assess the impact of the abolition of development land tax on the jobs of those in the Civil Service who levy the tax.

Mr. Moore: About 200 fewer staff will be needed in all as a result of the abolition of development land tax (DLT). Alternative posts will be sought for the 80 staff currently working at Middlesbrough. Everything possible will be done to redeploy staff in accordance with their preferences, and it is hoped that a number of the staff will be found vacancies locally, although some in the mobile grades may move to Inland Revenue offices in other parts of the country.

The other savings arise from a reduction in the DLT work in the local valuation offices throughout Great Britain. This reduction will be taken into account in determining the staffing levels needed in those offices.

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what impact the abolition of development land tax will have upon Civil Service employment, particularly in Cleveland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: About 200 fewer staff will be needed in all as a result of the abolition of development land tax (DLT). As the work runs down, the 80 staff in the DLT Office at Middlesbrough will be available to fill vacancies in other Inland Revenue offices, so far as possible in the Middlesbrough area. Around 120 fewer staff will be needed in Valuation Offices throughout Great Britain. The reduction in DLT work will be taken into account in determining the staffing levels required in those offices.

Civil Servants (Pay)

Mr. Robert C. Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average salary for civil servants in the executive officer grade for each year since 1973 in current prices and constant 1983-84 prices.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Tax Exemption

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people in Scotland will now be exempt from tax as a result of his Budget statement.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

MIRAS

Mr. Stern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library copies of any circulars or official statements of practice or statements of intention issued by the Inland Revenue to major lenders in connection with the mortgage interest tax relief at source scheme in February.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Youth Training

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what basis he has concluded that the difference between net costs and gross costs in the introduction of the second year of youth training is £60 million in 1986-87 and £150 million in 1987-88.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Revaluation

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer on how many occasions during the last 20 years a revaluation has taken place; and on how many occasions the results of a revaluation have been implemented.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Johnson Matthey

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take steps to ensure that his review of the supervisory arrangements for the banking system investigates whether Johnson Matthey was warned by the director of the International Maritime Bureau of the risks of lending money to Mr. Mahoud Sipra from 1982 onwards.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

DEFENCE

West Midlands

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has plans to visit defence installations in the west midlands.

Mr. Butler: My right hon. Friend has no immediate plans to do so.

Royal Artillery Units

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of war establishment of Royal Artillery units is provided by Regular Army reservists.

Mr. Lee: 12·7 per cent. of the total war establishment of all Royal Artillery field force units is provided by Regular Army reservists. The percentage varies between types of regiment.

Artillery Ammunition

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current number of days provision of artillery ammunition at the initial anticipated expenditure rate presently held in stock; what plans he has for increasing this; what is the time schedule in which such increase will be achieved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: I regret that this information is classified.

Royal Artillery Guns

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Royal Artillery guns presently are not deployed for training due to shortage of manpower.

Mr. Lee: 48 Royal Artillery guns are not deployed for training because they are manned by unit reinforcements on mobilisation.

Dassault Falcon

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he anticipates that the Dassault Falcon aircraft leased by Flight Refuelling Ltd. for use at Royal Navy air station, Yeovilton, by the Fleet Air Arm will receive Civil Aviation Authority registration; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The Falcon aircraft which Flight Refuelling Ltd. will be using to undertake tasks for the Fleet Air Arm are registered with the Federal Aviation Administration. There is no requirement for them to be registered in the United Kingdom for this role. However, the Ministry of Defence, as customer for the service, have asked the Civil Aviation Authority to satisfy themselves that the aircraft in question continue to meet appropriate standards. Agreement has been reached accordingly.

Forkhill Military Base, Armagh

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for Defence what improvements have been carried out at the British military base at Forkhill in County Armagh since 1979; what is the purpose of these improvements; and what is the cost.

Mr. Lee: Between 1978 and 1982 the Royal Engineers constructed a permanent building, replacing temporary ones, at the joint RUC/military base at Forkhill, County Armagh at a cost of £1 million. Since 1982 a number of other minor improvements have been undertaken at a further cost of approximately £200,000, which includes some £50,000 for the purchase of previously requisitioned land and some £100,000 for the demolition of disused buildings.

Insurance Business

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements have been made to transfer his Department's claims records held by General Accident either back to his Department or to any new insurance company with effect from 1 April.

Mr. Lee: The question of transfer of records does not arise, as General Accident will remain responsible after the period of the present contract for business which arose within it.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the value of the insurance business conducted, and premiums paid, by his Department for each of the past three financial years; and what were the costs in the previous three financial years.

Mr. Lee: The sums concerned are a matter of commercial confidence between the Ministry of Defence and its insurers.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the option of performing his Department's insurance responsibilities in-house was costed and considered either before, after or when outside tenders were being assessed.

Mr. Lee: Yes, in-house costs were prepared independently and prior to receipt of commercial tenders, and were considered concurrently with them.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the arrangements his Department is making to transfer its insurance business from General Accident to Guardian Royal Exchange as from 1 April.

Mr. Lee: The intention to transfer this Department's claims work in the United Kingdom in the fields of motor accident and employers' liability to the commercial insurance market was announced on 5 March 1982, at column 245. The contract then placed was for the three-year period 1 April 1982 to 31 March 1985. Competitive tendering has recently been concluded for new contracts for three years from 1 April 1985 resulting in a change of insurance brokers and underwriters.

Nuclear Weapon Testing (Cavanagh Report)

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now publish the Cavanagh report reviewing the Conseil Européen pour la Recherché Nucléaire weapons testing ranges; and if he will make a statement about the reason for the delay in publication so far.

Mr. Butler: My right hon. Friend has no responsibility for the work of the Conseil Européen pour la Recherché Nucléaire.

Claims Commission (Contract)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence why the trade union side of his Department was not consulted about the placing of a further contract for the work of the Claims Commission.

Mr. Butler: Competitive tendering, including both in-house costing and external tenders, indicated that the financial advantage of contract operation remained. No new issues of principle or substance were involved. There was therefore no requirement to consult the trade unions on placing of a further contract.

Animals (Experiments)

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is able, without compromising security, to give figures for the numbers of animals killed during experiments on chemical and biological warfare experiments at Porton Down in 1984 or for the latest period for which figures are available.

Mr. Lee: Records of experiments involving animals are maintained in a form suitable to meet the requirement that the number of such experiments should be reported to the Home Office annually. Information in the form requested is therefore not readily available, but the vast majority of animals used in experiments are killed. In 1983 the total number of animal experiments conducted at the chemical defence establishment, Porton Down, was about 9,500, the majority of which were in the chemical defence field. The figure for 1984 will be available shortly and I will write to the hon. Gentleman.

Departmental Scientific Staff

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the role and composition of the strategic performance analysis group in the scientific staff in his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: The strategic systems performance analysis and assessment group is part of the defence scientific staff of the Ministry of Defence.

It provides a monitoring and advisory role on certain scientific matters relating to the operation of the United Kingdom strategic deterrent.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the nature, composition and responsibility of the Defence Science Division 6, assessments, nuclear materials and wastes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: Defence Science Division 6, now designated Science (Nuclear), is part of the Defence scientific staff of the Ministry of Defence. It is responsible for providing scientific and technical advice on aspects of defence nuclear policy.

Atomic Control Office (London)

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the nature and composition and responsibility of the positions at the atomic control office (London); and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: The atomic control office (London) is part of the defence scientific staff of the Ministry of Defence. It is responsible for part of the day-to-day administration of the bilateral agreement of July 1958 between the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States of America for co-operation on the uses of atomic energy for mutual defence purposes—Cmnd. 537, as amended.

Nuclear Bases

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many bases exist in Scotland which are concerned with the storage or deployment of nuclear weapons; and how many such bases exist in the rest of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Butler: It has been the policy of successive Governments neither to confirm nor deny the presence of nuclear weapons at particular locations.

Drug Misuse

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many disciplinary proceedings concerning drug misuse have resulted in discharge from duty of serving members of the armed forces during the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Lee: The number of service personnel discharged from the armed forces for drug related offences in 1984 was as follows:

	Number
Royal Navy/Royal Marines	13
Army	63
Royal Air Force	55
Total	131

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what manpower and financial resources are currently available for the treatment of drug misuse within the armed forces.

Mr. Lee: There are no manpower or financial resources devoted solely to the medical treatment of drug misuse within the armed forces. Such treatment is found within the overall resources available for all types of medical treatment required by the services.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many serving members of the armed forces have been the subject of disciplinary procedures for drug misuse in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Lee: The numbers of serving members of the armed forces who have been the subject of disciplinary procedures are not centrally available. However, the number of armed forces personnel convicted in military and civilian proceedings on drug-related offences in the years in question is as follows:

Convictions for drug offences

	All services	*Royal Navy/ Royal Marines	Army†	Royal Air Force
1980	153	100	39	14
1981	202	100	70	32
1982	122	36	69	17
1983	190	61	114	15
1984	336	44	149	143

* Excludes conviction in civilian courts; includes three Marines for 1983 charged under the Army Act.

† The 1982 figure includes one officer.

Chief of Defence Procurement

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those commercial firms from which the Chief of Defence Procurement has recently resigned his directorships.

Mr. Butler: Before taking up his appointment as Chief of Defence Procurement, Mr. Peter Levene resigned all his directorships of United Scientific Holdings plc and its subsidiaries. He does not hold any other directorships.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Overseas Aid

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards proposals for transferring the United Kingdom overseas aid programme to the responsibility of the European Commission.

Mr. Raison: I am not aware of any such proposals.

ENERGY

Energy Prices

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Energy what was the average domestic price per unit of (a) gas, (b) electricity and (c) domestic fuel oil in (i) May 1979, (ii) May 1984 and (iii) January 1985.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The information requested is given in the table.

	May 1979	April 1983	May 1984	January 1985
Average price of gas (including standing charge) to domestic credit meter consumers in Great Britain using 400 therms per annum
Pence per therm	17·9	43·0	44·7	44·7
Average price of electricity (including standing charge) to consumers in England and Wales on the standard domestic tariff using 3,300 kWh per annum
Pence per kWh	3·191	5·924	6·027	6·027
Average price of standard grade burning oil
Pence per litre	9·90	22·08	18·99	21·60

Sources: BGC; Electricity Council; Department of Energy.

The April 1983 figures illustrate that since then gas and electricity prices have actually fallen in real terms.

Redundant Mineworkers

Mr. Maude asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will take steps to ensure that mineworkers who have been disqualified from receiving unemployment benefit after taking voluntary redundancy under the redundant mineworkers payments scheme during the recent dispute suffer no financial loss as a result of accepting in good faith the National Coal Board's offer of redundancy.

Mr. David Hunt: All claims for national insurance benefits are decided by independent adjudicating authorities specially appointed under the Social Security Act. I am continuing to monitor the position of mineworkers who have accepted redundancy but who have been disqualified from receiving unemployment benefit because of the dispute.

Nuclear Reactors

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy what research he is sponsoring into the use of fuels other than plutonium for fast breeder nuclear reactors.

Mr. Goodlad: None.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Social Security Commissioner (Appeals)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Attorney-General how many decisions were made in 1984 by the Social Security Commissioner on appeals (a) by the Secretary of State for Social Services and (b) by the claimant, for the decision of a medical appeals tribunal concerning mobility allowance; and in what numbers of cases the appeal (i) succeeded and (ii) resulted in award of the allowance.

The Attorney-General: No decisions were made on appeals by the Secretary of State and 62 on appeals by the claimant. Fifty-one appeals, including one association appeal, succeeded. I understand that the information requested regarding the actual award of the allowance is not immediately available, but I will write to the right hon. Member shortly.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Attorney-General if he will give details of the average time taken to grant leave of appeal to the Social Security Commissioners in cases concerning (a) mobility allowance and (b) attendance allowance; and if he will in each case also give details of the average time between receipt of an appeal after leave to appeal has been granted and a decision on that appeal.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor will write to the right hon. Member.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Attorney-General how many decisions were made in 1984 by the Social Security Commissioner on appeals (a) by the Secretary of State for Social Services and (b) by the claimant in cases concerning attendance allowance; and in what number of cases the appeal (i) succeeded and (ii) resulted in award of the allowance.

The Attorney-General: Two decisions were made on appeals by the Secretary of State and 44 appeals by the claimant. Twenty-six appeals, including one by the Secretary of State, succeeded. The information requested on the actual awards is not immediately available but I will write to the right hon. Member shortly.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Attorney-General how many miners arrested for picket line offences in England and Wales have had jury trials.

The Attorney-General: According to the information available, as at 15 March 1985 the cases of 158 defendants indentified as arising in some way from the miner's dispute had been disposed of by the Crown court whether following trial or otherwise.

TRANSPORT

Railways (Electrification)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the total level of expenditure planned for the electrification of railways in each of the next five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand that BR's latest forecasts of expenditure on currently approved electrification schemes, excluding rolling stock, are:

	£ million (mid-1984 prices)
1985-86	65·0
1986-87	49·7
1987-88	51·1
1988-89	43·1
1989-90	24·8

Marine Pilotage

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the organisations which have made submissions on his consultative document on marine pilotage; and if he will make a statement.

In-Car Telephones

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is satisfied about the safety aspect of the use by car drivers whilst on the move of in-car telephones.

Mrs. Chalker: Drivers with in-car telephones should never use them whilst on the move. My Department's manual "Driving" advises that drivers should stop before making or receiving a call and I understand that British Telecom and other manufacturers offer similar advice. While there appears to be an increase in the use of in-car telephones, there is at present no evidence to suggest that they are giving rise to any road safety hazard, but I shall be keeping a close watch on the situation.

MOT Testing Scheme (Examiners)

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he will announce the new conditions of appointment for authorised examiners under the MOT testing scheme.

Mrs. Chalker: From 13 May 1985 applications for new authorisations for MOT testing will again be accepted following the ending of the embargo on applications introduced on 5 May 1983.

Applicants and existing examiners will have to meet more stringent conditions of appointment, in line with the Department's aim of raising the standard of the MOT testing scheme.

This is to be achieved through higher standards of entry to the scheme. Applicants will have to satisfy the Department as to their repute and financial standing; stiffer requirements will apply to premises and equipment specifications, and better working conditions will be required for the tester. There is to be increased security for test certificates, and provision will have to be made for motorists to observe the test being carried out.

New applicants will be required to meet the new conditions in full. Existing examiners will have five years in which to comply, but requirements on pit dimensions and guard rails will not apply to them. Where changes in ownership of a testing station take place, the new conditions will apply after one year. Existing examiners are to have one year in which to provide improved security arrangements.

In order that these new conditions should not reduce the availability of MOT testing in rural areas, the existing testing stations in "remote rural areas" will be extended to cover stations doing fewer than 500 tests a year and more than 10 miles by road from the nearest station which meets, or will be required to meet, the full conditions of appointment. Existing examiners in this category will be able to represent to my Department their case for exemption from those of the new conditions which it would be impracticable for them to meet.

PRIME MINISTER

Civil Service (Pay)

Q10. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Prime Minister by what amount Civil Service pay has increased since 1979.

The Prime Minister: For the main grades, increases in pay between 1 April 1979 and 1 April 1984 have ranged between 57 and 84 per cent. Average non-industrial Civil Service earnings increased by 71 per cent. over that period.

Franks Committee

Q16. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if, in the light of further relevant documents which have become available, she will reconvene the Franks committee on the events leading up to the Falklands conflict.

The Prime Minister: No.

Mr. Chernenko (Funeral)

Q115. Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister whether she will make a statement on her recent visit to Moscow to attend the funeral of the late Mr. K. Chernenko.

The Prime Minister: Accompanied by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, I attended the funeral of the late President Chernenko on 13 March. After the ceremonies, I made a call on the new General Secretary, Mr. Gorbachev, and had a good and useful discussion which lasted a little under an hour. While I was in Moscow I was able to have meetings with President Zia, President Machel, Vice President Bush and Secretary Shultz, Prime Minister Mulroney, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi and Prime Minister Gonzalez.

In my talks with Mr. Gorbachev I stressed the hope of the Government and people of the United Kingdom that the Geneva arms talks would be successful and result in increased security at a lower level of weapons. Mr. Gorbachev raised the question of the American strategic defence initiative. I drew his attention to the significance of the four points which I had agreed with President Reagan at Camp David in December, and which were reaffirmed during my visit to Washington in February.

We touched briefly on relations between our two countries and agreed that we should develop contacts in a wide variety of fields so that we could achieve a better understanding and thus contribute towards an improvement in East-West relations.

Research (Code of Conduct)

Q121. Sir David Price asked the Prime Minister whether she will open discussions with the appropriate learned societies to agree an updated voluntary code of conduct on all medical, biological and bio-chemical research which is consistent with the dignity and sanctity of human life.

The Prime Minister: There are voluntary codes of conduct on scientific research involving humans, which have been drawn up by scientific and professional organisations. Each code deals with an aspect of such research. In addition, the Medical Research Council has published guidelines on research involving embryos fertilised in vitro. It is for the organisations themselves to ensure that these guidelines remain relevant both to the conduct of research and to the legitimate concerns of the community at large.

Engagements

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 26 March.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 26 March.

Mr. Alton asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 26 March.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 26 March.

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 26 March.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 26 March.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 26 March.

Mr. Fisher asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 26 March.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 26 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Peter Levene

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Prime Minister on which date the contract with Mr. P. Levene, head of defence procurement, was signed.

The Prime Minister: 19 March 1985.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Prime Minister when she first met Mr. P. Levene, new head of defence procurement, in an official capacity.

The Prime Minister: It would be neither practicable nor desirable for me to answer questions about where and when I meet specific officials or private named individuals; and I do not propose to do so.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Prime Minister why the new head of defence procurement, Mr. P. Levene was not considered suitable for a certificate of qualification from the Civil Service Commissioners.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing to add to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member on 21 March at column 570.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

University Students

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has for each university in the United Kingdom, as to the total number of (a) full-time and (b) part-time students enrolled at the institution for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Peter Brooke: The information is as follows:

Teachers (Pay)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will take steps to increase the amount of money available to local education authorities to enable them to improve their current pay offer to teachers.

Sir Keith Joseph: No, but the employers and teachers know that I stand ready to receive and consider salary structure proposals and, if I judge them negotiable, good for education, and affordable, to put them to my colleagues for their consideration. I cannot guarantee the outcome of any such consideration but in any event talks on salary structure broke down over three months ago when the teacher side refused to continue discussions.

Further and Higher Education (Science Facilities)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions he is having about establishing a range of schemes for promoting further places in science as opposed to arts faculties in further and higher education and about the levels of financing for universities and polytechnics.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend will be seeking advice from the University Grants Committee and other interested bodies about the distribution of the £43 million being made available for additional high quality engineering and technology places announced on 19 March 1985 at cols 482-84. The Government will continue to promote a significant shift in the balance of provision towards scientific, technological and vocational subjects across higher education as a whole. These matters will be further considered in the proposals for the future development of higher education which the Government intend to publish later this year. Future levels of financing for higher education will be considered in future public expenditure surveys in the usual way.

Research Councils

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish and place in the Library a list of titles and proposals of all the alpha grade research projects by each of the research councils in the financial year 1984-85 to date.

Mr. Brooke: Full details of alpha grade research projects from all research councils are not yet available for 1984-85, but the overall number thus graded exceeded 3,000 in each of the four years 1980 to 1984, and the list of titles and proposals asked for could not be provided except at disproportionate cost.

A and O-level Passes

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) on 12 February, Official Report, column 126, whether the table of O-level passes includes passes by pupils remaining in the sixth form with the intention of taking A-levels.

Mr. Dunn: Yes, it includes all leavers from both the fifth and sixth forms with five or more higher grades at O-level or CSE, regardless of whether A-levels were also obtained.

Food Standards

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make it his policy to issue guidance to local education authorities about meals in schools in line with the nutritional standards recommended in the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy (COMA) report.

Mr. Dunn: No. Under section 22 of the Education Act 1980, it is for local education authorities to decide what food they should provide to pupils at school. They have access to a wide range of authoritative advice on nutritional standards.

Pupil-Teacher Ratios

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the pupil-teacher ratio in Sefton local authority nursery education in January 1980 and January 1985, respectively.

Mr. Dunn: The pupil-teacher ratio in nursery schools and classes in Sefton in January 1980 was 22·9; in January 1984, the latest date for which information is available, it was 25·1.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has concerning pupil-teacher ratios in different subjects in schools in England and Wales.

Mr. Dunn: Pupil-teacher ratios cannot readily be applied to individual subjects within a school. Information on average class sizes by subject is as follows. It is derived from a survey carried out by this Department in the autumn of 1977 of the staffing of a sample of maintained secondary schools in England and Wales.

Subject group	Average class size
English	23·7
Mathematics	23·3
Physical education	22·6
General science	24·5
Biology	20·2

Shorthand and typewriting	17·4
Home economics	14·9
Art/craft	18·1
Remedial	11·8
All other subjects	19·6
All subjects	20·8

No comparable information is available about other schools in England and Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the average pupil-teacher ratio in schools in England and Wales in each of the years since 1977.

Mr. Dunn: The pupil-teacher ratios overall and within maintained primary and secondary schools in England since 1977 are as follows:

	Primary	Secondary	*Overall
1977	23·9	17·0	19·7
1978	23·6	16·9	19·4
1979	23·1	16·7	18·9
1980	22·7	16·6	18·7
1981	22·6	16·6	18·6
1982	22·5	16·6	18·5
1983	22·3	16·5	18·1
1984	22·1	16·2	17·9

* The overall pupil-teacher ratio relates the number of all full-time equivalent pupils in maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools to the full-time equivalent of qualified teachers paid by local education authorities and employed for service in these schools.

The information for Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Animals (Experiments)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on his policy relating to the inclusion of animal dissection and experimentation in school syllabuses.

Mr. Dunn: The Department has issued advice on the care and maintenance of living animals in schools; the use of such animals is normally restricted to observation of behaviour and growth and to husbandry. I refer my hon. Friend to the answer on dissection which I gave yesterday to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks).

Education Expenditure

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the average expenditure per pupil in schools in England and Wales in each of the years since 1977.

Mr. Dunn: Average expenditure per pupil is available for England and Wales for the financial years 1977-78 and 1978-79. Since 1979-80 my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales kept separate information on the costs of education in Wales; but unit costs remain broadly comparable with earlier years. On this basis the net recurrent institutional expenditure per full-time equivalent pupil in maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools and in special education was as follows in each year, in cash terms:

Cost per pupil

* Reliable figures are not available for the years before 1977-78.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the total expenditure upon teachers' salaries in schools in England and Wales in each of the years since 1977.

Mr. Dunn: The expenditure in each financial year since 1976-77 by local education authorities in England and Wales on the salaries of school teachers was as follows:

*Expenditure on teachers' salaries

	£ million cash
1976-77	2,418
1977-78	2,597
1978-79	2,885

* Includes salaries plus employers' contributions to national insurance and superannuation.
† Provisional.

Youth Service Policy

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to issue the circular on youth service policy.

Mr. Dunn: The circular has been issued today and copies have been placed in the Library.

Pupils (Statistics)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will list in the Official Report the proportion of pupils in comprehensive, secondary modern and grammar schools respectively, in each local education authority in 1979 and each subsequent year for which figures are available.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 19 March 1985, c. 481]: To provide the information requested for the past six years would incur disproportionate cost. However, the following table lists that for 1979 and 1984.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Philip Trusty and Alan Chard (Trial Evidence Review)

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will review the evidence of converted terrorist Billy Williams upon which Philip Trusty, Alan Chard and others were convicted at the Old Bailey in 1975.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend is having inquiries made in order to establish whether such a review is necessary.

Prisoners (Razor Blades)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if prisoners are ever issued with razor blades for shaving which have been used previously by other prisoners.

Mr. Mellor: No. In most establishments inmates are issued weekly with their own disposable safety razor. In others, razor blades are issued individually to inmates each day under a paper wrapper bearing the inmate's name and returned to the landing staff daily in the same way.

British Union of the Abolition of Vivisection

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis asking for what purpose the police entered the offices of the British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection on 20 March; who issued the warrant; and what material was removed;

(2) if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to why the police removed a list of names of hon. Members from the offices of the British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection on 20 March.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that with a search warrant issued by Horseferry road magistrates' court his officers entered the premises of the British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection in connection with the theft on 16-17 March of documents from the Wellcome Research Laboratories, Beckenham, Kent. A large quantity of documents were removed, some of which have now been recognised as irrelevant to this police inquiry and are accordingly being returned to the British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection. The list of names to which the hon. Member refers has been so returned.

Drunkenness (Statistics)

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the policy currently being introduced by several police forces, he will ensure that the number of persons cautioned for drunkenness offences will appear in the official statistics.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information requested is published annually in a Home Office statistical bulletin "Offences of Drunkenness, England and Wales", a copy of which is in the Library of the House. The next issue is planned for September 1985.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will publish in the Official Report information on the mining dispute showing the number of arrests in each police area from 13 March 1984 to 5 March 1985.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The number of arrests connected with the miners' dispute in police force areas in England and Wales was as follows:

Police force area	Number of arrests
Cleveland	58
Cumbria	25
Derbyshire	1,192
Durham	487
Dyfed-Powys	16
Essex	212
Greater Manchester	274
Gwent	236
Hampshire	11
Humberside	121
Kent	311
Lancashire	26
Leicestershire	54
Merseyside	195
Metropolitan	255
Northumbria	637
North Wales	31
North Yorkshire	163
Nottinghamshire	2,417
South Wales	509
South Yorkshire	1,533
Staffordshire	417
Sussex	5
Thames Valley	3
Warwickshire	197
West Yorkshire	423
Total	9,808

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the effect of policing the mining dispute on crime figures in non-mining areas.

Mr. Mellor: No satisfactory estimate can be made of the effect which the redeployment of police officers may have had on the crime figures in non-mining areas. Any such effects would be masked by the normal variations in the figures for each kind of offence within each police force area.

Probation Centres

Mr. Harvey asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the guidelines for consultation with local communities in which it is proposed to set up a new probation centre.

Mr. Mellor: This is a matter left to the discretion of area probation committees which are aware of the need to consult local communities.

Leeds Prison

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the general review of rule 43 procedures at Leeds prison, which was planned in 1981, was carried out.

Mr. Mellor: The report of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons in 1981 recommended that the governor of Leeds prison should improve the quality of life of prisoners segregated under prison rule 43 for their own protection. As a result, the governor was asked to consider ways of improving conditions for rule 43 prisoners within resource constraints, and the facilities and regime of these prisoners have been improved. Action was also taken to reduce the number of these prisoners held at Leeds.

After-care Grant Scheme

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in view of the freeze on the development of further after-care hostels, he will seek to complete the review of the after-care grant scheme as a matter of urgency.

Mr. Mellor: Work on the review is progressing as speedily as is practicable.

Prisoners (Segregation)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many male and how many female prisoners are currently segregated under rule 43 (a) for their own protection and (b) for good order and discipline.

Mr. Mellor: The most up-to-date information centrally available on adult convicted males is for 31 August 1984 when:

(a) 572 were segregated for their own protection;
(b) 94 for good order and discipline.

Figures are not available for female or for male unconvicted prisoners.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if any action has been taken to set up a specialist unit for rule 43 prisoners in the north of England, as recommended by the Chief Inspector of Prisons in 1981;

(2) whether any more specialist units for rule 43 prisoners, similar to those at Maidstone and Gloucester, are planned.

Mr. Mellor: In addition to units at Gloucester, Maidstone and Wakefield prisons, it is planned to open a further special unit at Parkhurst prison to which prisoners serving long sentences who are segregated under rule 43 for their own protection may be transferred to enable them to resume association with other prisoners. The unit will be operated on lines similar to those described in Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons' report 1981. I accept that an increase in provision in the north of England would provide a better geographical balance of accommodation, but it has not so far been possible to identify a suitable location because of the constraints upon accommodation generally. We shall continue to keep the position under review.

The hon. Member may also wish to note that units for vulnerable prisoners have now been set up at Gartree and Albany prisons: allocation to these facilities is not at present managed centrally.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if any action has been taken, as recommended by the Chief Inspector of Prisons in 1981, to transfer segregated prisoners to other prisons where they are not known and where it might be possible for them to relinquish rule 43 status.

Mr. Mellor: It is our policy that all cases of prisoners segregated under prison rule 43 should be reviewed at regular intervals. Prison governors are required to submit reports to regional offices of the prison department on prisoners segregated under rule 43 for their own protection at monthly intervals making recommendations for future action and in doing so are required to consider whether it would be possible to enable the prisoner to be removed from rule 43 by means of transfer to another establishment. In the prison department's reply to the report of the Chief Inspector of Prisons for 1981, it was promised that consideration would be given to enabling transfers to take place between, as well as within, regions. Arrangements for such transfers have since been developed between all four regions of the prison department.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many fewer prisoners are currently segregated under rule 43 than when the Chief Inspector of Prisons reported on the matter in 1981.

Mr. Mellor: The inspectorate report stated that 714 convicted adult males were segregated for their own protection in July 1981. Comparable figures for July 1984 show 578, a reduction of 136. The most recently available figure is for August 1984 at which time the number was 572.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners are currently segregated under rule 43 at Leeds prison.

Mr. Mellor: On 22 March 1985 the figures for prisoners segregated under rule 43 at Leeds prison were as follows:

	Number
For their own protection
unconvicted	16
convicted	45
	61
For reasons of good order and discipline
unconvicted	4

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if any action has been taken to improve the physical conditions, in particular the plumbing and sanitary arrangements, of accommodation for segregated prisoners at Durham prison.

Mr. Mellor: A programme of refurbishing all the existing recesses at Durham prison is currently under way. Some improvements to the drainage facilities in A wing, where segregated prisoners are accommodated, have already been undertaken. Further improvements to the recesses on this wing will be carried out over the next year.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if segregated prisoners have now been allocated a separate area at Birmingham prison;

(2) whether all young offenders segregated under rule 43 at Birmingham prison now have access to the prison's education facilities.

Mr. Mellor: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether steps have been taken to ensure that the authorisation procedure for rule 43 prisoners is properly followed in all establishments, as recommended by the Chief Inspector of Prisons.

Mr. Mellor: Recommendations concerning the need to adhere to the procedures laid down for authorising the segregation of prisoners under rule 43 of the prison rules have been made by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons in a number of reports on individual establishments. It is primarily the responsibility of the governor to ensure that these recommendations are followed. However, where the Chief Inspector has made recommendations of this nature, compliance with the procedures is monitored in the course of routine operational assessments by regional offices of the prison department. It has also been monitored through a series of follow-up visits by the deputy director general of the prison service to establishments which have been inspected and I understand that in general observance of the procedures has been found to be satisfactory.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the latest crime statistics.

Mr. Brittan: I am disappointed that recorded crime in England and Wales increased by 8 per cent. in 1984, following a reduction of 1 per cent. in 1983. The Government have a clear strategy for dealing with crime by strengthening the police, extending the prison building programme, improving the effectiveness of all the criminal justice services and other measures. More has still to be done, but I am satisfied that our programme is realistic and effective.

Immigration

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average daily prison population of those detained under Immigration Act powers during 1984.

Mr. Mellor: In 1984 the average number of persons detained under the Immigration Act 1971 in prison department establishments in England and Wales was 143.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will provide a table indicating the total number of people served with detention orders under Schedule 3 paragraph 2(2) of the Immigration Act during 1983 by nationality and category.

Mr. Waddington: The following table gives the available information. The breakdown by category of deportation could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Roadworks (Carrickfergus)

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take steps to publicise in the area of Carrickfergus affected by major road works the entitlement of residents to claim compensation under the Land Acquisition and Compensation Order (N.I.) 1973 in respect of property devaluation on account of noise arising from the roadworks.

Mr. Chris Patten: Yes; the claim period under the Land Acquisition and Compensation (N.I.) Order 1973 starts 12 months after completion of the relevant scheme, and in accordance with normal practice an appropriate notice will be published in the local press at about that time.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the latest available figures which indicate unemployment in each parliamentary constituency and each electoral ward in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Boyson: The numbers of unemployed claimants in each parliamentary constituency in Northern Ireland at 14 February 1985 are set out. As there are more than 500 electoral wards in Northern Ireland, I will write to the hon. Gentleman giving February unemployment figures for each electoral ward.

Social Security Offices

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the electoral wards served by each social security office in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: Information in the form requested is not readily available and could be compiled only at disproportionate cost.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the latest available figures which indicate the number of people claiming supplementary benefit at each social security office in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: The numbers receiving supplementary benefit on 12 February 1985 were as follows:

Social Security Office	Claimants
Andersonstown	6,571
Antrim	5,824
Armagh	4,676
Ballymena	5,718

Women Prisoners (Armagh)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give the monthly breakdown since November 1982 of the number of women held in Her Majesty's prison, Armagh, indicating for each month the number held on remand and the number sentenced and distinguishing between those remanded or sentenced for scheduled and non-scheduled offences.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 25 March 1985]: The details requested are set out in the following table:

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Industrial Activity (Merseyside)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the latest figure for the level of industrial activity on Merseyside; and how this compares with the equivalent month in 1979.

Mr. Trippier: While there is no single figure which can be used as an index to denote the level of industrial activity on Merseyside, in the period between end-1979 and end-1983, the total business stock on Merseyside increased from 20,633 to 21,629.

Redditch

Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many applications have been received from, and how many applications granted to, companies in the Redditch area for assistance under the terms of the new assisted area status of the regional development policy.

Mr. Trippier: Under section 7 of the Industrial Development Act 1982, three applications for assistance have been received from companies in the Redditch area and these are being considered by officials.

EC (Spain and Portugal)

Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the effect on the amount of European regional development fund money received by the United Kingdom of the possible entry of Spain and Portugal to the European Economic Community.

Mr. Trippier: Such estimates are not practicable in the absence of information about the ERDF quota ranges for Spain and Portugal and the future size of the ERDF budget.

Laser Technology

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what Government funds have been allocated for laser technology (a) for metal cutting, (b) for communication techniques and (c) for other purposes.

Mr. Butcher: The Department of Trade and Industry is currently supporting a number of projects concerned with laser technology. The total cost of these projects is approximately £20 million, of which the Department is providing funding as follows: (a) £1·6 million for metal cutting, (b) £2·85 million for communications and (c) £570,000 for other purposes.

Mineral Exploration

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the review of the scheme for providing grants for mineral exploration under the Mineral Exploration and Investment Grants Act 1972.

Mr. Trippier: This review has now been completed, taking into account the wider review of the Department's support for industrial research and development whose conclusions were announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 25 March. The central conclusion of the wider review is that the balance of the Department's support should shift away from assistance to projects for individual companies and towards measures promoting widespread benefits across industry.

In line with this conclusion and the planned decrease in real terms in our support for industrial research and development, it has been decided that no further offers of assistance will be made under the mineral exploration grants scheme, which is being brought to an end. Grants in respect of projects for which offers have already been made will be payable under the Act over the next year or so, as claims are received for projects completed.

EC (Anti-dumping Procedures)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if goods and materials entering Germany from East Germany in terms of the inner German trade agreement are subject to the Common Market's anti-dumping procedures; and if the Common Market Commission has any role in supervising these arrangements.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to the reply, 25 March 1985]: The Community's anti-dumping procedures do not apply to inner German trade. However, member states can act to ensure that the special provisions for inner German trade do not undermine any anti-dumping measures imposed by the Council or the Commission in the rest of the Community. Member states would wish to maintain contact with the Federal German Government and with the Commission in relation to any such action.

EC (Steel Industries)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to the percentage reduction in the numbers employed in the steel industries of the various Common Market countries since the Council of Ministers agreed on a plan to reduce and restructure the industry; and if he will make a statement outlining the extent to which the various nations have fulfilled their agreed obligations in this area of policy.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 25 March 1985]: The most recent information on the reduction in the numbers employed in the production of steel products covered by the treaty of Paris in Community member states since 1980 when the steel aids code was agreed is shown in the following table:

TABLE 1
Number of employees ('000)

	1980 average	January 1985	Percentage reduction

In June 1983, the European Commission issued a series of decisions addressed to member states specifying the minimum capacity reductions required between 1980 and the end of 1985. These requirements and the Commission's figures for capacity reductions actually carried out up to 20 March 1985 are shown in the following table:

WALES

Household Statistics

Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what increase on Office of Population Censuses and Surveys projections he estimates in the number of households in Wales by the year 2001; and if he will make a statement on the implications for housing policy.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: It is estimated that between 1985 and 2001 the number of private households in Wales will increase by approximately 100,000. The total number of private households by 2001 is now projected to be less than the figure underpinning the assessment of housing need which I gave the hon. Gentleman in my answer on 22 October 1984 at column 428. We are considering the implications.

Council Houses (New Tenants)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many local authority dwellings were let to new tenants in the year 1983-84 (a) through the waiting list, normal allocation and (b) other.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: 11,400 and 2,500, respectively.

Health Authorities (Members' Overseas Trips)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the cost to each health authority in Wales of overseas trips by officers of the authorities in each of the past five years.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: This information is not kept centrally and could not be obtained without disproportionate cost.

Roads (Construction Programmes)

Mr. John Morris asked the Secretary of State for Wales if, for each of the following road schemes, he will itemise (a) the original programme for construction, (b) any slippages in either starting or completion dates and (c) the reasons for any slippages identified: A5 Glyn Bends, Ty Nant to Dinmael School, A487 Furnace Bridge, Eglwys Fach, A4042 Penperlleni bypass, M4 Baglan-Lonlas, A40 Pengawse Hill diversion, A40 Carmarthen Eastern bypass, A48 Pont Faen-Coed Hirion-Pound Farm-Pont Pibwr (scheme changed), A48 Cross Hands-Drefach (scheme changed), A55 Bodelwyddan, A55 Rhuallt Hill improvement, A55 Conwy Morfa-Aber (scheme changed), A55 Travellers Inn improvement, A465 Glynneath-Aberdulais, A470 Llanidloes bypass, A470 Pentrebach-Cefn Coed, Ruabon by pass, A483 Welshpool Relief Road, A483 Wrexham-Chester (scheme changed), A487 Port Dinorwic bypass, A487 Pont Seiont Bridge approaches, A4042 Llantarnam bypass, stage 1, stage 2, A55 Northop bypass and A55 Conwy crossing.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The information is as follows.

As was made clear in "Roads in Wales 1983," the periods in which schemes are expected to start must be regarded as provisional. The progress of schemes is dependent on the satisfactory completion of the statutory procedures and of engineering design as well as the availability of resources. Thus, the provisional planning start dates adopted at any time are liable to change.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Procurator Fiscal, Peterhead

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he has now made plans to meet the procurator fiscal at the Peterhead sheriff court; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I intend to meet the procurator fiscal of Peterhead at his office on Monday 1 April.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Arms Talks

59. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to what extent Her Majesty's Government are able to gauge that United Kingdom interests will be safeguarded in the latest round of United States—Soviet disarmament negotiations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: As I told my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) on 13 March, at column 166, we shall continue to maintain close and constant contacts with the United States, both bilaterally and in NATO. These contacts include discussion of our common interests that the Geneva negotiations achieve effective agreements aimed at preventing an arms race in space, terminating it on earth and achieving security with reduced levels of offensive systems on both sides. We shall use appropriate opportunities to ensure that the Soviet Government remain fully seized of our views and interests.

60. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the progress of the Geneva arms talks and Government policy on disarmament.

Mr. Luce: We have warmly welcomed the opening of the talks in Geneva. We recognise that the issues under discussion are complex and intricate. Long and difficult negotiations may well be required if our aim of balanced and verifiable measures of arms control is to be achieved. We hope nevertheless that progress will be made.

62. Mr. Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy regarding the issues to be discussed at the Geneva talks on disarmament; and what steps he proposes to take to make Her Majesty's Government's position known to the negotiators.

Mr. Luce: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister emphasised during her recent meetings with President Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev that we share the objective of the United States that the negotiations should work out effective agreements aimed at preventing an arms race in space, terminating it on earth and achieving security with reduced levels of offensive systems on both sides.

Chemical Weapons

61. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress in multilateral negotiations relating to chemical weapons.

Mr. Luce: At the 1985 session of the Geneva negotiations we and our allies are concentrating on the key issues of verification where we hope to see faster progress than in 1984. As part of this concerted effort, I presented at Geneva on 12 March a new British working paper containing proposals for the routine inspection of civil chemical plants to ensure that under a total chemical weapons ban certain toxic chemicals are not diverted for secret military use. We urge the Soviet Union to join us in building upon this and other Western verification proposals so that a complete ban, which is urgently required, can be achieved quickly.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the latest figure for the number of unemployed; and how many of them are black.

Mr. Alan Clark: The latest available information on unemployment by ethnic origin comes from the revised results of the 1983 labour force survey. These show that in the second quarter of 1983, there was a total of 2,998,000 people unemployed in Great Britain, of whom 215,000 were of non-white ethnic origins.

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish figures in the Official Report indicating the levels of unemployment in the constituency of Bootle, in May 1979, June 1983 and in February 1985 of (a) 16 to 21-year-old males, (b) 16 to 21-year-old females, (c) 22 to 35-year-old males, (d) 22 to 35-year-old females, (e) 35 to 65-year-old males and (f) 35 to 65-year-old females.

Mr. Alan Clark: This information is not yet available. Detailed analysis of unemployment in parliamentary constituencies will be available later this year. Unemployment levels by age group for jobcentre areas are in the Library.

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish a table in the Official Report indicating the level of unemployment in the constituency of Bootle, in May 1979, June 1983 and February 1985, respectively.

Mr. Alan Clarke: The information requested, which is also available in the Library, is as follows:

Bootle Constituency: Numbers of unemployed

	Numbers
May 1979	Not available
June 1983	10,764
February 1985	11,494

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has about the number of building trade workers who are now unemployed in the north-west region; and if he will provide a detailed breakdown of the figures by craft and skill.

Mr. Alan Clark: Results of the 1983 labour force survey indicate that in the north-west region in the second quarter of 1983 there were 40,000 people without a job and looking for work, who had been employed at some time during the previous three years, with their last job in the construction industry. A detailed breakdown of this figure by craft and skill is not possible because of the sampling error that would be involved.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give a breakdown by region of the number of people in employment, whole-time equivalent, in each of the years since 1977; and what percentage this figure represents of total work force in the region in each of those years.

Mr. Alan Clark: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will give, from the survey of youth training scheme providers reported to the last meeting of the Manpower Services Commission's youth training board, the number and proportion of trainees on mode A, mode B1 and mode B2 schemes, respectively, who will spend fewer than 13 weeks on off-the-job training;

(2) if he will give, from the survey of youth training scheme leavers reported to the last meeting of the youth training board, the number and proportion of mode A, mode B1, and mode B2 work experience placements provided in each of the industrial categories used in the survey, and in each of the occupational training families;

(3) if he will give, from the survey of youth training scheme providers reported to the last meeting of the Manpower Services Commission's youth training board (a) the number and proportion of mode A managing agents who require prospective trainees to have one or more O-levels and (b) the number and proportion of mode B1 and mode B2 sponsors, respectively, who require prospective trainees to have one or more O-levels;

(4) if he will give, from the survey of youth training scheme providers reported to the last meeting of the Manpower Services Commission's youth training board, the number and proportion of mode A managing agents who deploy, per 100 trainees (a) fewer than three, (b) from three to five, (c) from six to eight, (d) from nine to 11, (e) from 12 to 14 and (f) more than 14 full-time equivalent staff in managing, administering, and providing off-the-job training for their scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

"Noise and the Worker"

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment how long the health and safety pamphlet, "Noise and the Worker", has been out of print; when it will be reprinted or replaced; and, when it was in print, what measures were taken to ensure that it was available to interested workers.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The pamphlet "Noise and the Worker" (HSW 25), which was first issued in 1963, has been out of print since May 1983, and the Health and Safety Executive has no plans to reprint. While in print HSW 25 was an on-sale publication available through HMSO bookshops.

As part of its current awareness campaign on the problems of industrial noise, HSE has taken a number of initiatives addressed to all sections of industry. In particular, it has issued a free "Noise" leaflet on the protection of workers' hearing.

Hairdressing (Self-employment Grants)

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Employment what criteria of assessment are applied in awarding self-employment grants to individuals engaging themselves in hairdressing.

Mr. Alan Clark: The same eligibility tests are applied to all applications for the enterprise allowance scheme irrespective of the nature of the proposed business. The conditions which the enterprise must satisfy in order to qualify for support are described in the leaflet EPL124 "Enterprise Allowance Scheme, A Guide", which is available in the Library.

No special conditions apply to hairdressing ventures.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many individuals have been in receipt of self-employment grants for their establishment in hairdressing in (a) Cleveland county, (b) the northern region and (c) England and Wales.

Mr. Alan Clark: I regret the figures are not available in the form requested. However, experience in the pilot enterprise allowance scheme suggests that about 1 per cent. of those joining the scheme start up in hairdressing.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of individuals, having received self-employment grants for their establishment in hairdressing, have continued operating in that industry 12 months after the receipt of the grant.

Mr. Alan Clark: No separate information is available on the survival rates of hairdressing businesses set up with the help of the enterprise allowance scheme. However, experience in the pilot scheme suggests that about 70 per cent. of all businesses supported are still trading up to 18 months after joining the scheme.

Budget Changes

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment how he calculates his figure of £146 million to be incurred by the Department of Employment as a result of changes announced in the Budget; and if he will list the specific programmes which are to benefit.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Secret Ballots

Sir Humphrey Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many times in the past 12 months he has met representatives of the Trades Union Congress to discuss balloting procedures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [pursuant to his reply, 25 March 1985]: My right hon. Friend and I have had no meetings with the TUC on this subject since June last year when the Trade Union Act 1984 was still before Parliament. We are always ready to meet representatives of the TUC to discuss with them how the trade unions can best fulfil their statutory obligations in relation to secret ballots.

Coal Industry

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Employment if the National Coal Board has applied for any alteration or exemption to the Mines and Quarries Act or other such legislation relating to the coal mining industry in the last six months.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [pursuant to his reply, 25 March 1985]: The National Coal Board has not applied during the last six months for any alterations of existing health and safety legislation for coal mines. Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Mines and Quarries has received and granted exemptions although the precise numbers are not readily available. Such requests relate to individual mines and come from individual NCB colliery managers. Provisions in mining legislation empower the Health and Safety Executive to grant specific exemptions, so long as the safety of employees will not be prejudiced by the granting of such exemptions, and these exemptions are always subject to conditions on either scope or application and often time.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authority Funds

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the total of (a) rate fund balances, (b) special funds and (c) capital funds available by local authorities at the end of each financial year from 1974-75 to 1983-84.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Based on returns from local authorities, following is the information for England:

	Rate Fund Balances	Balances of Special Funds* (excluding capital funds)	Balances of Capital funds
	£ million	£ million	£ million
At the end of:
1974-75	493	160	24
1975-76	987	152	75
1976-77	1,289	202	93
1977-78	1,480	264	171
1978-79	1,466	325	238
1979-80	1,156	454	148
1980-81	1,056	445	210
1981-82	1,379	719	211
1982-83	1,420	1,296	269
1983-84†	1,232	1,745	315

*For 1977-78 and earlier years not all non-statutory special funds are included. Details of extent of coverage for individual years may be found in the relevent "Local Government Financial Statistics" publication. Superannuation funds are excluded.
†Provisional.

Planning Zones

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what responses he has received from (a) local authorities and (b) industry, commerce and the relevant professions to his consultation paper on simplified planning zones; and when he proposes to make a further statement on the matter.

Mr. Macfarlane: My right hon. Friend has received a wide range of responses from local authorities, industry and commerce and professional bodies which he is at present considering. My right hon. Friend hopes to make an announcement shortly.

Control of Pollution Order 1983

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment by what date he expects to revoke the Control of Pollution Act (Exemption of Certain Discharges from Control) Order 1983.

Mr. Waldegrave: Government proposals for a phased withdrawal of the exemptions conferred by the Control of Pollution (Exemption of Certain Discharges from Control) Order 1983 were published in a consultation letter issued on 20 September 1984. Decisions on implementing the revocation of the order will be made when the responses to the consultation letter have been fully considered.

Greater London Council (Mortgages)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the number of mortgages the Greater London council has currently effected and the current value of the Greater London council mortgage book; and what he proposes for the Greater London council mortgage book upon abolition.

Sir George Young: I understand that at 31 July 1984, the GLC had outstanding loans totalling £306 million secured on 55,000 mortgages for house purchase and improvement. We intend that, on abolition, the GLC's mortgage account for these loans should pass as a whole to the London residuary body. All the existing terms of the mortgages will be unchanged, including the fixed rates of interest which apply to about half of those loans. The residuary body will be directed to adopt the normal practice of local authorities and leading private lending institutions in managing the account, including in the treatment of any borrowers who fall into arrears. It will be the job of the residuary body to arrange for as many as possible of the transferred mortgages to be refinanced with bodies in the private sector like building socieities and banks, but only with the agreement of the borrower. The prescribed proportion of virtually all the residuary body's mortgage receipts will be distributed among the London boroughs and we intend that this should be done in proportion to HIP allocations. The boroughs will be able to use them to supplement their housing investment programme allocations. By pursuing an active policy of securing refinance, the residuary body may be able to unlock resources for investment in local authority housing in the capital.

London Housing (SHAC Report)

Mr. Malins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has considered the recent report by SHAC, "The London Housing Aid Centre, Bed and Breakfast: Slum Housing of the Eighties", a copy of which has been sent to him; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend and I have read this report with interest. Many of the proposals put forward will be for local authorities to consider. The proposals for Government action are in the main not new, but the views expressed in the report will nonetheless be taken into account. In particular any implications which the present level of public sector capital investment in housing may have for other fields of public expenditure will continue to be carefully considered.

Housing

162. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total housing stock for each housing authority in England and Wales; what is the total number of empty dwellings for each housing authority; and what was the number of council houses built or started in 1984 for each housing authority.

Sir George Young: Each English local authority's estimate of the total dwellings in its area at 1 April 1984 and the number which were vacant, are contained in its housing investment programme return: the figures for each authority are listed in cols A15 and A75, respectively, of the "Print of data from form HIP1 (1984)" which is available in the Library. Reported figures of starts and completions of dwellings for the local authorities and for other owners during the first nine months of 1984, appear in "Local Housing Statistics" No. 72 which is also in the Library.

For information about housing in the Welsh authorities' areas, I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Empty Premises

165. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the total area of empty (a) office space for sale or hire, (b) retail premises for sale or hire and (c) factory or warehouse space for sale or hire, for each housing authority in England and Wales.

Sir George Young: Vacant floorspace statistics for offices, shops, factories and warehouses are not maintained by the department of the Environment.

The Department does produce detailed estimates of floorspace stock for commercial offices, shops, factories and warehouses by local authority district throughout England, in "Commercial and Industrial Floorspace Statistics, England" published annually. Similar figures for Wales are publishd by the Welsh Office, in "Commercial and Industrial Floorspace Statistics, Wales". Both publications are available in the Library.

Information on vacant office, factory and warehouse floorspace and on take-up of premises is published regularly by a number of leading firms of surveyors and estate agents. The supply of, and demand for, commercial and industrial accommodation is mainly a matter to be determined and monitored by the market.

Town and Country Planning Act

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, further to his answer to the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire of 29 January, Official Report, column 127, he has any plans this session to introduce a provision seeking to amend the Town and Country Planning Act to give greater flexibility of the use of commercial and industrial buildings engaged in the field of high technology industries.

Mr. Macfarlane: My right hon. friend proposes to introduce legislation at the earliest available opportunity, but I am unable to give an undertaking that time will be available during the current session.

Wideawake Air Base

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the capital cost of the expansion of the Wideawake air base; and what are the recurrent costs of the facility to Great Britain.

Sir George Young: The total capital cost for providing hardstandings, a fuel pipe line, technical and domestic accommodation for the air base on Ascension Island, amount to approximately £49 million at September 1984 prices. Of this the domestic accommodation cost approximately £18 million and the technical facilities £31 million. Average annual works maintenance costs are expected to be in the region of £1 million.

Local Authorities (Employees)

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out in descending order for each district authority the number of local authority employees per 100 inhabitants allowing for higher tier authority employees and setting out the higher tier authority or authorities involved.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information is as follows:

Rate Capping

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if any meetings with local authority associations have been arranged for future dates to discuss with him the operation of his rate-capping policy; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will list all the representations he has received from local authority associations, individual local authorities or groups of local authorities requesting a meeting with him to discuss the operation of his rate-capping policy; what response he has made in each case; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will list the criteria he uses in deciding whether a group of local authorities which has requested a meeting with him to discuss the operation of his rate-capping policy is representative; and if he will make a statement;

(4) if he will make it his policy, in arranging meetings with local authorities to discuss the operation of his rate-capping policy, to see groups of authorities together where common problems have been identified.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Following the meeting which I held with leaders of some rate-capped and certain other local authorities on 4 February, I have been sent copies of resolutions passed by a number of those authorities, and have received other correspondence from them, including requests for further joint negotiations. I have noted the contents of the resolutions.

For the reasons set out in my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Watson) on 14 March at column 219, I have no intention of negotiating with this group of authorities, which is unrepresentative of local government as a whole.

I have made it clear that I am not prepared to reconsider the rate limits or the precept limits or the rate support grant settlement for 1985-86.

There is now no excuse for any rating authority to delay setting a lawful rate.

Housing Defects (Assistance)

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities are currently giving assistance by way of either a repurchase or reinstatement grant under the Housing Defects Act 1984; and what are the totals in each case.

Sir George Young: Under the Housing Defects Act 1984, which came into effect on 1 December 1984, local housing authorities have a duty to provide assistance, upon application, to eligible owners. Information about the number of authorities currently giving assistance is not available.

Local Government Officers (Fraud)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has concerning the number of cases of fraud involving local government officers in the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Waldegrave: Prior to the establishment of the Audit Commission in 1983 the Chief Inspector of Audit issued an annual report which contained a detailed breakdown of reported frauds. The following numbers of frauds were reported involving local authority employees for the three years ending 31 March 1982:

Year	Cases
1979-80	118
1980-81	114
1981-82	116

Copies of the reports of the Chief Inspector of Audit are available in the House of Commons Library, giving further information.

With the transfer of responsibility to the Audit Commission in 1983, an annual report was not published for 1982-83. The Audit Commission did publish an annual report for the year ended 31 March 1984, but this contains only brief details of cases of fraud exceeding £500 and does not show the number of cases involving local authority employees. However, I understand from the Commission that local authority employees were involved in the following numbers of cases exceeding £500:

Year	Cases
1983-84	52

Figures are not available for petty frauds involving less than £500. If my hon. Friend requires further information I am sure that the Audit Commission would be pleased to assist, subject to the provisions of section 30 of the Local Government Finance Act 1982. This precludes the Commission from providing information about a particular body or person without the consent of the body or person to whom the information relates.

My hon. Friend may be interested to know that the Audit Commission will be publishing on Thursday 28 March a report on computer assisted frauds.

GLC (Farms)

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy towards ownership of the farms owned by the Greater London council in the green belt after 1 April 1986.

Mr. Macfarlane: Any farms on land acquired by the GLC or its predecessors under the Green Belt (London and Home Counties) Act 1938 would be transferred in accordance with my statement of decisions on 1938 Act land, a copy of which I have placed in the Library. I have said that I am fully committed to the protection of this land, which I regard as inalienable.

Colne Valley Regional Park

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy with regard to the future of the Colne valley regional park following abolition of the Greater London council.

Mr. Macfarlane: I hope soon to meet the hon. Member, other hon. Members, and the leader of the London borough of Hillingdon to discuss future arrangements for the regional park.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Self-employed Persons

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report for the years 1977-78 onwards the number and total incomes of self-employed persons in agriculture and horticulture by range of income; and whether he will specify separately the total amount for the group capital allowances, stock relief and losses.

Mr. Moore: I regret that information for years before 1980-81 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. For 1980-81 to 1982-83 — the latest year for which information is available — the information provided in the table is in terms of tax units (that is, a maried couple is counted as one unit); self-employed persons in agriculture and horticulture comprise single people and husbands whose main source of income, usually but not always the largest source, is self-employment income from those trades.

Source: Surveys of Personal Incomes 1980-81, 1981-82 and 1982-83.

Notes:

Total income includes investment income and is before personal allowances. Non-taxable social security benefits are excluded. Profits from self-employment included in total income are after deducting capital allowances, stock relief, losses and allowable expenses.

Figures for 1981-82 and 1982-83 are for the trade classification based on the standard industrial classification (SIC), (Revised 1980). Figures for 1980-81 use the 1968 SIC and are not strictly comparable because they will include certain activities (for example, hiring out agricultural machinery without operatives) no longer classified to agriculture and horticulture.

EC (VAT Base)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing (a) the European Economic Community harmonised value added tax base for 1984 and 1985, together with the authorised percentage payable for both years and (b) the amount payable by the United Kingdom under own resources, in European currency units and pound sterling, for 1984 and 1985, together with the amounts paid so far in 1985, indicating any advance payments and their amounts in European currency units and pound sterling: and if he will estimate the date at which the authorised own resources based on the 1984 European Economic Community budget will be equalled by payments in 1985.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Details of the value added tax base and authorised percentage for 1985 are not available as the Community has no 1985 budget, and until a budget is adopted it is not possible to assess when payments of own resources in 1985 will equal the payment made in 1984.

The other information requested is as follows:

A. (i) the 1984 EC harmonised VAT base is 14,377 mecu*;

(ii) the authorised percentage for 1984 was one per cent.

B. (i) The amount payable by the United Kingdom under own resources as shown in the Supplementary and Amending Budget No. 1 for 1984 is 5,516,349,726 ecus†, the sterling equivalent being £3,406,809,188‡‖.

(ii) The United Kingdom's 1985 own resources contribution (including overdrafts and advances) paid to the EC to 20 March amounts to £919,712,957·73¶, which is equivalent to 1,539,982,482 ecus at the exchange rate on 20 March.

C. There have been three advances in 1985, £99 million in January, £125 million in February and £115 million in March; equivalent to 165,767,226 ecu, 209,302,053 ecu and 192,557,889 ecu respectively at the 20 March rate of exchange. The actual payment made in March was reduced to £61·2 million, which allowed for the recovery of the current overdrawing.

* In addition Greece made a financial contribution to the Community budget in 1984 of 224,156,962 ecus.

† Includes non-VAT own resources of 2,682,390,000 ecu, and a negative amount of previous financial years own resources of 93,042,074 ecus carried forward into 1984.

(a) Non VAT own resources are paid upon the basis of the sums collected in pound sterling by the United Kingdom;

(b) fluctuations in the exchange rate.

¶ own resources payments made to the Community in 1985 have been adjusted to recover the amount of the moneys overdrawn by the Commission under article 12(2) of Council regulation 2891/77. Neither the advances under article 10(2) of regulation 2891/77 nor the 12(2) overdraft facilities add to the total resources to be paid by the United Kingdom to the Community in 1985; not increase the amount the Community is authorised to spend in 1985.

VAT

Mr. Kaufman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many persons are registered for value added tax in Cumbria, Lancashire, Greater Manchester, Merseyside and Cheshire; and if he will give the numbers registered in each economic classification for value added tax purposes.

Mr. Lawson: As at 2 March 1985 the number of persons registered for VAT at local VAT offices situated within these five areas totalled 165,713. The breakdown is as follows:

	Number
Cumbria	21,721
Lancashire	76,128
Greater Manchester	20,048
Merseyside	13,345
Cheshire	34,471

I regret that statistics categorising registered persons by turnover and trade classification are maintained on a national basis only.

European Monetary System

Mr. Skeet asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the essential conditions necessary to be established before the United Kingdom joins the European monetary system.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The United Kingdom is already a member of the European monetary system, but sterling does not participate in the exchange rate mechanism. Participation would require assessment of a wide range of factors. But we would in particular need to be satisfied that it would be consistent with the effective conduct of our monetary policies and that entry would not introduce instability into the mechanism. We do not believe that this is the case at present.

Exchange Rate

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the change in the real exchange rate of the pound since the last quarter of 1976 to the latest available date against the deutschmark, French franc, United States dollar, yen and gilder.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 21 March 1985, c. 598]: The information is as follows:

Percentage change in sterling's real exchange rate fourth quarter 1976 to fourth quarter 1984*

	Percentage changes
Deutschmark	+50·5
French franc	+37·9
United States dollar	−6·3
Yen	+8·7
Netherland gilder	+37·2

* The real exchange rate is calculated here by using the nominal bilateral exchange rates adjusted for movements in United Kingdom price movements relative to those in the countries of its major competitors (using GDP deflators).

Such comparisons can be misleading, as they are highly sensitive to the particular time period chosen.

MIRAS

Mr. Stern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library copies of any circulars or official statements of practice or statements of intention issued by the Inland Revenue to major lenders in connection with the mortgage interest tax relief at source scheme in February.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 25 March 1985]: My hon. Friend is probably referring to a letter of 1 February sent to all MIRAS lenders by the Inland Revenue central unit, which covered a number of aspects concerning the operation of the MIRAS scheme. I am arranging for copies of this letter to be placed in the House of Commons Library, as my hon. Friend requests.

Johnson Matthey Bankers

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take steps to ensure that his review of the supervisory arrangements for the banking system investigates whether Johnson Matthey was warned by the director of the International Maritime Bureau of the risks of lending money to Mr. Mahoud Sipra from 1982 onwards.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 25 March 1985]: It is not the intention of the review to conduct a detailed inquest into JMB's past commercial judgments. Its purpose is to consider the present system for banking supervision in the United Kingdom and whether any changes in supervisory procedures are called for in the light of the problems at Johnson Matthey Bankers.

CIVIL SERVICE

Senior Civil Servants

Mr. Eggar asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he will list by Department the number of civil servants at principal and assistant secretary level who have resigned voluntarily from the service in each of the years 1980 to 1984; and if he will state their age at date of resignation and number of years service.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 22 March 1985, c. 632]: Table 1 gives the number of resignations from the grades of principal and assistant secretary from 1980 onwards. It also expresses these as a percentage of the staff in post at the beginning of each year. Table 2 breaks down numbers of resignations by Department. Table 3 breaks them down by age and length of service.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Pesticides

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will provide a list of toxic substances imported into the United Kingdom that are banned in the country of production, including specifically those which are used as pesticides in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Trippier: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested is not available. Controls on the import and use of toxic substances are based on decisions by the United Kingdom regulatory authorities, observing European Community obligations where appropriate.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Management Information System

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will name and describe each form used as part of his Department's management information system.

Mr. Whitney: The Department's management information system uses statistical returns made on forms MR150, MR250, MR251, MR650 and MR351. Generally working sheets are used in local offices to collect and collate the statistics but not all of the statistics are obtained in this way; some are, for example, extracted from local office registers. The table lists the statistical return forms and the actual working sheets which are used on a regular basis; additional forms may be used for "ad hoc" inquiries and so on.

Return Form	Working Sheets
(1) MR150: 4-weekly return on contributory benefits	MR101, MR102, MR103, MR104, MR140, MR205, MR302, EF482
(2) MR250/MR251: 4-weekly returns on supplementary benefits	MR201/MR221, MR202/MR222, MR203, MR205, MR206/MR226, MR207/MR227, MR225, MR240, MR241, MR302, MR303, EF482
(3) MR650: 4-weekly return on contributory and supplementary benefits	MR302, MR640
(4) MR351: quarterly return on contributory and supplementary benefits	MR341
(5) MR350: "ad hoc" inquiries (obsolete with effect from 10 April 1985)	MR340 (obsolete with effect from 10 April 1985)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information in respect of supplementary benefit case-check visits is given in regular reports from local offices as part of his Department's management information system.

Mr. Whitney: The Department's management information system collects supplementary benefit visiting information in three major categories—new claim visits, repeat claim visits and all other visits. Case-check visits—that is where a claimant's full circumstances are re-examined during a visit—are included in each of these categories and separate figures are not available.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will place copies in the Library of report forms MR150, MR250/251, MR650 and MR351 used as part of his Department's management information system.

Mr. Whitney: Yes.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list and describe the performance indicators contained in the regular four-weekly reports made from local offices as part of his Department's management information system.

Mr. Whitney: The table lists and describes the performance indicators contained in the regular four-weekly reports made from local offices, as part of the Department's management information system.

Most of the performance indicators relate, in a percentage form, to work which was cleared (processed) during the four-week statistical period to the work which was available. The work available consists of the total work on hand. It would not be possible to clear all of the work during the four-week period as further inquiries and so on have to be made and this will vary according to the type of work.

The performance indicators are one means by which management monitors the progress of work.

Contributory benefits

The calculations used to determine the performance indicators at (1)-(6) below is:

$$\frac{\text{Work processed}}{\text{Work available}} \times 100$$

Performance Indicator	Description
1. Sickness Benefit	Relates to claims for sickness and invalidity benefits.
2. Maternity Allowance	Relates to claims for maternity allowance.
3. Retirement Pension Claims	Relates to claims for retirement pension.
4. Retirement Pension Load	Relates to queries and changes arising after retirement pension has been finally put into payment.
5. Contributions Files	Relates to queries arising on national insurance contributions and liability.
6. Contributions Pouches	Relates to less complex contributions matters which do not merit a file being made up.
7. Contribution files over 6 weeks old	This indicator expresses the number of contribution files over six weeks' old as a percentage of the contribution files which are outstanding at the end of the return period.
8. Short Term Contributory Benefit Payment Accuracy	This indicator expresses the number of errors found as a result of managerial checks of payments as a percentage of the total number of benefit payments thus checked.

Supplementary benefits

The calculations used to determine the performance indicators at (1)-(5) below is:

$$\frac{\text{Work processed}}{\text{Work available}} \times 100$$

Performance Indicator	Description
1. Non Caller Claims	Relates to all new and repeat claims to supplementary benefit which are dealt with by post or by visit.
2. Caller Claims	Relates to all new and repeat claims to supplementary benefit which are dealt with by an interview at the local office.
3. Local Officer 1 visits	Relate to cases which require a home visit and can be in respect of a new or repeat claim to supplementary benefit or as a result of matters arising on an existing claim.
4. Local Officer 2 visits	Relate to cases which require a home visit and can be in respect of a new or repeat claim to supplementary benefit or as a result of matters arising on an existing claim.
5. Assessment Review	Relates to assessment changes or further assessment action arising on a case after supplementary benefit has been put into payment.
6. Supplementary Benefit Payment Accuracy	This indicator expresses the number of errors found as a result of managerial checks of payments as a percentage of the total number of benefit payments thus checked.

Personal Social Services

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the latest available data on personal social services gross current expenditure, including joint finance, in similar form to that provided in 1984 to the Social Services Committee and published on page 14 of HC 395; and if he will publish a similar table showing (a) net current expenditure in constant prices, (b) gross unit costs, (c) net unit costs and (d) activity levels.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Neonatal Mortality

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will initiate consultations between paediatricians and officials of his Department to discuss the provision of resources to regional health authorities to enable them to improve facilities and trained staff levels in paediatric units in order to reduce the number of deaths of new-born babies.

Mr. John Patten: It is for regional health authorities to consider what improvements are required in their neonatal services and then, using the resources already allocated to them, to take action in the light of local needs and priorities.

Children in Care (School Attendance)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many children in care over statutory school leaving age attend school; and what guidance he issues to local authorities about enforcing school attendance on a child in care who is over statutory school leaving age.

Mr. John Patten: Information is not available centrally on the number of children in care who are attending school beyond school leaving age. No guidance about enforcement has been issued. In promoting a child's welfare, and having ascertained his wishes and feelings, local authorities may make whatever educational arrangements are reasonable for such children.

Benefits

Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to publish the report of the Social Security Advisory Committee on the Supplementary Benefit (Single Payments) Amendment Regulations 1983, and the Government's response.

Mr. Whitney: We have today laid the committee's report and the Government's response before the House.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many people in the constituency of Bootle have been on hospital waiting lists for major operations for over one year since May 1979;

(2) if he will publish in the Official Report a table indicating the number of people on hospital waiting lists in the constituency of Bootle for major operations, categorising each operation with its respective waiting list, in May 1979, June 1983 and February 1985, respectively.

Mr. John Patten: Waiting list information is available centrally by the specialty of treatment and not by operation. The available information for the South Sefton district health authority, which covers the Bootle constituency area, is given in the tables. In general, figures on waiting lists are believed to include a significant proportion of duplicated entries and patients who no longer require treatment. The amount of overstatement cannot readily be estimated, but is thought to exceed 10 per cent. nationally and could be considerably more. About half of all admissions to hospital are immediate, and many of those on waiting lists already have a planned date of admission.

* Provisional.

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to achieve the reduction of hospital waiting lists by 20 per cent.

Mr. John Patten: Before the health service industrial action in 1982, hospital inpatient waiting lists had fallen by 17 per cent. from 752,400 in March 1979 to 622,500 in March 1982. The latest available figure, for September 1984, is 682,000 (provisional), some 9 per cent. lower than the December 1982 figure of 746,100 and we expect this downward trend to continue. In general, figures on waiting lists are believed to include a significant proportion of duplicated entries and patients who no longer require treatment. The amount of overstatement cannot readily be estimated, but is thought to exceed 10 per cent.

nationally and could be considerably more. About half of all admissions to hospital are immediate, and many of those on waiting lists already have a planned date of admission.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will break down the national figure for the number of people in receipt of mobility allowance on 31 December 1984 by the length of time for which the awards were made.

Mr. Newton: The information is as follows:

	Number
Awards of 1 year	8,330
Over 1 year and up to and including 2 years	22,620
Over 2 years and up to and including 3 years	5,520
Over 3 years and up to and including 4 years	660

Up to age 75	271,530
Awards for life under the Mobility Allowance (Vehicle Scheme Beneficiaries) Regulations 1977	26,120

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many reviews of mobility allowance there were during the currency of an award in 1984 nationally which were instituted (a) by the insurance officer and (b) by the claimant; and in what proportion and number the allowance was withdrawn.

Mr. Newton: The information is as follows:

	Reviews at request of adjudication officer	Reviews at request of claimant or his representative
Number	75	287
Number in which allowance withdrawn	54	268
Percentage in which allowance withdrawn	72	93

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will give details of the numbers of decisions there were in 1984 on renewal claims for mobility allowance (a) nationally and (b) in each social security region; and if in each case he will give the proportion and number which were awarded;

(2) if he will give details of the number of decisions made on mobility allowance applications in 1984 (a) nationally and (b) in each social security region; and if he will in each case state the number of decisions in which an award of the allowance was made.

Mr. Newton: The information for Great Britain is as follows:

	Initial claims	Renewal claims	Total
Number of decisions	108,050	23,950	132,000
Number of awards	73,600	19,900	93,500
Percentage awarded	68·1	83·1	70·8

I regret that separate information is not available for each social security region.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will break down by age the numbers of those receiving (a) mobility allowance and (b) attendance allowance; and if he will break down the numbers awarded each allowance during 1984 in the same way.

Mr. Newton: The available information is as follows:

† Estimates as at 31 March 1984, the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people were in receipt of mobility allowance at 31 December 1984 nationally; and if he will break down the national figure by social security region and the rate per thousand population in each region.

Mr. Newton: The available information is as follows. I regret that it is not possible to give a regional breakdown.

	Number in receipt of mobility allowance*	Rate per 1,000 population (mid-1983 estimates)
England	281,940	6·0
Scotland	40,515	7·9
Wales	30,365	10·8

* Includes recipients under the Mobility Allowance (Vehicle Scheme Beneficiaries) Regulations 1977.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in the case of initial and renewal claims for mobility allowance, how many appeals by claimants from a decision of an insurance officer were decided upon by medical boards and how many appeals from a decision of a medical board were decided upon by a medical appeal tribunal in 1984; and in each case what number was successful.

Mr. Newton: The available information is as follows:

	Numbers
Appeals and references decided by medical board	14,750
Decided in claimant's favour	4,800
Appeals decided by medical appeal tribunal	3,933
Decided in claimant's favour	1,107

I regret that it is not possible to identify initial and renewal claims separately.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average length of time between receipt of a claim for mobility allowance and the issue of an order book (a) when the allowance is awarded on the initial application, (b) when it is awarded by a medical board and (c) when it is awarded by a medical appeal tribunal on appeal from a board.

Mr. Newton: The time taken from receipt of a claim for mobility allowance until an order book is received by a successful claimant is about eight and a half weeks where the award is made by the adjudication officer on the basis of a report by an examining medical practitioner, and about 16 weeks where the allowance is awarded by a medical board. Such information is not available about claims which go on appeal either to a medical board or to a medical appeal tribunal because the length of time between the disallowance of a claim and the making of the appeal varies so widely. However, the average time taken by a medical board or medical appeal tribunal to deal with an appeal is five and a half weeks and 99 18 weeks respectively.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claims have been made for mobility allowance; how many claims for mobility allowance have been rejected; how many appeals to local tribunals against decision to reject payment of mobility allowance have been made; and how many of these appeals have been found in favour of the claimant in each of the social security regions, in each of the past five years.

Mr. Newton: The available information is as follows:

	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Total decisions made in each year on initial claims	85,730	60,770	88,100	106,800	108,050
Total decisions resulting in disallowance	25,550	19,330	29,100	36,950	34,450

Details of appeals and references to local tribunals on the non-medical conditions for mobility allowance in the years to 1983 are given in "Social Security Statistics 1984", table 15.20. It is not possible to break down the information into social security regions. Equivalent details for 1984 are not yet available.

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what number and proportion of reviews of attendance allowance awards initiated by him in 1984 followed notification of a change in circumstances by the claimant.

Mr. Newton: None. Notification of change of circumstances by the claimant is treated as an application for review by the claimant.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average length of time between receipt of a claim for attendance allowance and the issue of an order book (a) when the allowance is awarded on the initial application and (b) when it is awarded after a review.

Mr. Newton: At 28 February, the latest date for which information is available, the times taken for payment to be sent to the claimant were (a) 10 weeks, (b) 18 weeks.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list the number of applications for renewal of attendance allowance in 1984 nationally and in each social security region; and in each case what proportion and number (a) were awarded (i) the higher rate and (ii) the lower rate on the initial application, (b) requested a review after (i) refusal of the allowance and (ii) award of the lower rate and (c) upon review were (i) awarded the lower rate and (ii) awarded the higher rate, (iii) had the lower rate increased to the higher rate and (iv) had the lower rate withdrawn;

(2) if he will list the number of applicants for attendance allowance in 1984, nationally and in each social security region; and in each case what number and proportion (a) were awarded (i) the higher rate and (ii) the lower rate on the initial application, (b) requested a review after (i) refusal of the allowance and (ii) award of the lower rate and (c) upon review were (i) awarded the lower rate, (ii) awarded the higher rate, (iii) had the lower rate increased to the higher rate and (iv) had the lower rate withdrawn;

(3) if he will list the number of awards of attendance allowance which were made in 1984 nationally and in each social security region; and if he will break down the national figure by the length of time for which they were made.

Mr. Newton: The information available is as follows. It relates to decisions given in 1984, not to applications made in that year. For Great Britain, the total number of decisions made was 239,774 of which 67,445 (28·1 per cent.) resulted in a higher rate award; 114,325 (47·7 per cent.) resulted in a lower rate award. A regional breakdown is given in the tables.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of people in receipt of attendance allowance at each rate at 31 December 1984; and if he will break down the figures by (a) social security region, (b) the rate per 1,000 population in each region and (c) the rate per 1,000 of population over 65 years of age in each region.

Mr. Newton: The total number of people estimated to be in receipt of attendance allowance at 31 March 1984, the latest date for which figures are available, is as follows:

	Number
Higher rate	192,000
Lower rate	277,000

The analysis requested will take a few weeks to prepare. I shall reply as soon as it is ready.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of reviews of attendance allowance during the currency of an award in 1984, nationally and in each social security region, which were instituted (a) by him and (b) by the claimant; and in case what was the number and proportion in which (i) the allowance was withdrawn, (ii) the existing award was retained, (iii) the higher rate was decreased to the lower rate and (iv) the lower rate was increased to the higher rate.

Mr. Newton: The information available is in the table. It relates to decisions given in 1984 and not to applications made in that year.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services for the last three years for which figures are available what was the number and proportion of reviews of attendance allowance decisions with an outcome favourable to the appellant in which the award was backdated to the date from which it would have been payable had the initial claim succeeded.

Mr. Newton: The numbers of reviews of attendance allowance made because the claimant was dissatisfied with the original decision, and which had an outcome favourable to the claimant, are as follows:

	Numbers
1982	6,978
1983	8,085
1984	9,116

Backdating applied in all these cases.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people requested a review of an attendance allowance decision on the grounds that (a) the first decision was wrong and (b) their condition had deteriorated.

Mr. Newton: In 1984 the numbers were (a) 15,175 (b) 16,838.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claims have been made for attendance allowance; of these, how many claims for attendance allowance have been rejected; how many appeals to local tribunals against decisions to reject payment of attendance allowance have been made; and how many of these appeals have been found in favour of the claimant in each of the social security regions in each of the past five years.

Mr. Newton: Information on claims and decisions unfavourable to the claimant is as follows:

	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Initial claims received in each year	147,000	167,000	193,000	233,000	258,000
Total decisions made in each year on initial claims	139,000	149,000	182,000	217,000	240,000
Total decisions resulting in initial disallowance	40,000	41,000	46,000	58,000	58,000

Details of appeals and references to local tribunals against disallowance of the non-medical conditions for attendance allowance in the years to 1983 are given in "Social Security Statistics 1984," table 14.20. It is not possible to break down the information into social security regions.

Equivalent details for 1984 are not yet available.

Medicines Act (Infringements)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on how many occasions during 1984 his Department has (a) investigated infringements of the Medicines Act, (b) warned companies that the Act was being infringed and requested remedial action and (c) prosecuted companies for infringement of the Act; and why publicity is not given to such investigations.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the right hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

NHS Computer Policy Committee

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make a statement on the future of the National Health Service computer policy committee and the steering group on health services information.

Mr. John Patten: We have been reviewing the management of the work which needs to be done centrally on management information and information technology for NHS hospital and community health services. As soon as the NHS managment board is in place, we propose to strengthen arrangements at the centre in two main ways.

First, the NHS computer policy committee and the steering group on health services information will be wound up and replaced by a single information advisory group. The new group will be chaired by the member of the board who is responsible for information matters. It will have no executive responsibilities, but will be asked to advise the board on strategic issues and management priorities in the information field. We are consulting regional health authorities on the membership of the group, which will consist primarily of senior managers from regions and districts.

Secondly, the work which needs to be done at the centre will be brought under the direct control of the management board, through the same board member. A substantial proportion of this work will continue to be undertaken by health authority staff.

I take this opportunity to pay tribute to the considerable achievements of the computer policy committee and the steering group on health services information.

High Rent Area Authorisation

Mrs. Beckett: asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the number of tenants who will be adversely affected by the proposed changes in the threshold for high rent area authorisations effective from 1 April (a) in authorities which will lose the authorisation entirely and (b) in authorities which will continue to receive an authorisation but at a higher threshold, and if he will estimate the average loss per tenant (i) in authorities losing authorisation for both public authority and private tenants, (ii) in authorities losing authorisation in respect of public authority tenants alone, (iii) in authorities losing authorisation in respect of private tenants alone, (iv) in respect of authorities losing class authorisations and (v) in authorities continuing to receive an authorisation but at a higher threshold.

Mr. Whitney [Pursuant to his reply, 5 March 1985, c. 515-16]: Information on which to base the detailed estimates requested is not available. However, we estimate that nationally some 120,000 claimants will be affected by the proposed changes to the high rent scheme. This is higher than the figure originally estimated because more authorities are now participating in the high rent scheme. Claimants living in an area where the authority will retain its high rent authorisation will lose an average of 42p per week. Losses for claimants living in an area where the authority will lose its high rent authorisation will depend on the level of rent paid.

DEFENCE

Northern Europe

2. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom commitment to the defence of Northern Europe.

Mr. Stanley: There is a strong United Kingdom commitment, through NATO, to the defence of the NATO countries of northern Europe. This commitment is reflected in the fact that 3 Commando Brigade, as part of the United Kingdom/Netherlands amphibious force, and the United Kingdom mobile force have the reinforcement of the northern region as their principal role. The United Kingdom also makes a significant contribution to the Allied Command Europe mobile force which has options to deploy there. In addition, RAF Jaguars are specifically assigned to the northern region, and Harriers and Tornados are assigned to SACEUR's strategic air reserve which could also be deployed there.

Strategic Defence Initiative

8. Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received from the United States Government concerning the strategic defence initiative.

49. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had with North Atlantic Treaty Organisation's allies on the strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Butler: My right hon. Friend has discussed the strategic defence initiative with the United States Secretary of Defence on a number of occasions, most recently when he accompanied the Prime Minister to the United States in February.

18. Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement concerning British participation in the strategic defence initiative.

43. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what input, financial or manpower, the United Kingdom will make towards the United States star wars research project; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: I can add little to the written answer I gave my hon. Friend on 15 March. I can confirm that we shall be discussing shortly with the United States Government how best to pursue this matter. As far as United Kingdom industry is concerned, it has a wide range of expertise in relevant areas of technology and we have already received expressions of interest from several of our leading defence companies. It is our intention to ensure that United Kingdom industry is kept as fully informed as possible.

22. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give his assessment of the effect of the United States strategic defence initiative on Britain's defence capability.

Mr. Butler: The strategic defence initiative is a long-term research programme still in its early stages. Its overall aim is to enhance deterrence, the maintenance of which is central to the security of the nations of the NATO alliance.

Anti-nuclear Protest Groups

11. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any civil servants in his Department are currently required, as part of their responsibilities, to monitor the activities of anti-nuclear protest groups.

15. Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any civil servants in his Department are currently required, as part of their responsibilities, to monitor the activities of anti-nuclear protest groups.

28. Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any civil servants in his Department are required, as part of their responsibilities, to monitor the activities of anti-nuclear protest groups.

Mr. Stanley: As stated in reply to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on 9 April last year, it is the Ministry of Defence's responsibility to be aware of any activities which might have security or operational implications, and to follow closely the public debate on nuclear issues. This work is undertaken by staff across the Ministry of Defence as part of their normal duties.

Trident Missile

17. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on the development of the Trident programme.

27. Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on the development of the Trident programme.

55. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on the development of the Trident programme.

Mr. Butler: The programme for replacing Polaris with Trident in the mid-1990s is proceeding satisfactorily and on schedule. Tenders have now been received from Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Limited for the construction of the first of the four United Kingdom Trident class submarines, and negotiations are in hand with a view to concluding a contract by the end of 1985. As regards the strategic weapon system, the full-scale engineering development phase has been under way in the United States for some time and is making good progress. As far as the development of the Clyde submarine base is concerned, on 7 March the Secretary of State for Scotland gave his approval to the Department's notice of proposed development subject to a number of requirements being met in order to minimise, as far as possible, the impact of the proposed developments.

33. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest estimate of the cost to Britain of Trident missiles.

Mr. Butler: I refer to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence to the hon. Members for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang), for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) and for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) on 29 January at columns 134-37.

38. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is satisfied with control of servicing arrangements for the Trident missile system.

Mr. Butler: Yes.

44. Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what implications there would be for Trident if the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics goes ahead in the development of a defence in space against ballistic nuclear weapons.

Mr. Butler: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces on 26 February 1985 at column 157.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the purchase of Trident from the United States includes the transfer of warhead design or components.

Mr. Butler: The nuclear warheads to be fitted in the British Trident D5 missile system will be of British design and manufacture.

Cruise Missiles

19. Sir William van Straubenzee asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether, in view of the disarmament negotiations opening in Geneva, he will consider postponing the further deployment of cruise missiles.

Mr. Stanley: No. We have, however, always made it clear that NATO's deployment, which is planned to be completed over a five year period, can be halted, modified or revised at any time if results in arms control negotiations warrant it. To halt our own deployment of intermediate nuclear forces unilaterally would perpetuate the very substantial superiority of the Soviet Union in this area and remove any incentive on it to negotiate reductions.

American W82 Shell

20. Mr. McWilliam asked the Secretary of State for Defence if it will be possible to fire the American W82 shell from the British/German/Italian FH70 howitzer.

Mr. Butler: Although the W82 shell is the same calibre as the FH70 howitzer, we have made no attempt to ascertain whether in fact the shell is suitable for use with the FH70. In any case, the question does not arise, since the FH70 howitzer in United Kingdom service has no nuclear role and is not intended to be a nuclear delivery system.

Chemical Weapons

21. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the United Kingdom would be prepared to accept the pre-positioning of either the present generation of United States chemical weapons, or a possible new generation of such weapons, in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: No such request has been made to us. Like the United Kingdom, the United States Government have made clear that they are fully committed to seeking a comprehensive, verifiable and world-wide ban on chemical weapons at the conference on disarmament in Geneva.

NATO Nuclear Planning Group

23. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation nuclear planning group.

31. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation nuclear planning group.

42. Mr. Stott asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation nuclear planning group.

46. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning his meeting with North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Ministers on 26 March.

Mr. Stanley: The current meeting of the nuclear planning group in Luxembourg is one of a series of bi-annual meetings of NATO defence Ministers, the purpose of which is to discuss nuclear matters within the alliance.

25. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals he will be putting to the meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation nuclear planning group on 26 and 27 March.

Mr. Stanley: My right hon. Friend will, as usual, be making his full contribution to the discussions of the NATO nuclear planning group today and tomorrow. The details of the discussions are confidential, but a communiqué will be issued at the end of the meeting.

European Anti-ballistic Missile System

24. Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on proposals for a European anti-ballistic missile system.

Mr. Butler: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Members for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) and for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short)

Defence Procurement Costs

26. Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Defence what rate of inflation in defence procurement costs he expects up to 1987-88; and whether he expects to differ from general inflation in the United Kingdom economy.

Mr. Butler: The extent to which future rates of inflation in defence procurement may differ from inflation in the economy generally will be influenced by factors which cannot be reliably predicted, such as differences in the pattern of inputs and in productivity. It will be my Department's aim to reduce procurement costs through continued emphasis on value for money and the exercise of competition.

Royal Dockyards

29. Mr. Duffy asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he intends to introduce his White Paper on the future of the royal dockyards.

Mr. Lee: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, South-East (Mr. Hicks) earlier today.

United Kingdom Forces Overseas (Motor Vehicles)

30. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Defence to what extent it is his policy for forces personnel serving overseas to be provided whilst on duty with motor vehicles made in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lee: We buy British vehicles whenever it is sensible, practicable and consistent with our international obligations to do so. We resort to overseas procurement only when this offers substantial advantages of cost, performance and time scale. At present over 95 per cent. of our motor vehicles come from United Kingdom-based suppliers.

Bomber Command (Medal)

32. Mr. Beaumont-Dark asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will consider striking a medal in recognition of the service of Bomber Command air crews in the 1939 to 1945 war.

Mr. Lee: No. While we do, of course, accept that many acts of courage and heroism during wartime went unrecognised, the striking of new medals for service during the second world war came to an end many years ago and no further review is contemplated.

P120 Aircraft

34. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his assessment of the relative advantages to the British aviation industry of developing P120 as opposed to the European fighter aircraft.

Mr. Butler: Evaluation of possible means of satisfying the need for a replacement for Jaguar and Phantom aircraft is proceeding. It would be premature to comment on the relative merits of the P120 and EFA at this stage.

RAF Molesworth

35. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement on the present state of security at Molesworth.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement on 1 March 1985 at column 298.

Defence Establishments (Security)

36. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, in the light of the case of R. v Rigley and McCarthy, he has taken further measures to ensure the security of establishments where defence equipment is produced.

Mr. Butler: No special measures have been taken as a result of this case; but we do continuously review security arrangements of companies which have classified defence contracts.

Phantom and Jaguar Aircraft (Replacement)

37. Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made with the Phantom and Jaguar replacement.

Mr. Butler: I have nothing to add to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Thorne).

Offshore Patrol Vessel II Programme

39. Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many representations he has received concerning the future of the offshore patrol vessel II programme.

Mr. Lee: Three. No decision has been taken yet on whether to order any additional Castle class offshore patrol vessels (OPV II).

Soviet Union (SS Missiles)

40. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the current types and deployment of SS missiles targeted by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on Western Europe.

Mr. Stanley: The situation as at the early part of last year was set out in figure 11 "The Balance of Nuclear Forces" on page 43 of Vol. I of the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1984. All those SS missiles shown as longer range INF, shorter range INF and short range forces in Europe would be directed towards Western Europe. In addition, some of the strategic system SS missiles could also be targeted on Western Europe. This data will be revised in the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1985.

Crown Proceedings Act

41. Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will seek to amend section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act.

Mr. Stanley: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to the right hon. Member for Stoke on Trent, South (Mr. Ashley).

Tornado Aircraft

45. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a further statement on the progress of the deployment of the air defence variant of the Tornado.

Mr. Butler: The first two Tornado F2s were delivered to RAF Coningsby last year for ground training and familiarisation. Crew training for the operational conversion unit has started at British Aerospace, Warton. The Tornado F2 will enter front-line service next year as planned, although some rephasing of the deployment plan will be necessary as a result of delays during the development of the air intercept radar.

British Army of the Rhine

47. Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he next proposes to review force levels in the British Army of the Rhine.

Mr. Stanley: We stand by our commitment to maintain the strength of BAOR at not less than 55,000 in peace, consistent with our obligations under the Brussels treaty. Within that commitment, the detailed composition of BAOR is under constant review to achieve the optimum and most cost-effective mix of forces.

Nuclear Artillery

48. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has taken steps to include on the agenda of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation's nuclear planning group the deployment in Europe of nuclear artillery shells.

Mr. Stanley: Nuclear planning group agendas are confidential.

Reserve Forces (Recruitment)

50. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about recruitment to the reserve forces since March 1984.

Mr. Lee: With the greater emphasis on the role and importance of the reserve forces, the need to recruit the necessary volunteer reservists is increasingly important.

The following is a table showing the intake for the reserves from 31 March 1984 to 31 September 1984.

Volunteer Services
Intake—31 March 1984-30 September 1984

Service	Intake	Total Strength as at 30 September 1984
RNR	473	5,226
RMR*	134	1,047
TA	18,756	71,425
R. Aux AF	342	1,156
RAFVR	7	61
Totals	19,712	78,915

* RMR figures cover period 31.3.84-31.12.84

Measures to further improve levels of recruitment are currently in hand.

Stockholm Conference

51. Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for Defence if anyone from his Department has participated in the work of the United Kingdom delegation to the Stockholm conference on security and confidence building in Europe.

Mr. Butler: I assume the hon. Member is referring to the Stockholm conference on disarmament in Europe, which was set up under the auspices of the conference on security and co-operation in Europe to discuss confidence and security-building measures in the military field.

Staff of the defence arms control unit work closely with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on a day-to-day basis in evaluating reports from and formulating advice to the United Kingdom delegation to CDE. In addition DACU staff occasionally attend sessions of the CDE, and are directly involved in consultations with members of the United Kingdom delegation on visits to London. Two members of the delegation are on secondment from the Ministry of Defence.

Royal Irish Rangers

52. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Defence what further consideration has been given to the future disposition of the Royal Irish Rangers.

Mr. Lee: It is not our policy to comment on future operational deployments. Arrangements for the training of recruits to the Royal Irish Rangers were set out in my answer to the question from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Sir A. Buck) on 14 March at column 204.

Airframe Manufacture

53. Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he proposes to introduce greater competition to his Department's requirements for airframe manufacture.

Mr. Butler: Our policy is to procure our defence equipment by competitive means whenever practicable and reasonable.

European Fighter Aircraft

54. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on current international negotiations over the European fighter aircraft project.

Mr. Butler: I have nothing to add to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Thorne).

Defence Equipment (Aish Company)

56. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those items of defence equipment supplied to or on behalf of his Department by the Aish company in each of the last five years.

Mr. Lee: Over the last five years this company has supplied electrical and electronic equipment to the Ministry and to shipbuilders for installation in warships. The principal items have been:

Main switchboard and switch gear.
Versatile console systems (both consoles and units).

Information on equipment supplied is not readily available on a year by year basis.

Defence Procurement

57. Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Defence what progress he has made in introducing greater competition to defence procurement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: Provisional figures indicate that during the 1984 calendar year, over 40 per cent. by value of new headquarters contracts were placed following effective competition between two or more firms. When the value of contract amendments, which comprise a considerable proportion by value of our procurement expenditure, is also taken into account, we would expect the annual figures for the financial year 1984-85 to show a welcome increase of 4 to 5 percentage points over the figures for 1983-84, when 22 per cent. by value of contracts and amendments were placed following effective competition.

Youth Training Scheme

58. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Defence to what extent his Department is participating in the youth training scheme; and what is the annual cost.

Mr. Lee: There are over 650 young people currently participating in the civilian youth training scheme operating in my Department. Approximately half are in the "Special" YTS operating in Germany for the young dependents of the British forces and civilians serving there. Precise figures relating to the annual cost of running the scheme are not available; however, in a full year based on these numbers, and with "additionality", receipts from the MSC amount to £2 million out of which we pay the trainees' allowances and their college fees, and use the remainder to purchase training equipment and machinery for the use of both the trainees and apprentices in our establishments.

The armed services youth training scheme (ASYTS), although running parallel to the civil YTS scheme, is separate from it. The scheme has continued to provide worth while work and training opportunities for young unemployed people. There have so far been some 5,500 applications, of which 1,481 have been accepted, since the commencement of the scheme.

The estimated net cost to public funds of the ASYTS for FY 84/85 (April-January) is about £1.4 million.

Defence School of Music (Deal)

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received about the siting of a new joint defence school of music in Deal.

Mr. Lee: We have received six approaches about the siting of the defence school of music at Deal. We have also received a number of representations about the closure of Kneller hall.

Military and Defence Establishments

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the military and defence establishments situated in Cumbria, Lancashire, Merseyside, Greater Manchester and Cheshire and, in each case, the numbers of service and civilian personnel stationed or employed in them.

Mr. Stanley: I shall write to the right hon. Gentleman.

Service Personnel (Regulations)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how the regulations of the British armed forces compare and differ from the armed forces of each of the other North Atlantic Treaty Organisation member states with regard to (a) the active participation of service personnel in public meetings, (b) the writing of letters to the press by service personnel, (c) equal pay for service women and men of the same rank, (d) maternity leave for service women and their right to return to their former jobs in the armed forces after childbirth, and (e) the opening up of all military occupations, including hi-tech and combat roles, to service women on an equal basis with men;

(2) how the regulations of the British armed forces compare and differ from the armed forces of each of the other North Atlantic Treaty Organisation member states with regard to (a) the segregation of service women in all-female corps, (b) the legislation on homosexuality for service personnel, (c) the existence of an independent military ombudsman to investigate the individual complaints and grievances of service personnel, and (d) the right of service personnel facing disciplinary charges to have legal representation;

(3) how the regulations of the British armed forces compare and differ from the armed forces of each of the other North Atlantic Treaty Organisation member states with regard to (a) the active involvement of service personnel in political parties, (b) the active involvement of service personnel in political campaign and pressure groups, (c) the active participation of service personnel in trade unions and their right to take industrial action and (d) the active participation of service personnel in marches and demonstrations.

Mr. Lee: The information requested for other North Atlantic Treaty Organisation member states could be provided only at disproportionate time and effort.

My noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces will write in response to the various issues as they affect our own services.

Team Spirit 1985

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Defence if any of the British service men in South Korea will be involved in a Team Spirit 1985 manoeuvres.

Mr. Stanley: No British service men are participating in this exercise, although it will be observed by our defence attaché in Seoul.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the opening of the airport at Mount Pleasant on the Falkland Islands will result in a decrease in the numbers of Harriers, Phantoms and Hercules aircraft, and in the numbers of radar operators, aircraft maintenance ground crew and Royal Air Force Regiment personnel based in the Falklands.

Mr. Stanley: As stated in paragraph 448 of the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1984 (Vol. 1), once the airfield is complete it should be possible to reduce the levels of permanently-stationed forces on the islands. It would not be in the public interest to detail our intentions as to the future make-up of the forces defending the islands.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans Her Majesty's Government have to deploy, for short or long periods, Tornado GR1, Nimrod MR1/2, Buccaneer, Jaguar or Victor/Hercules tanker aircraft to the Falklands.

Mr. Stanley: All the aircraft to which the hon. Member refers could be deployed to the Falkland Islands at short notice, if necessary. It would not be in the public interest to detail our reinforcement plans.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what the frequency of TriStar and/or VC10 flights will be to the Falklands when Mount Pleasant airport is completed.

Mr. Stanley: We currently expect two or three flights a week to Mount Pleasant airport, depending upon the type of wide-bodied aircraft used and the actual passenger and priority freight requirement.

Space Weapons

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with North Atlantic Treaty Organisation allies concerning space weapons.

Mr. Butler: My right hon. Friend meets his fellow Defence Ministers frequently for discussions on a range of subjects of common interest including the implications of new defence technologies.

Nuclear Testing Area (Wick)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence why the files relating to the consideration given to an area near Wick as a possible testing area for an atomic device in 1954 have not yet been made available for public inspection; if Her Majesty's Government will now arrange this; and if he will also make arrangements to place a copy in the Library.

Mr. Butler: In accordance with the normal rules, the file from which was extracted the letter used in evidence at the Australian Royal Commission was not due for public release until 1998. However, the very considerable number of unclassified documents and records which has been released to the Commission is in the process of being made available to the Public Records Office, some of them, such as the letter relating to the consideration given to trials at a location near Wick, in advance of their normal release under the Public Records Act. Because of the number of documents involved, it may take a little time before all the records are publicly available, but I am placing a copy of the letter concerning the area near Wick and other related documents in the Library.

United States Military Hospitals

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any United States National Guards units are earmarked to provide security at United States military hospitals in Britain in wartime

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 18 March 1985, c. 411]: Although detailed information about plans for the security of military establishments in war is classified, I can confirm that, at present, no United States National Guard units are earmarked to provide security at United States military hospitals in Britain in wartime.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether British or United States services are responsible for security at United States Air Force and Navy hospitals in the United Kingdom in wartime

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 18 March 1985, c. 411]: The United States authorities will be responsible for the protection of their own hospitals in the United Kingdom in circumstances beyond the capability of the civil police who have primacy in such matters.

United States Marine Corps (Materials and Supplies)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements have been made for the prepositioning of military material and supplies for the United States Marine Corps in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to the reply, 18 March 1985, c. 410]: Arrangements exist but the details are classified.

Practice Bombing Runs

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish figures to show the number of practice bombing runs carried out in each year since 1981 at the air-to-ground weapons ranges at Rosehearty and Cape Wrath; and if he will provide a breakdown of these figures into Royal Air Force, United States air force, other North Atlantic Treaty Organisation air forces and non-North Atlantic Treaty Organisation air forces.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 18 March 1985, c. 409]: The figures are as follows:

	1981	1982	1983	1984
Rosehearty
Royal Air Force	1,190	1,476	1,474	2,346
United States air force	6,669	6,820	4,826	4,626
Other NATO air forces	24	35	4	52
Tain
Royal Air Force	8,305	9,045	8,838	7,051
United States air force	3,486	4,920	3,487	2,246
Other NATO air forces	28	26	8	90
Cape Wrath
Royal Air Force	n/a	*255	439	438
United States air force	n/a	*237	123	206
Other NATO air forces	n/a	*0	0	0

* From May.
n/a=Not available.

There has been no use of these ranges by non-NATO air forces.

SCOTLAND

Cormorants

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many applications for licences to kill cormorants were received in 1984; how many were issued; to whom the licences were issued; how many cormorants the licences allowed to be killed; how many cormorants were killed under licence in 1984; and if he will provide the same information for 1985 to date.

Mr. John MacKay: Twenty-five applications were received and 25 licences were issued to owners and occupiers of inland salmon and freshwater fisheries and district salmon fishery boards in 1984 for the protection of salmon and trout fisheries. No limits were placed on the number of birds to be killed. A total of 886 cormorants were killed under licence.

In the current year 17 applications have been received and 16 licences have been issued. One application is still under consideration. Returns received to date indicate that 45 birds have been killed.

Licence applications are treated in confidence, so it would not be appropriate to list the names of the licensees.

Cervical Screening

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the percentage of women aged over 35 and under 35 years, respectively, who have been tested for cervical cancer in each Scottish health board area in the latest year for which figures are available; and in what percentage of cases in each area the test proved positive.

Mr. Younger: The information is not available in the form requested. However, in 1983 a total of 315,044 smears for cervical cancer were examined by NHS laboratories in Scotland which represented approximately 16 per cent. of women aged 20 and over. An estimated 31 per cent. of women aged 20-34 and 10 per cent. of women aged 35 and over were tested. Of the smears examined, 1,694 or 0·54 per cent. proved positive.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is satisfied with the present arrangements for notifying women in Scotland of the results of smear tests for cervical cancer; and what advice he has given to health boards on this matter.

Mr. Younger: A report by a working group on cervical cytology services in Scotland, which the Scottish Home and Health Department drew to the attention of health boards on 1 December 1978, specifically advised on the action to be taken on positive, atypical and negative smear test results. The report emphasised that clearly defined procedures should be established to ensure that the appropriate follow up is initiated and co-ordinated. It is for health boards to determine how this advice is implemented in operating the cervical cytology service.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the number of women who died in Scotland of cervical cancer 10 years ago, five years ago and in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Younger: 210 in 1974, 224 in 1979 and 224 (provisional figure) in 1984.

Raptores

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of each of the protected raptores; and if their numbers are increasing or declining.

Mr. Ancram: The Scottish Home and Health Department does not keep wild bird population statistics but I am advised by the Nature Conservancy Council that the most recent available estimates for Great Britain are:

	Numbers
Common Buzzard	12,000 pairs	Increasing
Honey Buzzard	4-10 pairs	Stable
Golden Eagle	4-500 pairs	Increasing
Goshawk	70 pairs	Increasing slowly
Marsh Harrier	25 pairs	Increasing
hen Harrier	600 pairs	Stable
Montagu's Harrier	2-9 pairs	Decreasing
Hobby	100-180 pairs	Stable
Kestrel	70,000 pairs	Stable
Merlin	3-400 pairs	Decreasing
Peregrine	8-900 pairs	Increasing
Red Kite	46 pairs	Stable
Sparrowhawk	20,000 pairs	Increasing
Osprey	25-30 pairs	Stable

Separate estimates for Scotland are not available.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of (a) prosecutions and (b) convictions of persons illegally taking eggs from the nests of protected raptores in 1984.

Mr. Ancram: This information is not available.

Housing Finance

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report for each district and islands council in Scotland the net change in housing support grant to be paid in 1985-86 over that paid under the 1984-85 order.

Mr. Ancram: The information is set out in the following table and takes account of the increases in grant under The Housing Support Grant (Scotland) Variation Order 1985.

Housing Improvement Grants

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many applications for home improvement grants are currently waiting to be processed by district councils in Scotland;

(2) what information he has as to the total number of applicants waiting for housing improvement grants in Inverclyde at the latest date on which figures are available.

Mr. Ancram: The information requested is not held centrally.

Local Authorities (Expenditure)

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of the total expenditure and of revenue expenditure of local authorities in Scotland is met by domestic, commercial and industrial ratepayers, respectively, in the latest year for which figures are available; and what he estimates these figures will be in the year 1985-86.

Mr. Younger: Figures based on budget information for 1984-85 contained in the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy publication "Rating Review" are set out below. A provisional estimate for 1985-86 has also been provided.

Percentage of total local authority expenditure met by:

	1984-85 per cent.	1985-86 per cent.
Domestic ratepayers	15·9	17·8
Commercial ratepayers	12·7	13·6
Industrial ratepayers	4·9	4·8

Notes:

1. For the purpose of this question, total local authority expenditure is relevant expenditure for rate support grant purposes, including loan charges, total rate fund contributions to the Housing Revenue Account and total rate fund contributions to other non-relevant services.
2. The domestic rate income figure used in the calculations excludes the domestic element of rate support grant.

Broadleaved Woodland

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy that decisions as to the species with which felled broadleaved trees should be replaced should take into account soil suitability and economic factors, including job opportunities, in rural areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Policy proposals for broadleaved woodland are being developed by the Forestry Commission under the broadleaves in Britain review, and the considerations mentioned by my hon. Friend will be taken into account. I expect a statement arising from that review to be made to the House by the summer Recess.

Peterhead Prison

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what further progress has been made in the preparation of the architect's brief for the new Peterhead prison; when he anticipates that this brief will be issued; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: An outline architect's brief for the new Peterhead prison is nearing completion and should be issued within the next month. The brief will then be developed in consultation with the architects to arrive at sketch plans and a final design. Construction on site is programmed to begin in 1987.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many incidents of unrest at Peterhead prison have been reported to him in the year 1984 and to the latest date in 1985, which involved injuries to prison officers serving in the prison; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: The number of incidents at Peterhead prison in 1984 and 1985 to date in which members of prison staff sustained injuries was 19 and 5 respectively.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will arrange to visit Peterhead prison to discuss with the governor and representatives of the Prison Officers Association any further action which may be required for additional isolation units and an increase in the number of officers who are employed within the prison.

Mr. Ancram: I have no plans at present to visit Peterhead prison. A senior official from prisons group headquarters has already visited the prison since the recent incident and I have asked my officials to make a further visit to Peterhead to discuss what action may need to be taken.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will investigate the circumstances in which seven prison officers at Peterhead prison recently sustained injuries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: Police investigations have resulted in four prisoners being charged on a number of counts. Until these charges have been disposed of I can make no further comment.

Forestry (Felling Licences)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions in 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1985-86 to date the Forestry Commission consulted the agriculture departments over applications for felling licences to clear woodland for agricultural purposes.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 14 March 1985, c. 224]: The information is as follows:

	Number of Consultations
Year to 31 March 1983	135
Year to 31 March 1984	185
9 months to 31 December 1984	144

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether there are any cases in the last three years when applications for felling licences for conversion of woodlands to agriculture were refused by the Forestry Commission, even though the agriculture department concerned had confirmed that the proposed conversion would make a significant contribution to the viability and economy of the remainder of the agricultural holding, and there were no other objections to the proposed felling from any other authorities consulted.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 14 March 1985, c. 224]: There have been no cases of outright refusal in these circumstances but some of the licences have required the replanting of part of the woodland or the planting of an alternative site on the same farm.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions in 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 to date officials from his department confirmed to the Forestry Commission that a proposal to clearfell a broadleaved woodland and convert it to agriculture would make a significant contribution to the viability and economy of the agricultural holding concerned.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 15 March 1985, c. 301]: The information which covers all three Agriculture Departments is as follows:

	Number of Occasions
Year to 31 March 1983	36
Year to 31 March 1984	61
9 months to 31 December 1984	12

Forest Estates (Sales)

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the forest estates, together with their acreage, which have been sold by the Forestry Commission over the last 12 months.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 19 March 1985, c. 446]: The properties sold during the 12 months to 21 February 1985, the latest date for which information is available, were as follows:

Public Expenditure

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will publish a table, otherwise identical to page 51 of "Public Expenditure in 1987-88: A Commentary on the Scottish Programme", but expressed in (a) cost terms and (b) volume terms and showing percentage changes over 1978-79;

(2) if he will publish a table, otherwise identical to page 51 of "Public Expenditure in 1987-88: A Commentary on the Scottish Programme", but expressed in (a) cost terms and (b) volume terms.

Mr. Ancram [pursuant to the reply, 21 March 1985, c. 608-9]: There follows a table in cost terms, which includes percentage changes over 1978-79 for the programme as a whole and the main sub-totals within the programme. Since public expenditure is now planned in cash, the information needed to construct volume figures is no longer collected comprehensively.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

European Community (Commission Programme)

Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs with which parts of the programme of the Commission of the European Economic Community for 1985 Her Majesty's Government agree; and with which they disagree.

Mr. Rifkind: Copies of the Commission's programme, which is primarily designed to inform the European Parliament of the Commission's plans for its first year in office, have been placed in the Library of the House.

The programme contains much which coincides with our own priorities, for example:

the emphasis on price stability;
the recognition of the need to reform the CAP;
the priority accorded to completion of the international market;
the commitment to a more open transport system, including the phasing out of lorry quotas.

In some areas, such as social policy, some of the Commission priorities are different from our own and we regret it, for example, the absence of emphasis on the need to reduce the burden of regulation on European businesses. Not all the ideas set out in the paper will be turned into formal proposals. We shall make our views known on such proposals as they come forward.

European Commission (President)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Government policy towards the proposed election of the President of the European Commission by all voters in European Community member states.

Mr. Rifkind: We are not aware of any proposal of this kind. The treaties provide that the members of the Commission (including the President) are appointed by common accord of the member states' Governments.

European Union

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Government policy towards greater political and economic co-operation between European Community member states and towards eventual European union.

Mr. Rifkind: We wish to see greater European unity brought about in practical ways, including concerted action in the political co-operation framework; completion of the common market for goods and services; and institutional development. Our detailed ideas were set out in "Europe—The Future", copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Departmental Achievements

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list his Department's principal achievements since 1979; and if he will list separately the achievements with respect to overseas development.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. and learned Friend to the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) on 18 May 1984. at columns 289-90. Since then the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has continued to make a significant and useful contribution towards the promotion of British and Western interests overseas. There have been several notable achievements during the past 10 months.

In NATO, we continued to work with our transatlantic and European allies to maintain peace and strengthen the Alliance. The Alliance's firmness of purpose in pursuin consistent defence and arms control policies has been instrumental in persuading the Russians to return to the negotiating table. Particular attention has been paid to strengthening the European contribution to NATO, and we have supported the reactivation of the Western European Union and greater European collaboration on arms procurement. We have also played a leading role in efforts to achieve a comprehensive ban on chemical weapons.

Together with our Western allies and partners, we have worked to promote a more constructive relationship between the West and the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. Mr. Gorbachev's visit to the United Kingdom in December, and the discussions which my right hon. and learned Friend had with the Foreign Ministers of the Soviet Union, Hungary, Bulgaria and Romania, have contributed to that process.

We have played a significant role in strengthening the internal and external policies of the European Community. Notable achievements in 1984 were the settlement at Fontainebleau including an abatement in 1984 of £600 million of the United Kingdom contribution to the Community budget and an agreement under which future contributions will be reduced by about half; agreement on the control of Community expenditure, particularly agriculture expenditure; progress in negotiations to enable Spain and Portugal to join the Community on terms acceptable to the United Kingdom; and the priority now being given within the Community to bringing about a full common market in Europe.

Substantial progress has been made on some of the outstanding problems affecting Britain's remaining dependent territories. The successful negotiation with the Chinese Government of an agreement on the future of Hong Kong has provided an excellent framework for the future prosperity and stability of the territory. This has been welcomed by the international community as a major achievement for British diplomacy. Spain has lifted restrictions on Gibraltar in conformity with the Lisbon statement of 1980. In this connection we have made clear our commitment to honour the wishes of the people of Gibraltar. We have continued to honour our responsibilities to the other dependent territories, including in particular to the people of the Falkland Islands.

We have continued to take active steps to promote stability and democratic values in many developing countries including the strengthening of political, economic and cultural links, and the provision of military training assistance. We have worked with like-minded Governments for peaceful solutions in areas of international tension, such as the middle east, Afghanistan, Southern Africa and Central America. We have continued to play a constructive role in the United Nations and to participate in United Nations peacekeeping forces in Cyprus and Sinai. We have participated actively with Commonwealth partners in discussion of the special needs of small states and have maintained contingents in Belize and Brunei. We have also worked closely with our allies on measures to thwart terrorism through effective international co-operation.

At the London economic summit, participants reached a large measure of agreement on basic economic objectives, including a 10-point programme for future action. This recognised the needs of developing countries, provided a framework for action on international indebtedness, and looked forward to further trade liberalisation.

Those achievements have been secured despite a continuing increase in the workload of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and reductions in its manpower of about 10 per cent. over the last five years. This reflects an increasingly efficient and cost-effective performance by the Diplomatic Service.

Overseas Development

In response to the appalling effects of the drought in many sub-Saharan African countries, notably Ethiopia and Sudan, we have played a major role in international relief operations and have provided over £100 million in drought related relief aid in the current financial year.

Successful negotiations between the European Community and 65 African, Caribbean and Pacific countries (35 of them in the Commonwealth) culminated in the signing of the third Lomé convention last December. This provides for a sixth European development fund totalling 7·5 billion ecu, the United Kingdom share of which is some £780 million at current exchange rates.

More generally, we have continued our programme of long-term development assistance mainly to the poorer countries, successfully completing many projects, including the Victoria dam in Sri Lanka to which we contributed £113 million of grant aid.

A significant part of Overseas Development Administration headquarter's operations has been shifted to the west of Scotland in accordance with our dispersal policy. ODA has also put through a major rationalisation of its scientific and special units and has continued to maintain the spread of the United Kingdom's bilateral aid programmes while reducing its overall work force by some 30 per cent.

Bophuthatswana

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received regarding diplomatic recognition of Bophuthatswana by Her Majesty's Government; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: In the past 12 months we have answered two parliamentary questions and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has answered three letters from members of the public. It remains our position that Bophuthatswana does not meet our criteria for recognition as an independent state.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Advanced Supplementary Level Examinations

Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the Government's intentions with regard to advanced supplementary level examinations; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: The White Paper "Better Schools" (Cmnd. 9469), published yesterday, announces the Government's decision that advanced supplementary (AS) level examinations should be introduced on broadly the lines proposed in the consultative paper of May 1984, with adjustments to take account of comments received on those proposals. The first courses will begin in September 1987, and the first examinations will be held in summer 1989.

I am writing to the chairman of the Secondary Examinations Council setting out the background to the Government's decision and giving more details of it; and to the convenor of the GCE boards inviting the boards to prepare syllabuses in consultation with those concerned. Copies of my letters will be placed in the Library.

Rate Support Grant (Education Costs)

Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the cost per pupil for rate support grant purposes in Nottinghamshire for (a) primary, (b) secondary under 16 years and (c) secondary over 16 years, in the current and projected financial years; what are the highest, lowest and average costs in these three categories nationally; and what added percentage should be allowed for building maintenance and central establishment costs, to establish the total cost of education in the maintained sector.

Mr. Dunn: The unit grant-related expenditure associated with pupils in each age group is as follows:

	1984-85	1985-86
	5-10 (Primary)	£ cash
Nottinghamshire	845	943
Highest (Brent)	1,051	1,174
Lowest (Stockport)	804	897
Average	863	963
	11-15
	(Secondary)	£ cash
Nottinghamshire	1,073	1,155
Highest (Brent)	1,344	1,448
Lowest (Stockport)	1,027	1,107
Average	1,094	1178
	16+
	(Secondary)	£ cash
Nottinghamshire	1,778	1,872
Highest (Newham)	1,927	2,052
Lowest (Stockport)	1,732	1,818
Average	1,795	1,888

The grant-related expenditure assessed by the Government includes allowance for the costs of special schools; central administration; school transport; child guidance; pupil support; and for current expenditure on buildings maintenance. It does not include the cost of school meals and milk, or of the revenue consequences of capital expenditure which are dealt with separately in GREs. An addition of some 13 per cent. to the figures above for these two items would give the total cost of education in the maintained sector as assessed by the Government.

Chiropodists

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary for Education and Science if he will give the entry qualifications to start a course as a state registered chiropodist; what is the length of time studied for such a course; if he will place in the Official Report the time given to theoretical and practical studies; and if he will make a statement on the possibility of giving graduate status for such students.

Mr. Brooke: The normal entrance requirements for courses leading to state registration as a chiropodist consist of five GCE passes, including one in English language, and one in a science subject, and of which two should be at advanced level. Courses are of three years duration. An average of about 40 per cent. of course time is devoted to practical clinical work and the remainder to theoretical work. Applications for degree courses within the maintained sector are considered by my right hon. Friend who would, in particular, need to be convinced that a new degree level course was essential to meet the operational needs of the profession.

Schoolchildren (Statistics)

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will state for each local authority in England and Wales the number of pupils under five years of age in infant classes in primary schools in January 1985; and what is this number as a proportion of the population of three and four-year-olds in each relevant local education authority area;

(2) if he will state, for each local authority in England and Wales, the number of full-time and part-time pupils in nursery schools and nursery classes in January 1985; and what is this number as a proportion of the population of three and four-year-olds in each relevant local education authority area.

Sir Keith Joseph: Information for January 1985 is not available. The information requested for nursery and primary schools in England in January 1984 is as follows:

Pupils who were under five years at 31 August 1983 but who became five on or before 31 December 1983 have been excluded from the answer.

Information for Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Youth Service Unit

Mr. Lewis Stevens asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what will be the functions of, and the staffing resources available to, the new youth service unit; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: The unit will be responsible for advising Ministers on youth service policy issues, including the allocation of the grants made direct by the Department in this field. Six and a half members of the Department's staff, in full-time equivalent terms, have direct responsibility for these youth service matters, and these will form the staff of the new unit. In addition, Her Majesty's Inspectorate is involved with youth service matters and other staff within the Department have separate responsibilities directly relevant to the youth service including, for example, arrangements for youth exchanges and vocational education for young people. The new unit will have access to the full range of the Department's supporting services. I believe that it will be helpful to those outside the Department in the youth service field to know that there is a specific unit dealing with their concerns.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Hotels (Classification)

17. Mr. Gale asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the present system of hotel classification; and if there are any plans to change that system.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The English Tourist Board has been asked to examine ways of strengthening its voluntary registration and classification scheme for hotels to make it a more effective weapon against inadequate standards. A new scheme providing for verification of standards and a simplified classification system has been agreed with the other statutory tourist boards and is currently under discussion with trade and consumer interests.

Trade Prospects

20. Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the prospects of trade with the United States of America.

Mr. Channon: There are excellent prospects for a further substantial increase in our exports to the United States in 1985.

"The Sisyphus Syndrome"

21. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has had any consultation on the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development report "The Sisyphus Syndrome"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: No. The report was commissioned by the OECD secretariat to help it to assemble background information for work on trade in high technology and it has not been distributed to OECD member Governments.

Manufacturing Industry

22. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what effects he forecasts for manufacturing industries for 1985-86 arising from the Budget.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Manufacturing industry has been fully participating in the recovery of the economy. I have no doubt that the Budget will benefit manufacturing industry as well as other sectors of business.

38. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the most recent figure for output in manufacturing industry; and how this compares with the figure for the same month five years ago.

Mr. Norman Lamont: For the three months ended January 1985 the index of production for manufacturing industry was 101, based on 1980 equal to 100, 8 per cent. lower than its value in the three months ended January 1980.

Tourist Grants

23. Mr. Dickens asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of grants and loans made through the English Tourist Board are granted to the north of England.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Approximately one third of all offers made by the English Tourist Board in 1984-85 under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969 have been to projects in the north of England. I shall write to my hon. Friend with more details.

Public Purchasing Policy

24. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the effect of public purchasing policy on the efficient operation of market forces.

Mr. Fletcher: The Government's policy is that contracts should be let as the result of competition wherever possible so that the opportunities presented by public sector business are open to a wide range of potential suppliers. The Treasury guidelines encourage an effective dialogue between purchasers and suppliers so that decision-taking on both sides is better informed; and the use of performance specifications rather than detailed designs so that suppliers can offer alternative solutions which take into account the potential for sales in other markets. Steps have been taken to improve small firms' access to Government contracts. In these ways public purchasing policy contributes to the efficient operation of market forces and obtains better value for money. The Cabinet Office (MPO) report on "Government Purchasing", published in December 1984, makes a number of recommendations to strengthen the application of policy in these respects.

Takeovers and Mergers

25. Mr. Nelson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what factors other than the need for competition he takes into account in deciding whether a proposed takeover or merger might act against the public interest or whether to refer any such case to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Fletcher: In making decisions on merger references to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission the Secretary of State takes into account the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading and all relevant information available to him. It is for the commission to determine once a reference has been made, whether a merger might be expected to operate against the public interest.

British National Space Centre

26. Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the staffing, funding and responsibilities of the British National Space Centre.

Mr. Pattie: There is nothing I can add at present to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend on 4 February.

Inward Investment Policy

27. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many representations he has received about the effects of the Government's inward investment policy.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The number of representations received by my Department about the effects of the Government's inward investment policy is not recorded. However, I can assure my hon. Friend that the Government receive widespread support for their policy of encouraging foreign companies to invest in the United Kingdom when their investment would be of net benefit to the United Kingdom economy.

House of Fraser

28. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is yet in a position to announce his decision as to whether he will refer the offer by the Al Fayed family for the House of Fraser to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: My right hon. Friend announced on 14 March 1985 that he had decided, in accordance with the recommendation of the Director General of Fair Trading, not to refer the proposed acquisition of House of Fraser plc by Alfayed Investment Holdings plc to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

British Steel Corporation

29. Sir William van Straubenzee asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to announce a decision arising out of the range of options presented to him by the chairman of the British Steel Corporation and relating to the future conduct of the business.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The opportunity for the corporation to undertake the review of its strategic plan has been delayed until very recently by the uncertainty created by the miners' dispute. It is too early at this stage to say what the outcome of this process will be.

Brother Industries

30. Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the 43·7 per cent. tariff imposed on products from Brother Industries by the European Economic Community (document No. 3643/84 of 20 December 1984).

Mr. Channon: On 20 Decemmber 1984, the Commission announced the imposition of provisional anti-dumping duties against electronic typewriters originating in Japan, falling within sub-heading ex 84.51A of the common customs tariff. The rate of duty varied according to the exporter: in the case of Brother Industries it was 43·7 per cent. This followed an investigation by the Commission under EC regulation 2176/84 which showed that these imports were being dumped and were causing injury on the Community market. The duties will last initially for up to four months. They are likely to be extended for a further two months, after which a decision must be made regarding a definitive remedy.

General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade

31. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with his European Economic Community counterparts on a new general agreement on tariffs and trade round.

Mr. Channon: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary reported to the House on 25 March that the EC Foreign Affairs Council of 17-21 March had considered, inter alia, the Community position on a new GATT round. I attended the discussion of this topic between the Trade Ministers of the Ten. The Community declared its readiness to participate in the launching of a new round, subject to the establishment of an adequate prior international consensus on objectives, participation and timing.

Nationalised Industries

32. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry by how much productivity has increased in each nationalised industry for which he is responsible within the manufacturing sector since the end of 1980.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The industries in question are the British Steel Corporation and British Shipbuilders. In the British Steel Corporation, productivity has improved from 14·5 man-hours per tonne of liquid steel in 1980-81 to the current level of 6·9 man-hours per tonne in the third quarter of 1984. In the case of British Shipbuilders, productivity is difficult to measure, but there are indications that, after a period of low work load and correspondingly low productivity, it is now improving.

Companies (Assistance)

33. Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action his Department is taking to assist with the rehabilitation of companies in financial difficulties.

Mr. Fletcher: Generally, the market is the best judge of prospects for companies in financial difficulties. But I am anxious to see that satisfactory procedures exist to enable the affairs of a company facing a financial crisis to be placed in the hands of an independent expert who will be able to pursue a programme for the rescue or reorganisation of the company's business. This is why the Government have incorporated in the Insolvency Bill the company administration procedure which it was recommended should be established by the review committee on insolvency law and practice.

Design for Design Policy

34. Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received following the publication of his design for design policy document.

Mr. Pattie: The publication of the policy document, "Design for Design: a Framework for Action", has attracted comments from representative bodies and individuals which my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary will take fully into account in his deliberations about future priorities and initiatives. The vast majority welcomed this policy statement, and requests for the document have been received from many parts of the world.

A design strategy group was established to consider the most effective ways of meeting the objectives described in the document. The group has produced a constructive report, which we have welcomed, and my hon. Friend is now considering its recommendations.

Eastern Europe (Balance of Trade)

35. Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the balance of trade with eastern Europe.

Mr. Channon: Provisional statistics for 1984 show that the United Kingdom had a deficit of £333 million in its trade with eastern Europe, excluding the Soviet Union. The deficit in 1983 was £70 million. Exports increased from £501 million to £568 million while imports rose from £571 million to £902 million. Just over three quarters of the deficit was incurred on fuels, mainly petroleum and petroleum products.

Regional Assistance

36. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that the criteria for regional assistance take sufficient account of unemployment black spots.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The current assisted areas map, like its predecessor, is based on travel-to-work areas. As the closest available approximations to self-contained labour markets covering the whole country, these are both the most sensible basis for a policy aimed at encouraging additional employment opportunities in areas where they are most needed and the fairest way of making nationwide comparisons of areas' relative needs for such additional jobs.

Brazil

37. Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he expects to see an increase in trade with Brazil in the next financial year.

Mr. Channon: There is considerable scope for improvement in our bilateral trade with Brazil.

Tourism

39 Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment has been made as to the extent to which the arts and heritage act as a draw for tourism into the United Kingdom.

Mr. Norman Lamont: There is no doubt that Britain's arts and heritage are a major attraction for overseas visitors. While it is difficult to provide a definitive assessment, the British Tourist Authority's 1984 overseas visitors survey reveals, for example, that around two thirds of our overseas visitors had visited historic towns and churches during their stay and around one third had visited art galleries.

Last year the British Tourist Authority adopted Britain's heritage as its central theme for promoting tourism to Britain under the banner "Heritage 84." A record number of overseas visitors came to Britain last year—11 per cent more than the previous record in 1983. This successful theme is being continued during 1985 with special reference to the 500th anniversary of the Tudor dynasty. The BTA will be drawing attention to a wide variety of arts and heritge attractions throughout the country in its promotional campaigns overseas.

41 Mr. Bevan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what studies have been undertaken by his Department on the effects of the tourist industry on employment.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Economists in my Department have carried out a detailed study to produce estimates of total employment supported directly and indirectly by tourism spending. Provisional results from the study show that around 1 million jobs were supported by tourism spending in 1983. The final results of the study are expected to be available shortly.

45 Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the arrangements for the signposting of tourist destinations.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My Department is in regular contact with the Department of Transport; which has responsibility for signposting matters, about ways in which the signposting of tourist attractions and facilities might be improved. I particularly welcome the tourism signposting experiments which are taking place in Kent and Nottinghamshire with the co-operation of the Secretary of state for Transport, and I very much hope that these will in due course lead to the introduction of more effective tourism signposting arrangements at national level.

46 Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what initiatives have been taken by his Department to improve the marketing abroad of areas of the United Kingdom outside London.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My Department encourages tourism to Britain through the work of the British Tourist Authority. One of the BTA's objectives is to give emphasis to Scotland, Wales and the regions of England in order to increase the extent of travel by overseas tourists throughout Britain. In its overseas promotional campaigns the BTA features a wide variety of tourist attractions throughout the country. It produces material covering particular regions in association with the English regional tourist boards and the national boards for Scotland and Wales. It co-operates with commercial interests in the regions through joint marketing schemes and representation at exhibitions and trade fairs abroad, and it is active in promoting conference centres in overseas markets around Britain, including Bournemouth.

Publishing Industry

40. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he has for the promotion of the publishing industry.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I have no specific plans for promoting the publishing industry.

EC (Harmonisation of Standards)

42. Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with progress within the European Economic Community on the harmonisation of standards in goods.

Mr. Channon: Techinical harmonisation within the Community has proved disappointingly slow. The Government therefore support fully current initiatives under which members states would

- co-operate under directive 189/83/EEC to avoid the introduction of national requirements likely to impair operation of the internal market;
- adopt a new approach to technical harmonisation and standardisation along the lines proposed in the Commission's communication of 31 January 1985 to the European Parliament and the Council (COM(85)19 final);
- seek to strengthen the capacity to standardise at European level.

The Government hope that together these initiatives will speed up technical harmonisation and make a major contribution to completion of the internal market.

Post Office (Closures)

43. Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will introduce legislation to require the Post Office to take account of social factors in relation to closure decisions involving sub-post offices.

Mr. Pattie: Such a requirement already exists by virtue of section 59(2) of the British Telecommunications Act 1981.

Securities Investments Board

44. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the progress made in establishing the Securities Investments Board and the related investor protection measures.

Mr. Fletcher: Sir Kenneth Berrill has agreed to undertake the task of establishing the Securities and Investments Board. The Government hope to announce appointments to the marketing of investments board organising committee very shortly. The Department is considering comments on the financial services White Paper and preparing legislation.

Insurance Corporation of Ireland

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action he has taken to monitor the affairs of the Insurance Corporation of Ireland in the United Kingdom; if the investments by United Kingdom clients are still secure; and if he will make a statement on recent developments within that company.

Mr. Fletcher: The Insurance Corporation of Ireland Limited has its head office in the Republic of Ireland and carries on insurance business in the United Kingdom through a branch. Under the terms of an EEC directive, the Government of the Republic of Ireland must verify the state of solvency of the company with respect to its entire business, and the United Kingdom Government have to be satisfied that the United Kingdom branch has assets at least sufficient to meet the liabilities of the branch.

The Department of Trade and Industry receives, in the form and on the basis required by United Kingdom legislation, an annual return of the business of the company carried on in the United Kingdom. The branch's return for the year ended 31 December 1983 showed its assets to be substantially in excess of its liabilities. The return for 1984 is not yet due.

According to recent statements by the company and the Irish Government, there are now substantial losses expected on the United Kingdom business. The company has been acquired by a company controlled by the Irish Government and an administrator has been appointed by the Irish court to carry on the business of the company. The Irish Government have stated that any financial assistance required to enable the company to meet its liabilities will be provided by means of the insurance compensation fund. My Department is in contact with the Irish authorities and the administrator.

Motor Cars

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year since 1955 United Kingdom production, imports and exports of motor cars by volume.

Mr. Channon: The following is the information.

Annual totals in thousands of units

Weighing Machines

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to the reply of 5 March to the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds Official Report, column 447, by how much he expects the accommodation costs that are charged for type approval of weighing machines to be reduced by the transfer he has announced of the National Weights and Measures Laboratory from central London to Teddington.

Mr. Fletcher: On present assumptions, I would expect a substantial saving on accommodation costs to be achieved when the national weights and measures laboratory moves to Teddington. However, it is too early to provide specific cost data at this stage.

Liverpool

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his recent visit to Liverpool.

Mr. Tebbit: I have not visited Liverpool recently.

British Overseas Trade Board

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is satisfied that the re-allocation of the British Overseas Trade Board resources since 1979, reducing support for overseas trade fairs and increasing support for the overseas project fund and the market entry guarantee scheme, has led to an increase in United Kingdom manufactured exports as a proportion of total United Kingdom exports.

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied that the interests of small companies are adequately represented on the British Overseas Trade Board.

Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is satisfied that the re-allocation of British Overseas Trade Board resources since 1979, reducing support for overseas trade fairs and increasing support for the overseas projects fund and the market entry guarantee scheme, has assisted small United Kingdom manufacturing companies to increase their exports.

Mr. Channon: I shall reply to my hon. Friends as soon as possible.

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what effect the rise in the value of the United States dollar against the pound sterling will have on the number of overseas trade fairs supported by the British Overseas Trade Board where the cost of stand space and cost of stand construction is quoted in United States dollars.

Mr. Channon: The rise in the value of the US dollar over the past year increases the sterling cost of running BOTB groups at overseas trade fairs in those areas where exhibition space and stand construction are paid for in dollars. With a cash limited sterling budget, if other factors remain constant this reduces proportionately the number of British groups that can be supported by the BOTB at overseas fairs in those areas.

Small Businesses

Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the help now available for small businesses.

Mr. Fletcher: My right hon. Friend has announced the relaunching of the support for innovation programme, with special provisions to help small firms, and the repackaging of our schemes to make them more easily understood. The Budget speech contained a number of measures for small firms, and a report proposing reductions in administrative and legislative burdens is about to be published.

Warren Spring Laboratory

Mr. Wood asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has reached a decision about the future of Warren Spring laboratory.

Mr. Pattie: After careful consideration of the options, it has been decided to retain Warren Spring laboratory in the public sector. Privatisation could not be achieved on terms which would have been financially advantageous to the Government. It is nevertheless the intention to require Warren Spring laboratory to adopt a more commercial approach to its activities and to obtain a greater industrial return on its programmes.

EMPLOYMENT

Quarries (Blasting)

Mr. Harvey asked the Secretary of State for Employment what regulations govern blasting in quarries; and if he will amend them to seek to prevent a reoccurrence of the type of incident in which a school in Clwyd was recently showered with rocks.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 and the Mines and Quarries Act 1954 apply to operations at quarries and the use of explosives is specifically regulated by the Quarries (Explosives) Regulations 1959. The provisions of the regulations, which are currently under review, are directed not only to the protection of quarry workers but also those members of the public who may be threatened by quarry activities.

Wages and Employment (Relationship)

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what evidence he has as to a relationship between employment and (a) wages and (b) wages councils' awards.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A recent publication by the Treasury "The relationship between employment and wages" surveys the available evidence on the general link between pay and jobs. A copy is available in the Library. I would also refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Newham, North East (Mr. Leighton) on 22 October 1984, at column 481.

The effect of wages councils on employment, including the effect of their awards, is considered in amongst others:

(i) "Pay and Employment in Four Retail Trades" by C. Craig and F. Wilkinson, DE Research paper (forthcoming).
(ii) "Low Pay or No Pay" Institute of Economic Affairs Hobart Paper No. 101.
(iii) "From the Dole Queue to the Sweatshop" by H. Neuburger. Low Pay unit Pamphlet No. 30.
(iv) "Wages Councils Part 2: Views on Reform": Industrial Relations Review and Report; Report No. 290.

Factory Inspectors

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many factories in the west midlands were visited by factory inspectors for each of the last five years for which records are available; what percentage this figure represents of the total number of factories in the area; and whether he is satisfied with the present number of factory inspectors in post in the west midlands.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is not possible, without disproportionate time and cost, to separate the number of factories from the total number of premises visited by factory inspectors in the last five years.

The number of premises visited by factory inspectors in the west midlands during each of the last five years and the percentage of total premises this figure represents are as follows:

	Number of visits	Percentage of visits in relation to total number of premises in the area Per cent.
1980	15,013	Figures not obtainable
1981	9,050	18
1982	12,958	31
1983	15,232	24
1984	14,030	17
1985*	2,392	6

* To date.

I am satisfied with the number of factory inspectors in post in the west midlands.

Noise Pollution

Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many prohibitions, improvement notices and prosecutions on noise problems have been taken since the start of the recent campaign.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The relevant figures sought in each case, from the start of the campaign on 1 October 1983 to the latest date readily available, are:

Two prohibition notices (up to 30.4.1984)
Sixty two improvement notices (up to 30.4.1984) and one prosecution (up to 31.12.1984).

The answer covers the activities of Her Majesty's Factory Inspectorate, Her Majesty's Agricultural Inspectorate and Her Majesty's Mines and Quarries Inspectorate, although the notices concerned were in each case issued by Her Majesty's Factory Inspectorate.

Departmental Staff

Mr MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people were employed in his Department's offices in Scotland in 1979; and what is the latest available figure.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: 5,084 staff were employed in the Department's offices in Scotland at the end of February 1979, compared with 6,050 at the end of February 1985.

Apprenticeships

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people were undertaking craft apprenticeships in the engineering industry on (a) 31 December 1979 and (b) 31 December 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 5 March 1984, c. 473]: The information is not available in the precise form requested. However, the engineering industry training board estimates that the number of young people undertaking engineering craft apprenticeships was 61,000 for the training year from September 1979 to August 1980, and 37,500 for the last complete training year, to August 1984.

The numbers entering traditional apprenticeships will become increasingly irrelevant as a measure of the real level of skills training being undertaken by industry because of both the reform of existing arrangements and the substantial provision of initial skills training now taking place under the youth training scheme.

Youth Training

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment how he calculates his figure of £146 million to be incurred by the Department of Employment as a result of changes announced in the Budget; and if he will list the specific programmes which are to benefit.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 26 March 1985]: No figure of £146 million has been quoted in connection with these changes.

However, £140 million is being provided based on the estimated cost in 1985-86 of the expansion by 100,000 places of the community programme.

ENERGY

Tidal Energy Projects

Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the prospects for tidal energy projects.

Mr. David Hunt: The current study of a Severn barrage, jointly funded by Government and the Severn Tidal Power Group, is to establish the technical and financial viability of a private sector barrage from Brean Down to Lavernock Point.

I have recently received a proposal from the Severn Tidal Power Group, jointly with Wimpey Major Projects, to extend the group's current study to include a barrage at the English-Stones line which is just downstream of the existing Severn bridge.

The proposed extension to the study will cost an additional £220,000 and the expanded group have asked for a 50 per cent. contribution from the Government. I have decided that it would be worth while to carry out the proposed study, and subject to agreement on the terms and conditions of contract, matching funds will be provided from my Department's non-nuclear R and D budget, up to a total of £110,000.

Although the STPG has completed most of its work on the Brean Down to Lavernock Point barrage, the report will now include an examination of the technical and financial viability of a private sector barrage on the English-Stones line and a comparative analysis of both barrages. The final report should be available by the end of the year.

Financial support for this extended study will be given on the understanding that there is no Government commitment beyond the study.

The Severn Tidal Power Group, comprising Sir Robert McAlpine and Sons, GEC Power Engineering, Taylor Woodrow Construction, Northern Engineering, and Balfour Beatty will now include Wimpey Major Projects Ltd., representing Wimpey/Atkins, and W. S. Atkins will carry out part of the study on the English-Stones line. I am pleased that this development has made this latest initiative on the Severn barrage possible.

In addition to the extension to the Severn study, I announced to Parliament on 11 March that I had agreed in principle to make a contribution towards funding a £40,000 study of a Mersey barrage to refine cost and engineering estimates. I have decided that my Department will provide up to about 20 per cent. of the cost of the study.

In January 1984, Binnie and Partners were asked by my Department to undertake a preliminary study of small-scale tidal energy. Specific sites were examined as a means of reaching a view of the potential of this resource and to identify factors affecting the energy output and cost of energy from small tidal sites. Copies of the Binnie reports are being placed in the Libraries of the Houses of Parliament.

North Sea Gas

Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Energy what estimate he has made of the number of jobs created by the development of the 45 gas fields which the British Gas Corporation assessed would be needed to exploit United Kingdom North sea reserves; and how many additional jobs there will be as a result of his decision to cancel the Sleipner contract.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Many thousands of new jobs will flow from new projects at both the construction and servicing stages. I am confident that British industry is sufficiently competitive to attract a high proportion of the available orders. The Sleipner decision will accelerate the development of United Kingdom gasfields and associated job creation.

Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Energy what new pipeline systems will be required to develop United Kingdom gas reserves, in the light of his decision to cancel the Sleipner contract.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The development of UKCS gasfields following the Sleipner decision is expected to result in the need for new pipelines. Some new projects will rely on spare capacity as it develops in existing pipelines. The precise pattern of new pipeline systems will emerge as new gasfield developments come forward.

NATIONAL FINANCE

EC (Spain and Portugal)

Mr. Forth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the effect upon the costs of all institutions of the European Economic Community of the possible entry of Spain and Portugal to the Community.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Commission has estimated that the total net cost of enlargement might eventually amount to some 0·1 to 0·2 percentage points of the VAT own resources base. Her Majesty's Government see no reason to dissent from this.

European Capital Market

Mr. Skeet asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what extent it is Her Majesty's Government's policy to establish a European capital market; and what has been the response of France, Italy and the Federal Republic of Germany.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The United Kingdom is in favour of the free movement of capital throughout Europe. Since the abolition of exchange controls in 1979, capital flows both into and out of the United Kingdom have been unrestricted. Overseas companies are thus free to raise capital in the United Kingdom capital market on the same basis as British companies. By contrast both France and Italy retain substantial exchange controls. The Federal Republic of Germany does not maintain exchange controls and is a supporter of the free movement of capital.

Self-employed Persons (Pensions)

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take steps to permit the self-employed to make provision for pension arrangements within the capital account of their business.

Mr. Moore: No.

EC (Economic Co-operation)

Mr. Alton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action his Department has taken or plans to take to increase economic co-operation between the United Kingdom and other European Community member states.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Although the right of initiative strictly rests with the Commission, European Community member states are always exploring ways to improve economic co-operation, and Her Majesty's Government as a whole take a leading part in this. The United Kingdom is particularly anxious to see the development of a genuine internal market covering services as well as goods, and is supporting Commission proposals to bring this about. The Prime Minister at Dublin welcomed the Commission's annual economic report, which calls for member states to act together to increase growth and reduce unemployment. This question will be discussed at the European Council this week.

Manufactures

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for the United Kingdom and the principal industrial countries the increase between 1955 and 1983 in consumer prices and export prices for manufactures as a percentage of the increase in producer/wholesale prices together with the corresponding figures for the period 1978 to 1983.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Data for consumer prices, export prices for manufactures, and producer prices covering the period requested can be found in the IMF's "International Financial Statistics, 1984 Yearbook".

Income Tax

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer at what annual level of income a single person begins to pay less income tax than in 1979 following the Budget changes.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Double Glazing Companies

Mr. Adley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the level of total tax receipts from double glazing companies for the 12 months prior to implementation of value added tax on double glazing, and for the 12 months thereafter.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that the information is not available, since figures of taxes paid by sectors of industry are not compiled at this level of detail.

Civil Servants (Pay)

Mr. Robert C. Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average salary for civil servants in the executive officer grade for each year since 1973 in current prices and constant 1983-84 prices.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 25 March 1985, c. 100]: Average salaries for civil servants are not readily available over this period. The following table gives the maximum and minimum of the executive officer pay scale as at 1 July for each year since 1973 both in cash and in real terms. The figures take no account of changes in tax and employees' National Insurance contributions which, of course, affect take-home pay.

Year	Salary on 1st July		Salary in 1984 prices*
	Minimum†	Maximum	Minimum†	Maximum
1973	951	2,288	3,575	8,601
1974	1,387	2,782	4,495	9,016
1975	1,885	3,670	4,918	9,575
1976	2,198	3,983	4,922	8,920
1977	2,329	4,182	4,501	8,082
1978	2,549	4,579	4,549	8,171
1979	2,831	5,043	4,455	7,936
1980	3,775	6,745	5,035	8,997
1981	4,069	7,247	4,850	8,637
1982	4,262	7,700	4,677	8,452
1983	4,546	8,078	4,771	8,478
1984	4,728	8,492	4,728	8,492

* In 1984 prices.
† Minimum of entry scale for period 1973-79 inclusive; minimum of main scale thereafter.

PRIME MINISTER

Public Expenditure

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Prime Minister (1) if she will cause to be published in the Official Report a table showing for the last year for which figures are available the sums of money spent on (a) roads and road improvement, (b) sewerage, (c) new housing, housing repairs and house modernisation, (d) hospital and health service building works, (e) education building, (f) new works on airstrips, (g) harbours and repairs and (h) modernisation of such facilities;

(2) if she will cause to be published in the Official Report a table showing for the last year for which figures are available the sums spent on (a) roads and road improvement, (b) sewerage, (c) new houses, housing repairs and house modernisation, (d) hospital and health service building work, (e) education building, (f) new work on airstrips, (g) harbours and repairs and (h) modernisation of such facilities in Scotland.

The Prime Minister: I shall reply to the right hon. Member shortly.

Falkland Islands

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Prime Minister if she will cause to be published in the Official Report a table showing for the last year for which figures are available the sums spent on (a) roads and road improvement, (b) sewerage, (c) new houses, housing repairs and house modernisation, (d) hospital and health service building work, (e) education building, (f) new work on airstrips, (g) harbours and repairs and (h) modernisation of such facilities in the Falkland Islands.

The Prime Minister: Relevant expenditure against the commitments of £15 million for rehabilitation and £31 million for development announced in 1982 was as follows in 1983-84, the last year for which firm figures are available:

	£1 million
Roads and road improvements	1·1
New houses, housing repairs and modernisation	1·9
Education building (school hostel)	0·2

Expenditure on harbour improvements in 1983-84 was confined to the first stage of a consultancy, at a cost of £14,299.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Church Commissioners (Questions)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will take steps to restore oral questions to the Member answering for the Church Commissioners to a three-weekly rota rather than a six-weekly rota; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: No. With the appointment of the Paymaster General on 10 September 1984 it was necessary to provide time on the question roster for questions addressed to the Paymaster General. Following discussions through the usual channels it was decided that this could best be achieved by varying the times for questions to the Member answering on behalf of the Church Commissioners.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Housing (Modernisation)

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many housing estates or groups of houses have been modernised in the constituency of Newry and Armagh since 1976; and if he will list them.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the chairman of the Housing Executive, who has advised me that records are not available in the form requested for the period prior to the regionalisation of the Housing Executive's operations in 1980. Since then general modernisation schemes have been carried out to 323 dwellings as follows:

Location	Number of dwellings
Rural cottages in County Armagh	65
Mournview Park, Tandragee	19
Camlough Park, Bessbrook	34
St. Brigids Park, Newry	14
Navan Terrace/Crescent, Armagh	51
Montague Villas, Tandragee	4
Doctors Hill Millvale, Bessbrook	12
Camlough/Meigh/Forkhill	28
Callanbridge, Armagh	13
Crannard Gardens, Newry	12
Lisanally/Lonsdale, Armagh	71

In addition, individual elements of modernisation such as rewiring, insulation, re-roofing or heating improvement have been carried out to a further 4,707 dwellings in the area.

Hypothermia

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many elderly people died as a result of hypothermia in Northern Ireland in the last three years for which figures are available; and how many of these deaths occurred during the six months winter period in each of these years;

(2) what percentage of those elderly people who have died as a result of hypothermia in each of the last three years for which figures are available were over the age of 65 years.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is as follows:

	1981	1982	1983
Number of deaths (all over 65 years of age)	18	9	10
Number of deaths which occurred in the period January to March or October to December	14	9	9

Note:
Figures for 1983 are provisional.

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many deaths of elderly people in the last three years for which figures are available were indirectly attributable to hypothermia or involved elderly patients dying soon after recovery from hypothermia.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is not available in the form requested.

Housing Executive

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total cost of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive's activities in the current and the last financial year; and what figures in respect of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive are available to indicate (a) the dwelling stock, (b) the collectable rent which should have been received from tenants, (c) expenditure on repairs and maintenance of stock, (d) expenditure on new buildings, (e) expenditure on rehabilitation of stock, (g) expenditure on salaries and administration, (h) expenditure on grants to the private sector, (i) expenditure incurred on interest charges and (j) grant received from the Department of the Environment.

Mr. Chris Patten: The available information is as follows:

Total cost of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive's activities 1983/84 £446·6M, 1984/85 £522·3M (estimated).

	£ million (estimated)
(a) Effective dwelling stock	175014 (at December 1984)
(b) Gross collectable rent (dwellings and garages)	131·3
(c) Expenditure on housing and grounds maintenance	49·1
(d) Expenditure on new housebuilding	89·7
(e) Expenditure on improvement of the existing stock	67·8
(f) Expenditure on supervision and management	33·4
(g) Expenditure on House Renovation Grants	58·5
(h) Expenditure on Loan Charges	157·2
(i) Grant from the Department of the Environment	169·2

Remanded Persons

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the average period of remand without bail in each of the following cases involving accomplice witness's evidence: (a) persons convicted, (b) persons acquitted and (c) persons who were released as a result of such evidence being retracted; and how these figures compare with those for persons charged with terrorist-type offences on the basis of evidence other than accomplice evidence.

Mr. Scott: Information is not available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Alachlor

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his Department has studied recent cancer investigations made by the Environmental Protection Agency in the United States of America, relating to the herbicide alachlor; if this pesticide is in use in the United Kingdom; and what plans he has to issue a warning to users.

Mrs. Fenner [pursuant to her reply, 22 February 1985, c. 638]: The advisory committee on pesticides has now recommended a review of the data supporting the use of Alachlor. The recommendation was made in the light of a request to the manufacturer by the United States authorities for new studies, made on the grounds that the original data submitted in the 1960s had become out-of-date. The case is therefore separate from the issue of fraudulent data originating at IBT, which has also caused concern. The replacement data package has been received in the United Kingdom and is under study.

TRANSPORT

Sealink

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether the sale of Sealink was covered by the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 (SI 1794).

Mr. Ridley: BR sold Sealink UK Ltd. by selling the entire share capital of the company. I am advised that the regulations would not apply in those circumstances, since the change in ownership of the company did not disturb existing terms of employment with Sealink UK Ltd.

Road Transport (Deregulation)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from the Manchester Council for Voluntary Services about his proposals for deregulating current road transport systems; what reply he is sending; if there is any action he will be taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I have received a letter from the Manchester Council for Voluntary Services expressing concern at the Government's proposals for the bus industry. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State has replied explaining the benefits of our proposals.

I shall send the right hon. Gentleman a copy of the reply which says that our proposals will mean a new lease of life for the bus industry. We are going to give operators a chance to show what they can do in a free market. But responsible public controls and financial assistance will continue. There is to be no end to subsidy, no end to concessionary fares, no end to safety controls. There will be a system of registration to ensure reliable services. Above all, there will be better services for the passenger and better value for the tax and ratepayer.

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he will announce detailed proposals for the allocation and adminstration of the transitional bus grant which was announced in the White Paper, "Buses", Cmnd. 9300.

Mr. David Mitchell: My Department has today written to various representative organisations explaining in detail our proposals for paying this grant. Following the answer given to my hon. Friend, the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) on 14 January, at column 5, we have considered further how to define rural areas for this purpose. Our letter proposes that grant should be payable from 1 April 1986 on all mileage run outside larger urban areas as measured by data provided by the Office of Population, Censuses and Surveys and the Registrar General, Scotland. In the light of work by the Transport and Road Research Laboratory, and representations by hon. Members, we have concluded that such mileage within metropolitan countries should be eligible for grant.

Grant will not be payable in any rural areas within London, because the Transport Bill's proposals for deregulation do not apply to London. We are inviting views on whether our proposed definition of larger urban areas as those with populations of 25,000 or more is the most appropriate.

Train Services (Timekeeping)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 21 March, what information he has as to the breakdown (a) by regions and (b) by diesel or electric locomotives of the percentage of trains which ran late in 1984.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand from British Railway's that the information is as follows:

	On time Per cent.	On time or less than 5 minutes late Per cent.	*Over 30 minutes late Per cent.
Eastern Region	73·8	89·2	3·6
London Midland Region	79·9	90·4	3·4
Western Region	64·3	82·1	3·0
Southern Region	76·1	92·0	1·1
Scottish Region	84·7	91·2	4·5
WEIGHTED TOTAL	77·0	90·5	2·8

* Class 1 trains only (that is, all inter-city services, Scottish express services and some long distance provincial services).

Statistics on punctuality standards by traction types are not readily available.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 21 March, what information he has as to the basis upon which British Rail calculates the figures relating to the punctuality of trains; an if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand that British Rail compiles its punctuality statistics by analysing data on all passenger train arrivals at terminating stations. There are records for each terminating station held by the station supervisors. Statistics are then collated at area, regional and then headquarters level.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 21 March, what information he has as to the principal causes of the late running of trains in 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I shall write to my hon. Friend shortly.

BR (Snow Hill Tunnel)

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from British Rail on the re-opening of the Snow Hill tunnel to link Blackfriars and Farringdon stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: British Rail submitted its proposal for reopening the Snow Hill tunnel to my right hon. Friend on 8 January. Some aspects of the scheme are still being discussed with BR, but we hope to be able to reach a decision shortly.

WALES

Cancer and Leukaemia

Mr. Harvey asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether levels for cancer and leukaemia along the coast of north Wales are higher than elsewhere in the Principality.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: In the 1974-78 quinquennial report of the Wales cancer registry it was noted that both Clwyd and Gwynedd had elevated rates of registrations for all cancers combined when compared with other areas in Wales. This result remained when allowance was made for the differing age and sex structures of the areas concerned. Initial work on the quinquennial report covering the years 1979-1983 indicated that this differential persisted. However, in view of the registry's concern about the validity of the cancer registrations of residents of both Clwyd and Gwnedd a validation exercise has been initiated in recent months. This work requires the comparison of computer-listed entries against individual case notes, which necessitates the prior consent of the consultant involved in each case. Completion of this detailed analysis will take several more months. I shall write to my hon. Friend when the results are available.

Geriatric and Long-stay Trauma Beds

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what changes there have been over the past (a) 12 months and (b) 24 months in the availability of (i) geriatric beds and (ii) long-stay trauma beds in each of the health authorities in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information is given in the following table:

Average daily available beds at 30 September

Health Authority	Geriatrics			Traumatic and orthopaedic surgery*
	1984	1983	1982	1984	1983	1982
Clwyd	564	567	563	161	173	162
East Dyfed	389	394	402	97	106	106
Gwent	648	638	611	171	167	186
Gwynedd	401	400	401	66	68	63
Mid Glamorgan	844	834	807	298	287	296
Powys	248	248	239	—	—	—
South Glamorgan	470	464	445	274	303	304
West Glamorgan	460	463	466	211	214	215
Pembrokeshire	135	140	140	40	37	40

* Figures are not separately available for long-stay trauma beds.

ENVIRONMENT

Pocock v. Steele (Appeal Decision)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to complete his consideration of the implications of the Court of Appeal decision in the case of Pocock v. Steele; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend hopes to reach conclusions soon about what action might be taken in response to the Court of Appeal's decision in this case.

Falklands Airport

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment to what strength standard the runway at the new Falklands airport at Mount Pleasant is being constructed.

Sir George Young: The runway is designed to meet the international load classification group 3 standard which is capable of taking wide-bodied jets such as Tristar and Boeing 747.

Rates Rebates (Disabled Persons)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will exerise his powers under section 1(5) of the Rating (Disabled Persons) Act 1978 to increase rebates available under section 1 of the Act in the way it has been exercised in Scotland.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has exercised his powers to maintain the level of relief available to disabled people in Scotland following the recent revaluation there. But there is no need for such an adjustment in England and Wales where the rateable values on which relief for disabled people is calculated remain valid for the life of the current valuation list.

Green Belt Land (Hillingdon)

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the approximate area of green belt land in the London borough of Hillingdon; and how much such land has been lost to development in the most recent five-year period for which figures are available.

Mr. Macfarlane: In its written evidence to the House of Commons Environment Committee in the spring of 1984, the London borough of Hillingdon indicated that the borough contained 4,872·5 hectares of the metropolitan green belt. Between 1965 and 1982, 127·5 hectares had been released for development, including areas for sand and gravel working which will eventually be restored to form green belt land again.

Housing (Management)

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has ever refused a local authority permission to transfer the management of part of its housing stock to tenant co-operatives.

Mr. Gow: No.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will bring forward legislative proposals to give local authority tenants the right to manage all or part of their estates by tenant managment co-operatives.

Mr. Gow: Workable agreements between local authorities and tenant management co-operatives require goodwill on all sides. A statutory right would be counter-productive; but I hope that all local authorities will consider most sympathetically suggestions made by tenants to secure better and more responsive management through co-operatives.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has to which local authorities have transferred part of the management of their housing stock to tenant co-operatives in the past 10 years.

Mr. Gow: According to my information, Birmingham city council, Rochdale borough council, the Greater London council, and the London boroughs of Haringey, Islington, Kensington and Chelsea, Lambeth, Lewisham, Southwark and Wandsworth have transferred housing management functions for part of their stock to tenant co-operatives in the past 10 years.

Waste Disposal

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will initiate discussions with the manufacturers and distributors of beverages sold in metal cans and with the tobacco companies whose products are sold in packets about measures to seek to encourage the public to dispose of the empty containers properly through refuse collection facilities.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer this question shortly.

Crown Suppliers

Mr Thornton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has for the future of the Crown Suppliers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: A review will start shortly with the following terms of reference:

"To consider the future of The Crown Suppliers and in particular whether it would be in the public interest to transfer to the private sector the activities, or part thereof, at present undertaken by that organisation; if so, how this might be achieved during the life of the present Parliament; if not, to recommend whether any change of status within the public sector would assist The Crown Suppliers in meeting their objectives."

The review team will be led by an official from the Cabinet Office with representatives from the Treasury and The Crown Suppliers. Advice from a merchant bank will be sought as and when necessary.

The decision about the future of the organisation will take account of the views of the staff and their union representatives who will be fully consulted during the course of the review.

Water Research Centre

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list the studies commissioned from the Water Research Centre by his Department in: (a) 1979, (b) 1980, (c) 1981, (d) 1982 and (e) 1983, respectively; and if he will place copies of these reports in the Library;

(2) if he will list the titles of the projects commissioned by his Department from the Water Research Centre which are in the process of completion; and if he will undertake to place copies of the reports of these projects in the Library within a month of their completion.

Mr. Macfarlane [pursuant to the reply, 16 February 1984, 279-281]: I have today placed copies of the final contract research report on the infectivity of taenia eggs after sludge treatment, as at E2 on the reference list, in the Library.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Repatriation of Prisoners Act

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will be laying the order bringing into operation the Repatriation of Prisoners Act.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend made an order on 25 March appointing 15 April 1985 as the day on which the Act will come into force. We plan to ratify the Council of Europe convention on the transfer of sentenced persons before the end of April.

Citizenship

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he takes to satisfy himself that the administrative arrangements in respect of those cases where a man's right to remain in the United Kingdom is dependent upon a successful application for citizenship by his wife do not result in delays in processing the woman's application, where both parties have the same reference number and file, which may be in use or required by different divisions of his Department simultaneously.

Mr. Waddington: I am satisfied that the arrangements for directing applicants' files to the point at which they are most urgently needed avoid unnecessary delay to those concerned.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will review the administration procedures for processing citizenship applications.

Mr. Waddington: Improvements in the last year have already reduced delays. Average waiting times for all naturalisation cases fell from 21 months, in March 1984, to 12 months by the end of December. Over the same period average waiting times for entitlement registrations fell from 14 months to 10 months. We are satisfied that procedures are kept under continuing review and modified as necessary.

Departmental Achievements

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list his Department's principal achievements since 1979.

Mr. Brittan: We have introduced and pursued a coherent and balanced strategy covering all the main areas of the Department's work.

We have implemented a series of legislative and administrative measures in pursuit of our framework of policies for dealing with the problem of crime, enhancing the effectiveness of the criminal justice system and strengthening public confidence in it.

We have greatly strengthened the police service. On 31 December 1984, there were 120,573 police officers and 38,898 civilian staff, so that the total manpower available to the police service had increased by 10,400 since December 1979. The Metropolitan police had 26,766 police officers and 13,645 civilian staff on 31 December 1984, an increase of 5,000 in the same period. The recruitment of civilians for administrative work has released more police officers for operational duties.

In November 1983 I invited chief officers of police and police authorities to review their objectives and priorities and to ensure that resources are allocated, and police and civilian manpower are deployed, in ways which will most effectively and efficiently secure those objectives and priorities. I have asked Her Majesty's Inspectors of Constabulary to monitor how the guidance in the circular is being implemented, and also to ensure that examples of good practice are widely disseminated. Substantial improvements in efficiency have been made in forces, including the redeployment of several hundred police officers to operational duties, the revision of shift systems to ensure maximum cover when it is most needed, greater involvement of uniformed officers in the investigation of crime, and more imaginative use of special constables, especially for crime prevention duties.

Public support for the police is essential. Section 106 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 came into effect on 1 January 1985; it requires arrangements to be made in each police area for obtaining the views of the public on policing and their co-operation in preventing crime. This reinforces the guidance issued by my predecessor in 1982 to improve consultation between the community and police, designed to encourage full discussion of issues of local concern and to strengthen community action in support of the police, especially in tackling crime.

We have strengthened preventive action against crime in a number of ways. In 1982 the Department convened an interdepartmental group to consider the reduction of crime. Subsequently provision was made within the urban programme for funding preventive initiatives; a major seminar was held to encourage local preventive action and, in January 1984, a joint departmental circular issued with police and local authority support. We have established a standing conference on crime prevention. A crime prevention unit was set up in 1983 and we are reviewing training for crime prevention. The first national conference of crime prevention panel representatives for 12 years was held in Cardiff last October.

In the light of the report by Sir Lawrence Byford, Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary, into the Yorkshire Ripper case, my Department has assisted the police in developing new procedures and improved training for the investigation of a series of major crimes. We have developed for the police service a specification for a computerised major inquiry system (HOLMES) which will be used by all forces in the handling of major investigations.

We have continued to assist the police service in tackling serious disorder and in avoiding injuries to police officers by making available new protective equipment and supporting a thorough re-examination of training and tactics; and by the implementation of a comprehensive public order training programme. This programme of work proved its value in the 1984-85 miners' dispute, when the police service faced the most serious, sustained an widespread campaign of violence, intimidation and public disorder which has been witnessed for many years. The Government gave the police their full support in the action they took to maintain order, to protect miners an their families from intimidation, and to ensure that those who wished to exercise their right to go to work were able to do so.

I have recently completed the review of public order law and related legislation which was initiated by my predecessor in 1979. The Government intend to announce the conclusions of the review in a White Paper which will be published shortly.

Legislation has been enacted to enhance both the powers available to deal with terrorism and the safeguards for the citizen under the Prevention of Terrorism Act.

We have introduced legislation to provide a clear statutory framework for the authorisation and control of the interception of communications for limited but important purposes in the public interest, and to provide effective safeguards and remedies against abuse.

Revised and strengthened Home Office guidelines on the use of equipment in police surveillance operations have been issued and made public, and new Home Office guidelines on the work of special branches have been issued and, for the first time, made public.

In the light of Lord Scarman's report, my Department has taken forward, in conjunction with the police and local authorities, a thorough review of police training, including new programmes, to equip officers to deal with all section of the public in a sensitive and effective way; to prepare new entrants better for their responsibilities as police officers; and to enhance the training given to other ranks of the service. Two specific achievements in the area are the new and extended programme of police probationer training, which was brought into operation in January 1984 and, in the fields of community and race relations training for the police, the establishment of an independent training support centre at Brunel university.

The Police and Criminal Evidence Act, which received Royal Assent in October 1984, modernises and clarifies the powers available to the police for the investigation of crime and, at the same time, provides new safeguards for the citizen. It rationalises and modernises the law on evidence in criminal proceedings. It establishes new arrangements for dealing with complaints against the police, strengthening the independent element in the investigation of serious complaints and making possible the informal resolution of minor cases.

In the Criminal Justice Act 1982 we strengthened the powers of the courts do deal with offenders, particularly those under the age of 21. To maintain public confidence in the measures taken to deal with crimes of violence, we made it known that people sentenced to life imprisonment for certain particularly heinous kinds of murder will normally be detained for at least 20 years; and we have severely restricted the grant of parole to prisoners sentenced to more than five years' imprisonment for offences of violence or drug trafficking. At the same time we have put in train measures to divert from custody those guilty of less serious offences, and have reduced the minumum qualifying period for parole from 12 to six months.

We have given priority to the provision of adequate resources for the courts and other services dealing with offenders, while taking steps to increase the efficiency and cost-effectiveness of these services.

The number of probation officers in field posts has increased from 4,673 on 30 June 1979 to 5,463 on 31 December 1984; over the same period the number pf probation ancillaries increased from 788 to 1,310. We have issued a statement of national objectives and priorities for the probation service, as a basis on which local services can construct their own plans and ensure that their own resources are deployed to the best effect.

We have opended 48 new attendance centres, including 16 senior centres.

We have introduced legislation to establish a Crown prosecution service, to make further provision for the payment of costs in criminal cases and to provide for the introduction of time limits in criminal proceedings.

We publushed in February a Green Paper on extradition and have opened negotiations with Spain with a view to re-establishing extradition arrangements.

We have established, under Home Office chairmanship, the ministerial group on the misuse of drugs to review and develop the Government's overall strategy for tackling drug misuse. Barbiturates have been brought under the control of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 and consultations are taking place on the detailed changes necessary to enable us to ratify the United nations convention of psychotropic substances 1971. We are supporting private Members' Bills to increase to life imprisonment the maximum penalty for trafficking in drugs such as heroin and cocaine and to limit the blatant sales of solvents to young people for misuse. We have also made clear our determination to find more effective ways of depriving drug traffickers of the proceeds of their crimes and have announced our intention to introduce legislation in this Parliament to provide for the confiscation of the proceeds of crime.

We have enabled local authorities to control the spred of sex shops and sex cinemas. We have given assistance with measures designed to restrict indecent displays, extend licensing controls to commercial cinema clubs, and establish a system of classification for video recordings which will deal with the problem of "video naties."

We have strengthened and clarified the powers of the courts to make compensation orders. We have revised and extended the criminal injuries compensation scheme and announced our intention to introduce legislation in this Parliament to place it on a statutory footing. We have participated in the preparation of the Council of Europe convention on the compensation of victims of violent crimes. We have given financial support to the National Association of Victims Support Schemes, and we have provided funds for experimental projects in repatriation by offenders to victims of their crimes.

In the Repatriation of Prisoners Act 1984, we have provided powers for the transfer of prisoners to and from the United Kingdom to enable them to serve their sentences in their homes countries. We have participated in the prepatriation of the Council of Europe convention on the transfer of sentenced persons.

We have continued to improve management and efficiency in the prison department and in particular have taken steps to forge better lines of communications and accountability within the prison service.

Under the expansion programme for prison staffing announced last year, the number of serving prison officers has risen to 18,400.

We have continued the major programme of new prison building and refurbishment of the existing prison estate. An additional two new prisons have been added to the programme during the past year making a total of 16 new establishments currently under construction or design. Over the past four years, the programme has produced some 3,000 new inmate places.

We have restructured the young offender custodial system with the provisions of the Criminal Justice Act 1982.

We have applied many of the features of the experiment with tougher regimes in detention centres in a new consistent regime for the whole detention centre system which took effect on 6 March 1985.

We have maintained a firm and fair immigration control. In 1984, fewer people were accepted for settlement than in any year since control of Commonwealth immigration began in 1962. The British Nationality Act 1981 has brought nationality law up to date and created a new British citizenship for those who belong to this country. A White Paper (Cmnd. 9183) announced improvements in the handling of applications for British citizenship and reduced fees for the majority of applicants. We have continued our efforts to promote good community relations and to create a society in which there is equality of opportunity, rights and responsibilities.

In accordance with the provisions of the Broadcasting Act 1981, a fourth television channel has been established and new arrangements made for Welsh broadcasting. Legislation has been enacted to provide for the establishment of the Cable Authority and the development of cable systems providing both entertainment and other (including inter active) services. Legislation has also been enacted to provide for direct broadcasting by satellite. Local radio continues to expand and legislative provision has been made for the basis of an independent national radio service. Proposals for community radio are being developed.

The Data Protection Act has been passed and will enable the United Kingdom to ratify the Council of Europe convention on this matter.

We have reviewed our civil defence preparations, increased the resources available for them, brought into operation in December 1983 new regulations requiring local authorities to play their full part in civil defence planning, and in October 1984 appointed a civil defence adviser to monitor local authorities' progress and advise them.

We have introduced a major Representation of the People Bill which, amongst other things, extends absent voting rights to holidaymakers and to many British citizens abroad.

We issued, in May 1983, a White Paper on scientific procedures on living animals (Cmnd. 8883), which set out proposals for major new legislation in this field. These proposals would modernise and extend the law so as to provide more effective protection for animals used for the purpose of scientific research.

A committee of inquiry was set up to consider proposals to amend the Shops Acts. We are currently considering its report.

We have introduced a system of annual performance reviews which ensures that each part of the Home Office has an agreed programme of work and objectives to enable the Department's strategic aims to be achieved.

Heroin Addicts

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many known heroin addicts there are in the Bradford area in each year of the period 1980 to 1984 and what were the amounts of illegal drugs seized in each year in Bradford.

Mr. Mellor: The available information relates to police force areas and is given for the West Yorkshire police force area in the following tables. Information for 1984 is not yet available.

Immigration

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the latest figure for the number of men refused permission to Britain because it is considered that their primary purpose in getting married is mainly or partly to achieve entry to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waddington: Eight hundred and ninety husbands and fiancés were refused entry clearance in the Indian sub-continent in 1984 solely on the grounds that the primary purpose of the marriage was to obtain admission to the United Kingdom, and 90 were refused partly for this reason. Corresponding information for countries outside the Indian sub-continent is not available.

Chief Constable of Merseyside

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what duties on behalf of his Department have sent the chief constable of the Merseyside county police force to Washington DC; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The chief constable of Merseyside was a member of a group, including representatives of Government Departments and the police service, who visited Washington last week. The purpose of the visit was to discuss with representatives of the United States Government matters of mutual interest related to our efforts to counter terrorism, as part of our regular contacts with the United States and other Governments on these matters.

Suicides

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give details of all recorded suicide verdicts by coroners' courts involving deaths of girls under 16 years of age in England and Wales between 20 December 1984 and 11 January 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not collected centrally by the Home Office. However, I understand that the information is collected by registrars of births, deaths and marriages, and published figures will be available by about June 1985 from the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys. Because of the time required to complete inquests, final figures will not be available until about spring 1986.

Children (Carers)

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress he has made with his review of the arrangements for the disclosure of information to prospective employers about any relevant criminal background of persons seeking to work with children in a paid or voluntary capacity; when he expects to conclude it; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan [pursuant to the reply, 28 February, c. 258]: I have established a review, which is under way with the following terms of reference:

"To devise a system under which information about the unsuitability by reason of criminal background of people seeking positions where they will have substantial opportunities for access to children can be communicated to those bodies which are responsible for engaging such people, whether in a paid or voluntary capacity, and to those who have responsibility for authorising or licensing such people to occupy such positions."

I have asked those conducting the review to canvass the views of those working in the education and child care field, to complete the report by the end of June and to submit the report in the form of a plan of action which can be implemented swiftly.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Overseas Aid

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of United Kingdom overseas aid is administered by the United Kingdom Government; what proportion is administered through other agencies; and if he will list them.

Mr. Raison: Through the Overseas Development Administration the Government are responsible for the administration of all overseas aid programme funds. Currently just over 40 per cent. is being channelled through multilateral aid organisations, including the European Community; the exact proportion varies from one financial year to another. The multilateral organisations we support are listed in the Supply Estimates presented to Parliament each year. Parts of the bilateral aid programme and certain detailed administrative procedures are implemented by the Commonwealth Development Corporation, the British Council and the Crown Agents.

DEFENCE

National Parks

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence what new acquisitions have been made of land in each national park by his Department since the publication of the Nugent committee's report; and what is the percentage of such land in each park and in total which is currently owned or occupied by his Department.

Mr. Lee: The information is as follows:

National Park	Acquisitions in acres	Acquisition as percentage of National Park	Ministry of Defence total land-holding as percentage of National Park
Brecon Beacons	16	0·005	0·16
Lake District	353	0·06	0·29
Peak District	379	0·11	0·11
Snowdonia	14	0·003	0·14
Dartmoor	—	—	1·53
Northumberland	—	—	21·73
North Yorks Moors	—	—	0·73
Yorkshire Dales	—	—	0·24
Pembroke Coast	—	—	4·60
Exmoor	—	—	—

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of land (a) in each national park and (b) in total has been released by his Department, since the publication of the Nugent committee's report.

Mr. Lee: The percentage of Ministry of Defence land released since the publication of the report of the Defence Lands Committee is as follows:

	Per cent.
Brecon Beacons	1·82
Lake District	0·25
Peak District	0·26
Snowdonia	6·68
Dartmoor	7·15
Northumberland	0·01
North Yorks Moors	0·04
Yorkshire Dales	0·47
Pembroke Coast	4·25
Exmoor	—

The release of this land amount to 0·84 per cent of defence land holdings in the national parks. Defence land holdings overall have been reduced by 7·6 per cent. since April 1973.

Victoria Barracks, Windsor

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give some indication as to when the demolition of Victoria barracks, Windsor, will be completed; and if he will make a statement on the progress of this project.

Mr. Lee: The demolition of the existing barracks at Windsor should be completed by the end of July this year. My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces will provide a further progress report as soon as possible.

NATO

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the number and role of British armed forces' facilities in Northern Ireland currently dedicated wholly or in part to honouring Britain's obligations under the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation; and what are the developments of these and any new facilities which are planned within the foreseeable future.

Mr. Lee: One radar facility in Northern Ireland is dedicated wholly to a NATO role. There are no plans for the development of this facility or the setting up of any new facilities in the foreseeable future.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Death Statistics

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give, for the latest year for which figures are available, the number of deaths in Great Britain where the cause of death or a contributory factor was (a) alcohol consumption, (b) tobacco consumption, (c) heroin consumption, (d) cocaine consumption, (e) cannabis consumption and (f) solvent abuse.

Mr. John Patten: Information is not available in the form requested. However, the tables give the available information for deaths in Great Britain in 1983 specifically associated with alcohol, heroin, cocaine and cannabis consumption. Limited additional information is given for deaths associated with alcohol consumption. Deaths from road traffic accidents are not shown, but it is estimated that about one road death in five (ie about 1,200 a year for Great Britain) occurs in accidents where at least one person had consumed alcohol over the legal limit.

The Royal College of Physicians estimated in 1981 that at least 100,000 deaths per year in the United Kingdom were related to smoking.

Exact figures of deaths associated with solvent abuse are not collected centrally but 77 confirmed cases were identified in Great Britain in 1983 where solvent abuse was either the underlying or a contributory cause of death. The statistics for England and Wales incorporated in these two totals were obtained from research carried out by St. George's hospital medical school.

Manpower Information

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will describe the content, timing and frequency of reports of manpower information from health authorities to his Department.

Mr. John Patten: The principal manpower information relating to directly-employed staff in the National Health Service in England which this Department receives from health authorities is as follows:

1. Non-medical manpower
Information is collected quarterly about staff in post at 31 December, 31 March, 30 June and 30 September, in almost all cases as extracts from Regions' payroll computers. Included are contractual data (payscale, type of occupation, place of employment, hours worked etc.) and non-contractual information (sex, marital status, date of birth etc.) together with a record identifier (payroll number or National Insurance number) needed by health authorities to trace records rejected by validation checks. Much of the information is presented under standard codes. The same information is collected each quarter to simplify the collection arrangements but certain data items (eg occupation codes) are subjected to more detailed checking in the September returns, and as a result information for this quarter can be made available in greater detail than for other quarters.

2. Medical and dental staff
(a) Information is collected each year on medical and dental staff employed in the hospital and community services, the returns relate to staff in post at 30 September; included are contractual data (grade, specialty, type of contract, number of sessions or hours worked etc.) and other information (name, sex, General Medical Council number, date of birth etc.).
(b) Details of vacant consultant and senior registrar posts are collected in respect of 30 September.
(c) An aggregated return giving whole-time equivalents of staff in post is collected in respect of 31 March each year.

3. Other returns and reports
These include:
(a) Information on medical and non-medical staff working in mental illness and mental handicap hospitals and units is collected annually at 31 December as part of a general return on these facilities; the manpower data relate to staff in post at the previous 30 September and include details of numbers and whole-time equivalents by occupational category.
(b) Information on pathologists and technicians working in cervical cytology is collected annually at 31 December as part of a more general return on cervical cytology facilities. The manpower details include numbers, whole-time equivalents and type of contract.
(c) This Department receives information supplied by health authorities to the Department of Employment on time lost through industrial action.
(d) Health authorities include some manpower information in the planning documents they present to the Department in accordance with circular HC(84)2. This information generally relates only to staff in post by broad staff group for the periods relevant to the particular document.

Redundant Mineworkers

Mr. Maude asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will arrange for expedited appeal hearings for mineworkers who have taken voluntary redundancy under the redundant mineworkers payments scheme and who have been disqualified from receiving unemployment benefit.

Mr. Newton: We are aware of the considerable number of appeals by redundant miners disqualified for receiving unemployment benefit, which are awaiting hearing by social security appeal tribunals. In most of these cases the hearing has been adjourned to await the decisions of a Tribunal of Social Security Commissioners to whom a number of similar cases have been referred. We have no power to intervene in these matters but I understand that arrangements have been made to expedite the hearing of these cases by the Commissioners and that this is now due to take place on 16-17 April 1985. The Commissioners' decisions will provide authoritative case law for the guidance of the social security appeal tribunals who will then be in a position to arrange re-hearings of their outstanding appeals as soon as practicable.

Mr. Maude asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many mineworkers who took voluntary redundancy under the redundant mineworkers payments scheme during the recent dispute have been disqualified from receiving unemployment benefit.

Mr. Newton: The information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Residential Care Changes (Disregard)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether, in view of the amplified guidance given in paragraph 6 of local authority circular (85)2 concerning the exercise of discretion in assessing charges for residential care where a person who has been caring for the resident continues to live in the resident's former dwelling, he will take steps to have the appropriate social security resource regulation altered to bring about an equivalent extension of disregard for social security purposes.

Mr. Whitney: We have no plans to amend the supplementary benefit regulations which currently provide that the value of a claimant's property shall be ignored where it is occupied either in whole or in part by an aged or incapacitated relative or by the spouse where the couple are no longer regarded as living together because of the permanent admission of one of them to hospital or residential accommodation. The treatment of capital will, however, be one of the matters to be considered in the light of the social security review.

Tobacco Industry (Voluntary Agreement)

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether his voluntary agreement with the tobacco industry on cigarette advertising includes an undertaking that the industry will not encourage smoking among children;

(2) what steps he takes monitor the effectiveness of his voluntary agreement with the tobacco industry on cigarette advertising; and what information he has about the incidence of breaches of the agreement.

Mr. John Patten: Within the voluntary agreement on cigarette advertising, which has the protection of young people as a specific aim, the cigarette companies undertake to observe the cigarette advertising code of practice. This includes a requirement that cigarette advertisements should not seek to encourage young people to smoke. The voluntary agreement as a whole is carefully monitored by this Department, and the cigarette code by the Advertising Standards Authority.

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he proposes to take in the light of a recent incident in Covent Garden in which a group purporting to represent the tobacco industry distributed to children material bearing slogans encouraging them to smoke.

Mr. John Patten: We have no direct knowledge of the incident to which my hon. Friend refers, but if he cares to write to me with details I will gladly look into it.

Housing Finance

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report for each district and islands council in Scotland in respect of the years 1984-85 and 1985-86 the estimated amounts to be refunded to that authority by the Government in respect of expenditure on housing benefit (rent rebates) to tenants of local authority houses.

Mr. Whitney: On the basis of interim subsidy claims from each of the district and island councils in Scotland, we estimate that the amount of housing benefit subsidy for rent rebates payable for 1984-85 will be as follows:

Authority	Rent rebate subsidy £ million
Aberdeen	5·4
Angus	3·0
Annandale	1·1
Argyll-Bute	2·6

Comparable information for 1985-86 is not yet available.

NHS (Consultants)

Mr. White asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the length of the average working week for consultants in the National Health Service for each year since 1970.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This information is not available. The majority of National Health Service consultants have full-time contracts which make them responsible for the care of their patients on a 24-hour continuing basis. This commitment is not readily quantifiable in terms of time, and records are not kept.

Nurses (Back Pain)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish immediately the recent research report into back pain amongst nurses; when the research was commissioned; when the report was distributed; who is assessing the research; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The research was commissioned by our Department from Surrey university in March 1981. A report was received in August 1984 on which the views of independent assessors were sought. These are currently being assessed within the Department. The report is lengthy and makes several wide-ranging recommendations which need to be carefully considered before we can decide whether and, if so, what further useful guidance should be given to health authorities.

I share the right hon. Member's wish to reduce the incidence of back injury and pain amongst National Health Service staff. I shall let him have a fuller reply when we have completed our consideration of the report.

Babies (Drugs)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the information he has as to the drug products recommended for babies which sell at or above a level of 10 million doses a year, indicating their use.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Although we know how many prescriptions are issued by general practitioners for individual products, we have no information on the proportion of those prescriptions which is for use in babies; nor do we know the numbers of such products which are sold off-prescription. We therefore cannot say what products sell 10 million doses or more a year for use in babies.

Mr Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will request the Committee on Safety of Medicines to require companies expecting to sell a drug at a level of or above one million doses annually for babies, to provide evidence of safety at a higher level than normal, and such that adverse reactions are no more frequent than one in a thousand babies given the product; and if he will estimate the number of babies that would need to be included in a research study to produce statistically sound evidence of safety at this level.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Safety data are assessed with reference to the proposed uses of individual drugs. It would not be appropriate to set rigid minimum standards for such data.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when, and in what context, the Committee on Safety of Medicines considered the safety of products containing dicyclomine apart from those in May 1983 and July 1983 referred to in the answer on 11 March, Official Report, columns 72-73; what was the nature of the 36 adverse reactions reported to the Committee since 1969; and to what factors he attributes the large increase in the number of reports made in 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The safety of products containing dicyclomine was considered by the Committee on Safety of Medicines whenever an application for a relevant product licence was referred to them. In addition Debendox, which contained dicyclomine until 1982, was considered by the Committee on eight occasions between June 1978 and February 1983.

The adverse reactions involving babies under six months old reported to the committee as associated with dicyclomine products were: apnoeia; drowsiness; hyperventilation; rashes; oculogyric crisis; addiction; floppiness; convulsion; deafness; hyperactivity; syncope; stupor and dyskinetic movement. It is very important to note that a report does not necessarily demonstrate a causal relationship between the reaction and the drug concerned. We do not know why there was an increase in adverse reaction reports for these products in 1983 and 1984.

Chiropodists

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will place in the Library a copy of his Department's report on the question of status and use of the title chiropodist; when this report was made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. We are currently considering advice from our officials following discussions, which were concluded last year, with the professional interests concerned on the question of protection of titles of all professions (including chiropody) covered by the Professions Supplementary to Medicine Act 1960. These discussions were concluded on the understanding that the advice would be confidential to Ministers and would not be published.

Departmental Staff

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people were employed in his Department's offices in Scotland in 1979; and what is the latest available figure.

Mr. Whitney: On 1 March 1979 the Department employed 7,829 staff in Scotland. On 1 March 1985, 8,526 staff were employed.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many persons were in receipt of supplementary benefit in each year since 1979 in Cumbernauld and Kilsyth.

Mr. Whitney: The Cumbernauld and Kilsyth constituency is covered by the Department's office at Cumbernauld. The number of persons receiving supplementary benefit from that office in December of each year since 1979 was:

	Number
1979	4,438
1980	5,235
1981	6,773
1982	8,296
1983	9,068
1984	*9,649

* The figures for December 1984 are only provisional at present.

Tranquillisers

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list those bodies funded by his Department which are engaged in combating the side effects of tranquillisers, indicating the extent of such funding; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will establish training courses for general practitioners on the problems of the long-term use of tranquillisers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

NHS (Efficiency Prize)

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if any further progress has been made about the suggestion of an annual cash prize within the National Health Service for the best ideas brought forward by employees for increasing efficiency in all areas of the service.

Mr. John Patten: I am pleased to tell my hon. Friend that our Department, jointly with the Health and Social Services Journal, has arranged a national scheme under which prize money of £2,000 per annum will be offered for the best staff suggestions by NHS employees. Full details of the scheme is contained in this week's issue of the HSSJ. I will arrange for copies to be made available in the Library.

High Rent Area Authorisations

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the local authorities who have (a) requested and (b) received authorisation to operate a high rent area scheme (i) for public authority and private tenants, (ii) for public authority tenants, (iii) for private sector tenants and (iv) for class authorisations.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 5 March 1985, c. 515-6]: When a local authority applies for a general high rent authorisation in either the private or public sector it is automatically treated as an application for authorisation in both sectors. The table lists at (a) those authorities which have requested high rent authorisations; and at (b) those authorities which have received authorisations in addition to the authorities listed in my hon. Friend's replies to the hon. Member for Derby, South of 30 October and 12 December 1984 at columns 957 and 535 respectively.

Earnings-related pension

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the total saving in each year until 2,000 from the abolition of the state earnings-related pension scheme.

Mr. Whitney: [pursuant to his reply, 25 March 1985, c. 92.]: The costs of the state earnings-related pension scheme depend crucially on the pattern of earnings levels and upratings, especially in the longer term future. The estimated costs of the earnings-related component payable with retirement pension, invalidity pension and widow's benefit, on the basis of the central assumptions described in "Population, Pension Costs and Pensioners' Incomes", expressed in constant prices at 1984-85 levels are as follows:

	£ billion
1985-86	¼
1990-91	1
2000-01	4½

Figures for the intervening years are not readily available. These sums do not represent the savings which would arise from abolition of the state earnings-related pension scheme since they take no account of the decisions which would need to be taken about the treatment of additional component already in payment or the treatment of accrued rights.

Medicines Act (Infringements)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on how many occasions during 1984 his Department has (a) investigated infringements of the Medicines Act, (b) warned companies that the Act was being infringed and requested remedial action and (c) prosecuted companies for infringement of the Act; and why publicity is not given to such investigations.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 26 March 1985]: During 1984 our Department investigated 234 alleged infringements of the Medicines Act. In154 cases we took the view that a breach of the Act had occurred. This view was conveyed to all the individuals or companies concerned and remedial action requested in each case. No prosecutions resulted from these investigations in 1984; there has been one, so far, in 1985.

Except where a court detemines otherwise these cases are allegations of breaches of the Act only notwithstanding that they may be supported by the opinion of our Department. We cannot publicise these cases but we do ensure that, in addition to any publicity in the press, the results of prosecutions are publicised to licence holders.

Benzodiazepines

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to tighten the scheduling of benzodiazepines; and if he will make a statement on their scheduling under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971.

Mr. Mellor: I have been asked to reply and will do so as soon as possible.

SCOTLAND

School Closures

Mr. White asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools have closed in (i) Glasgow and (ii) Scotland since 1979.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The table following gives the numbers of schools operating in the public sector at the dates shown. This information is collected through the annual school census, which does not separately identify school closures or new openings.

		Primary	Secondary
1979	Scotland	2,530	445
	Glasgow	254	58
1984	Scotland	2,443	440
	Glasgow	239	56
Difference	Scotland	−87	−5
	Glasgow	−15	−2

The Scottish Education Department is making arrangements to collect and publish details of school closures and new openings separately in future.

Public Sector Dwellings

Mr. White asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the numbers of public sector dwellings which consist of (a) one or two apartments, (b) three apartments and (c) five or more apartments.

Mr. Ancram: The information requested is set out in the table:

Public Sector Dwellings (30 September 1984)

Number of Apartments	Number of dwellings
1-2	156,426
3	493,497
4	310,677
5 or more	38,068
All sizes	998,668

Free School Meals

Mr. White asked the Secretary of State of Scotland how many schoolchildren now receive free school meals in (a) Glasgow and (b) Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The latest information from the school meals census held in January 1984 is that 129,335 pupils in Scotland receive free school meals, of whom 33,791 pupils are in Glasgow.

Broadleaved Woodlands

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the number and area of broadleaved woodlands which was clearfelled by the Forestry Commission on its own estate in each of the years 1982-83, 1983-84 and in the current year to date; and what was the number and area of these woodlands which have been or will be replanted (a) purely with broadleaves, (b) with broadleaves and conifers containing a majority of broadleaves, (c) with broadleaves and conifers containing a majority of conifers and (d) not replanted with trees.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

Year	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85 (to 31 December)
Number of clearfellings	39	35	32
Total Area clearfelled (hectares)	133·1	122·9	77·3
(a) Replanted with broadleaves only
Number of sites	31	22	18
Total Area (hectares)	93	54·7	33·6
(b) Replanted with broadleaves in the majority
Number of sites	2	3	6
Total Area (hectares)	4·6	31	22·4
(c) Replanted with conifers in the majority
Number of sites	5	9	7
Total Area (hectares)	27	31·2	20·3
(d) Not to be replanted
Number of sites	1	0	1
Total Area (hectares)	8·5	0	1·0

The figures for replanting exclude one site of six hectares where low-grade broadleaves were felled and replaced by conifers in 1983-84.

In 19 of the 21 cases where broadleaves were felled and replaced by a mixture with conifers in the majority, the conifers were planted as a "nurse crop" to shelter the young broadleaved trees and will in due course be removed to leave broadleaved woods.

In the two cases where there was no replanting, the trees were felled to allow for public road schemes.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will ask the Forestry Commission to meet the major voluntary conservation organisations to discuss the Broadleaves in Britain Review before 8 May 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The conduct of the "Broadleaves in Britain" review is a matter for the Forestry Commission. My right hon. Friend is not prepared to require the commission to hold discussions with any particular bodies.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many and which broadleaved woodlands which were clearfelled under licence and converted to agriculture between 1982 and the present day were the subject of consultation with (a) the Nature Conservancy Council, (b) the Countryside Commission, (c) a National Park Authority and (d) the relevant local planning authority in each year.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Departmental Staff

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people were employed by (a) the Scottish Office and (b) the Scottish Economic Planning Department in 1979; and how this compares with latest available figures.

Mr. Younger: The information requested is as follows:

	Number of staff (full-time equivalent)
	1 January 1979	1 March 1985
Scottish Office	11,120	9,888
Scottish Economic Planning Department (renamed Industry Department for Scotland in 1983)	236	312*

* Includes 88 posts transferred from Department of Trade and Industry (Regional Development Grants Office, Glasgow) in November 1984.

Labour Statistics

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many people were employed in the textile industry in Scotland in 1979; and how this figure compares with the latest available figure;

(2) how many people in Scotland were employed in the production of Scotch whisky in 1979; and what is the latest up to date figure;

(3) how many people were employed in the electrical appliance industry in Scotland in 1979; and what is the current number;

(4) how many people in Scotland were employed in the shipbuilding and ship repairing industry in 1979; and how this figure compares with the latest available figures;

(5) how many people were employed in steelmaking in Scotland in 1979; and how this figure compares with latest available figures.

Mr. Younger: The estimated numbers of employees in employment in Scotland are set out in the table:

	1979	1982
Textile industry	50,100	32,500
Spirit distilling and compounding	23,400	18,800
Domestic type electricappliance industry	4,100	2,300
Shipbuilding and repairing	30,600	26,000
Iron and Steel manufacturing	22,700	13,800

The estimates are based on the census of production; those for 1982 are the latest available.

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people were employed in Scotland in 1979; and how this figure compares with the latest published figures.

Mr. Younger: The seasonally adjusted number of employees in employment in Scotland is estimated to have been 2,098,000 in June 1979 and 1,921,000 in September 1984. The latter estimate is provisional.

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many job vacancies were notified in 1979; and what is the latest available figure.

Mr. Younger: The number of vacancies notified to jobcentres in Scotland was 267,189 in 1979 and 259,777 in 1984., the latest year for which figures are available. The figures include vacancies notified under the community programme and the former special temporary employment programme.

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people were registered as unemployed at June 1979; and how many were registered at the latest available date.

Mr. Younger: I refer the right hon. Gentleman to my letter of 22 October 1984. The information requested is available in the House of Commons Library.

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people were employed in the coal mining industry in Scotland in 1979; and how this figure compares with the latest available figure.

Mr. Younger: The National Coal Board estimates its number of employees in deep-mined coal in March 1979 was 25,000 and in February 1985 was 14,900. Estimates for other employers in coal mining are not available for these dates.

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people in Scotland were employed in the microelectronics industry in 1979; and how this compares with latest available figures.

Mr. Younger: The latest available estimate of employment in the Scottish electronics industry is 42,500 in mid-1983. This compares with estimates from the census of employment of 37,300 in 1978 and 38,300 in 1981. This growth in employment reflects growth in new and expanding electronics plants, along with the reclassification of certain plants from the electro-mechanical and other industries to electronics.

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many jobs have been created; and how many have been lost in each year since May 1979 in each of the Scottish new towns.

Mr. Allan Stewart: This information is not available. However, estimates by development corporations of the numbers of jobs created and jobs lost in industry are set out in the table:

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84
Cumbernauld
Jobs created	806	512	544	609	1,066
Jobs lost	611	1,662	1,816	559	600
East Kilbride
Jobs created	599	587	874	820	1,110
Jobs lost	915	4,437	1,310	1,662	965

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84
Glenrothes
Jobs created	914	706	758	956	1,178
Jobs lost	624	1,933	915	1,100	753
Irvine
Jobs created	1,208	224	439	882	900
Jobs lost	1,369	2,576	1,187	1,209	730
Livingston
Jobs created	930	607	601	911	1,670
Jobs lost	965	1,133	1,108	802	740

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many jobs in the high technology industries have been created; and how many have been lost in each year since May 1979 in Cumbernauld new town;

(2) how many jobs in the food industry have been created; and how many have been lost in each year since May 1979 in Cumbernauld new town;

(3) how many jobs in the construction industry have been created; and how many have been lost in each year since May 1979 in Cumbernauld new town;

(4) how many jobs in the clothing industry have been created; and how many have been lost in each year since May 1979 in Cumbernauld new town;

(5) how many jobs in the distribution industry have been created; and how many have been lost in each year since May 1979 in Cumbernauld new town;

(6) how many jobs in the engineering industry have been created; and how many have been lost in each year since May 1979 in Cumbernauld new town;

(7) how many jobs in the paper and board industry have been created; and how many have been lost in each year since May 1979 in Cumbernauld new town.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many young people aged between 16 and 18 years of age were registered as unemployed at May 1979; and what is the latest available figure.

Mr. Younger: The analysis of unemployed persons by age and duration is undertaken quarterly in January, April, July and October. The information on the number of unemployed young persons aged 16 to 18 years at April 1979 and January 1985 is available in the House of Commons Library.

The figures are not directly comparable over the years, however, because of the change, in October 1982, from a registrant to a claimant based count.

Manpower Services Commission

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people were employed by the Manpower Services Commission in Scotland in 1979; and what is the latest available figure.

Mr. Younger: The number of staff employed by the Manpower Services Commission at 1 April 1979—the beginning of the operational year—and 1 March 1985, the latest date for which information is available, was 2,566 and 2,207, respectively.

Industrial Assistance

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money was distributed to Scottish companies in the form of selective financial assistance between May 1978 and May 1979; and what was the figure for 1983-84.

Mr. Younger: Payments of selective financial assistance totalled £12·2 million in the period May 1978 to April 1979, and £23·7 million in the period April 1983 to March 1984.

Regional Development Grant

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money was distributed by the Government to Scottish companies in the form of regional development grant between May 1978 and May 1979; and what was the figure for 1983-84.

Mr. Younger: Figures are not available for the period May 1978 to May 1979. Regional development grants totalling £107·3 million were paid in the period April 1978 to March 1979 and £142·9 million in the period April 1983 to March 1984.

Youth Unemployment

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the level of youth unemployment in each year since 1979 in Cumbernauld and Kilsyth.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Information on the number of unemployed young people aged under 18 in the Cumbernauld and Kilsyth jobcentre areas is available in the House of Commons Library for the period requested. However, the figures are not directly comparable due to the change to a claimant based count in October 1982.

New Towns (Housing)

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many houses were built in each of the new towns in Scotland in 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information is as follows:

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Cumbernauld	453	296	280	320	145	70
East Kilbride	148	261	263	125	374	288

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Glenrothes	579	416	539	222	377	220
Irvine	574	193	571	115	174	120
Livingston	933	682	297	404	321	183

Suicides

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of all recorded suicide verdicts by coroners' courts involving deaths of girls under 16 years of age in Scotland between 20 December 1984 and 11 January 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: There are no coroners' courts in Scotland. Investigation into sudden, suspicious or unexplained death is a function of the procurator fiscal who may apply to the sheriff to hold a fatal accident inquiry to inquire into the circumstances of the death and make a determination as to the cause of death. The result of the fatal accident inquiry is notified to the Registrar General for Scotland.

No cases of the type specified had been notified to the Registrar General up to and including 26 March 1985.

Departmental Cash Limits

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has any changes to announce in the cash limits for 1985-86 within his responsibility.

Mr. Younger: Yes. Further to my announcement of 7 March, at columns 1177-87, concerning the increase in domestic rate relief, the following table gives details of the revisions required to cash limits for 1985-86. The balance of provision has been raised by adjustment to the cash limit for Class XV, Vote 2 (by £0·5 million) and cash block SO/LA2 (by £10·5 million) prior to the amouncement of 1985-86 provision made on 19 March, at columns 446-67, and by extra savings arising from the operation of the grant penalty tariffs for local authorities in 1985-86. I expect the cash limit reductions to be offset by carry forward to 1985-86 of capital underspending in the current year, although this cannot be confirmed or announced until outturn figures are available later in the year.

Vote	Original cash limit £000	Reduction £000	Revised cash limit £000
XV, 3 Regional and general industrial support, Scotland	138,002	5,200	132,802
XV, 6 Roads, Transport and environmental services, Scotland	152,267	4,800	147,467
XV, 14 Prisons, hospitals and community health services, etc., Scotland	1,521,717	5,000	1,516,717

Electricity Boards

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has considered the progress made by the South of Scotland Electricity Board and the North of Scotland Electricity Board in implementing the recommendations made by Coopers and Lybrand Associates and Arthur Young McClelland Moores & Co., on their respective reviews of the boards' activities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: Both boards reported to me on their progress at the end of 1984, in accordance with the terms of my statements of 29 July 1983, at columns 610-11, and 26 October 1983, at column 146. A copy of each board's final response to the consultants' recommendations has been placed in the Library.

Following my consideration of the South of Scotland Electricity Board's interim response to the Coopers and Lybrand audit, my Department has had further discussions with the board on a number of recommendations which the board felt unable to accept in their entirety. Amongst these were the extension of the role of the board's audit committee to embrace efficiency reviews and the best means of presenting alternatives strategies in corporate planning. The board has now established an efficiency review committee, involving non-executive board members, to undertake the role suggested for the audit committee in relation to efficiency and value for money reviews. I am at present considering the committee's first report which was submitted at the end of 1984. On presenting information on alternative strategies, the board has agreed to prepare papers each year reviewing the strategic options open to it. The SSEB has also made progress on its proposals for fuel purchases which were supported by Coopers and Lybrand in that it has reached a new trading agreement with the British Nuclear Fuels Limited on the supply of nuclear fuel and is negotiating new arrangements for coal purchasing from the National Coal Board.

The North of Scotland Hydro-Electric Board has accepted and is implementing all the recommendations relating to computers and the operation and maintenance of hydro-electric plant. It has also accepted in principle almost all the recommendations relating to management accounting and, following detailed examination by working parties, is incorporating them in new systems and procedures. Following discussions with my Department, the NSHEB, too, has established an efficiency review committee.

I am satisfied with both boards' progress in implementing the consultants' recommendation and their efforts to achieve maximum benefits from the reports.

Aspects of each of the boards' operations are to be referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission during 1985 and the terms of reference will take account of the efficiency audits.

Written Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Firearms

5. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is satisfied that the rules on the use and issue of firearms provide adequate guidance to Metropolitan police officers.

Mr. Brittan: I am satisfied that the Metropolitan Police rules on the issue and use of firearms fully reflect the guidelines sent to all chief officers of police in March 1983. I am not at present aware of a need for any changes; but every incident in which police firearms are discharged in the Metropolitan Police District is investigated thoroughly and any inadequacy in the rules revealed by such an investigation would be remedied at once.

Concessionary Television Licences

12. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to change the system of concessionary television licensing.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have no current plans to do so.

Crime Statistics

13. Mr. McKelvey asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the 1984 crime figures released by his Department.

30. Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to deal with the increase in crime shown by the 1984 figures.

33. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to combat the rising crime rate.

Mr. Brittan: Recorded crime in England and Wales increased by 8 per cent. in 1984, following a reduction of one per cent. in 1983. This is a disappointing figure, which makes it all the more important to continue pursuing our clear strategy of strengthening the police, extending the prison building programme, and having a penal policy designed to ensure and maintain public confidence in the criminal justice system.

32. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make a statement on the rise in crime and the fall in the clear up rate of crime shown by the figures released by his Department for 1984.

Mr. Mellor: On the first part of the question I refer the hon. Member to the reply given earlier today to a question from the hon. Member for Kilmarnock. On the second part, although it is disappointing that the proportion of offences cleared up has fallen in relation to the total recorded, the police cleared up more crimes in 1984 than in any previous year. Vigorous action is being taken to increase the effectiveness of the police in this and other aspects of their duties.

43. Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the increased number of violent assaults recorded in England and Wales during 1984.

Mr. Mellor: Statistical bulletin 6/85 published by the Department on 12 March shows that the police recorded about 114,000 offences of violence against the person in 1984, 3 per cent. more than in 1983. This increase is less than the increase in recorded crime as a whole but any offence of this kind is a serious matter and my right hon. and learned Friend has made clear his determination to give all possible support to the police in preventing and detecting such offences and in ensuring confidence in the sentences which the courts impose on those who are convicted. Action in all these areas is being vigorously pursued.

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about crime statistics for the West Midlands county.

Mr. Mellor: The number of notifiable offences recorded by the police force in each police area in 1984 was published on 12 March in Home Office Statistical Bulletin, 6/85. Between 1983 and 1984 the number of notifiable offences recorded by the West Midlands police increased by 8 per cent., the same percentage increase as for England and Wales as a whole.

Overseas Visitors

14. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many passengers sought entry into the United Kingdom as visitors during the last six months of 1984; of these, how many and what percentage were (a) granted admission as visitors immediately, (b) given temporary admission and (c) refused; and how many and what percentage of these persons in each category were from (i) the United States of America, (ii) the Commonwealth, (iii) the Indian subcontinent and (iv) the New Commonwealth and Pakistan.

Mr. Waddington: As the answer contains a number of figures I will, with permission, circulate it in the Official Report. But only one in 1,000 passengers of all nationalities seeking to enter the United Kingdom is refused leave to enter.

The information is as follows:

The table below provides the readily available information on persons refused leave to enter and persons admitted as visitors.

During the whole of 1984 a total of 8,527 persons were given temporary admission under paragraph 21 of Schedule 2 to the Immigration Act 1971. Information on those refused leave to enter and those temporarily admitted does not specifically identify those who sought entry as visitors, and information is not available on the nationality of those temporarily admitted.

Table—Persons admitted as visitors to the United Kingdom or refused leave to enter, and percentages of all non-EC visitors admitted or of all non-EC persons refused leave to enter—July-December 1984

	U.S.A.		Commonwealth		Indian Subcontinent		New Commonwealth and Pakistan		All nationalities (excluding EC)
	Number	Percentage	Number	Percentage	Number	Percentage	Number	Percentage	Number	Percentage
Persons admitted as visitors	1,299,000	38	700,000	20	128,000	4	387,000	11	3,410,000	100
Persons refused leave to enter	429	4	4,699	47	2,252	23	5,412	55	9,845	100

MI5 (Director General)

21. Mr. Bidwell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will arrange for the newly appointed director general of MI5 to meet hon. Members annually.

Mr. Brittan: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to a question from the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) on 19 March at column 463.

Coal Industry Dispute

22. Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the effect of the policing of the miners' dispute on the number of arrests made by police in London.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that the number of persons arrested in the Metropolitan Police district in 1984 was 4 per cent. lower than in 1983 but, within this total, the number arrested for notifiable offences was 5 per cent. higher. It is not possible to say to what extent these figures may have been affected by the redeployment of officers associated with the miners' dispute.

Immigration (Primary Purpose Rule)

23. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many men with wives and children living in the United Kingdom have been refused entry to Britain under the primary purpose rule.

Mr. Waddington: Three hundred and ten husbands were refused entry clearance in the Indian sub-continent in the two years 1983 and 1984 solely because of the primary purpose rule, and 20 husbands were refused partly on this ground. Statistics are not kept of how many of these husbands had children living in the United Kingdom. Corresponding information for years earlier than 1983, and for countries outside the Indian sub-continent is not available.

Shops Acts

24. Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many letters he has now received concerning the Auld report on shop hours.

54. Mr. Watson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Government intend to reform the Shops Acts.

71. Mr. Lyell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received concerning the reform of the Shops Act 1950.

74. Mr. Charles Morrison asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received concerning the reform of the Shops Act 1950.

Mr. Mellor: I refer my hon. Friends and my hon. and learned Friend to the reply given earlier today to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin).

Civil Defence

26. Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his Department's estimated grant for civil defence for Mid-Glamorgan for 1985-86; and if he will provide a breakdown of the principal expenditure headings.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Department's estimate of grant for civil defence expenditure by Mid-Glamorgan is £37,185, and is based on the total estimated expenditure made by the council of £49,580. The expenditure relates solely to staff and administration costs.

37. Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will try to encourage local authorities to take part in the warning and monitoring exercise Intex 85.

61. Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he proposes to take to give further encouragement to local authorities to take part in the warning and monitoring exercise Intex 85.

63. Sir Antony Buck asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how he proposes to ensure local authorities take part in the warning and monitoring exercise Intex 85.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer the hon. Members to the reply I gave to a question from the hon. Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville) on 25 March at column 15.

41. Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his Department's estimated grant for civil defence for South Glamorgan for 1985-86; and if he will provide a breakdown of the principal expenditure headings.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Department's estimate of grant for civil defence expenditure by South Glamorgan county council in 1985-86 is £89,067, and is based on the total estimated expenditure made by the council of £115,350. The estimate of grant is made up of £66,075 for staff and administration; £18,012 for emergency centres and communications; and £4,980 for training.

42. Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to the number of full and part-time civil defence staff employed in South Glamorgan.

Mr. Giles Shaw: South Glamorgan county council employs three full-time emergency planning staff supported by an administrative assistant and a typist.

58. Mr. Bevan asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how he monitors the way in which his Department's grant for civil defence for South Glamorgan has been spent in 1984-85; and if he will make a statement.

62. Mr. Hubbard-Miles asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he takes to monitor the way in which his Department's grant for civil defence for Mid-Glamorgan has been spent in 1984-85.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Civil defence grant claims are scrutinised by the Audit Commission to ensure that they cover only expenditure on approved items and schemes. The Department is also monitoring the extent to which local authorities, including South Glamorgan and Mid-Glamorgan, have met their statutory civil defence obligations.

60. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what responsibility he holds for ensuring that the provisions of the Civil Defence Regulations 1983 are observed in South Glamorgan.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend is responsible for ensuring that all local authorities, including South Glamorgan county council, fulfil their statutory civil defence obligations.

35. Mr. Bill Walker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there is a civil defence emergency centre in South Glamorgan.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Yes. The county council has an emergency centre co-located with that of the Cardiff district council.

Television Licence

28. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many letters he has received from the general public on the issue of the future cost of a television licence.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Some 1,150 members of the public have written during the current Session about an increase in television licence fees.

52. Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will maintain the licence fee for a monochrome television at its existing level.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The hon. Member will be aware from my right hon. and learned Friend's statement in the House yesterday about television licence fees that the monochrome fee has been increased from £15 to £18.

Drug Abuse

31. Sir Edward Gardner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what response the Government have had to their campaign to reduce drug abuse among young people.

Mr. Mellor: It is too early to judge the impact of the education and information campaign which the Government launched on 27 February. I understand from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services that there has been a heavy demand for the advice leaflets for parents, which we are issuing as the first stage of the campaign. The second stage of the campaign, which is expected to begin in mid-May, will be targeted at young people and will present the real consequences of taking heroin.

Mental Health Acts (Prisoners)

34. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners whose sentences were due to end during 1984 were detained beyond the end of those sentences under the Mental Health Acts.

Mr. Mellor: Any restriction direction on persons transferred from Prison Department establishments to hospitals under the Mental Health Acts ceases to have effect on the expiration of their sentences and information about the subsequent discharge of such persons is not recorded centrally. Information regarding transfer of prisoners to hospitals on release from prison has been published annually in "Prison Statistics England and Wales" (Table 10.1 in the latest issue for 1983, Cmnd. 9363). Figures for 1984 are not yet available.

Drug Traffickers

36. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for reports from chief constables on the effectiveness of police action against drug traffickers.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend receives annual reports from each chief officer of police on the extent and nature of the drugs problem in his force area, sources of supply and force organisation to investigate drug misuse. Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary has recently emphasised to all chief constables in England and Wales the importance Her Majesty's Inspectors of Constabulary will be attaching to the effectiveness of drugs investigations in their annual inspections of polic forces and the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis has identified drug misuse as one of the two new operational priorities in his force strategy for 1985.

Heroin Abuse

38. Mr. Portillo asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make a statement about the level of heroin abuse.

Mr. Mellor: The Government are deeply concerned about the scale of heroin misuse, especially among young people.

There was an increase from 4,118 to 5,864 (approximately 42 per cent.) in the number of addicts notified to the Home Office in 1983, of whom some 80 per cent. were reported as being addicted to heroin, either alone or in combination with other drugs. Provisional figures suggest that the increase in notifications in 1984 was of the order of 20 to 25 per cent.

The Government are taking vigorous action, across a broad front, to combat the trafficking and misuse of all drugs, including heroin. The Government's overall strategy and its recent initiatives are described in a review ("Tackling Drug Misuse: A Summary of the Government's Strategy") which we are publishing today, copies of which are being sent to all hon. and right hon. Members.

Football Hooliganism

39. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to introduce legislation to deal with football hooliganism.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The urgent review which the Government are conducting of ways to deal with football hooliganism will include consideration of whether additional legislation is required.

66. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers have been injured while on duty at football matches since the current football season started.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Metropolitan police have readily available figures showing that so far this season 83 of their officers have sustained injuries while on duty at football matches. The "injuries" range from minor bruising to serious injuries requiring hospital treatment. Statistics for other police forces do not necessarily distinguish injuries sustained by police officers at football matches from injuries sustained elsewhere while on duty.

Air Weapons (Misuse)

40. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has assessed the value of the national media campaign at the end of 1983 warning against the misuse of air weapons.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We will assess the value of this campaign when the statistics on air weapons offences committed during 1984 become available later this year.

Prison Service

44. Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to improve the efficiency of the prison service.

Mr. Mellor: As part of the Government's financial management initiative the prison service is committed to obtaining maximum value for money from all its resources of manpower, building, and plant. In particular prioritywill be given to ensuring that prison service staff are deployed to the best possible effect and with less reliance than at present on very high levels of overtime. Other measures designed to increase efficiency include the following:

(a) a system of annual performance reviews, which are being used to set management objectives and monitor performance across the service;

(b) better and more timely financial and management information from a computerised functional costing system (introduced in April 1983 and still being developed);

(c) a system of local budgets, targeted for implementation in regional offices and prison Department establishments from 1st April 1986 — to give greater responsibility to local management for the effective control of expenditure;

(d) establishment of a small Efficiency Branch which is currently conducting a review of personnel work in the prison service: the Branch will be responsible for identifying and taking forward other efficiency initiatives throughout the prison service;

(e) a strategy study of the information technology needs of the prison service over the next decade has been completed and studies are being undertaken in several specific areas in which computers can make significant improvements in operational efficiency and management effectiveness.

RAF Molesworth

46. Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has had a request from the chief constable of Cambridgeshire to increase his establishment due to the extra demands of policing RAF Molesworth.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Cambridgeshire police authority has not applied for any permanent addition to its establishment but it has recently applied for five additional police posts on a supernumerary basis. My right hon. and learned Friend is considering the application in the light of advice from Her Majesty's Inspector of Constabulary, and the police authority will be informed of the outcome as soon as possible.

Life Sentence Prisoners

47. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number on 28 February of people serving life sentences in prisons in England and Wales.

Mr. Mellor: According to the records held centrally, which are approximate, on 28 February 1985 about 2,020 persons in Prison Department establishments in England and Wales were serving life sentences, including custody for life and detention during Her Majesty's pleasure or for life under section 53 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933.

51. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average length of time a life prisoner now serves.

Mr. Mellor: The average time served under sentence in Prison Department establishments in England and Wales by those first released on licence from life sentences in 1984 was about 10½ years. There are wide variations in the periods served in custody from which this average is calculated and it does not take into account any time that may have been served in other custodial care before entering a Prison Department establishment. This average excludes those persons who have died in custody or been discharged for other reasons. Also it does not fully reflect the longest periods likely to be served by some of those given life sentences following the abolition of capital punishment in 1965, who have not yet been released.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many life sentence prisoners in the special categories created in October 1983 have been reviewed by the Home Office for parole eligibility under the new regulations.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if any life sentence prisoners in the special categories created in October 1983 have been referred either to the local review committee or the Parole Board for consideration for parole; and if he will state the results of any deliberations.

Mr. Mellor: The Parole Board has considered 14 such cases since 11 October 1983, all of which had previously been considered by the local review committee. In no case did the board recommend the prisoner's release on licence.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what preparation a life sentence prisoner receives in the last two years of a sentence prior to release.

Mr. Mellor: Life sentence prisoners with provisional release dates are prepared for release in a variety of ways, depending on the circumstances. Release is usually subject to the completion of a period in open conditions; and, in most cases, is also dependent on the satisfactory completion of a period on the pre-release employment scheme.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will now reconsider the cases of the four life sentence prisoners who were returned to closed conditions following his statement in October 1983 about parole policy.

Mr. Mellor: No.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the prisoners released in each of the years since 1960 after serving life sentences have since been convicted of further offences.

Mr. Mellor: Information on the reconvictions of those released on life licence in the years 1973 to 1983 is published in "Reconvictions and Recalls of Life Licensee:", Home Office statistical bulletin, issue No 3/85. Corresponding information for those released in previous years is not readily available.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the average length of custodial sentence by prisoners who were sentenced to life imprisonment and who were released in each of the years since 1960.

Mr. Mellor: The average time served under sentence in Prison Department establishments in England and Wales by those first released on licence from life sentences in 1980, 1982, 1983 and 1984 was about 10½ years and for those first released in 1981 was about 10 years. There are wide variations in the periods served in custody from which this average is calculated and it does not take into account any time which may have been served in other custodial care before entering a Prison Department establishment. This average excludes those persons who have died in custody or been discharged for other reasons.

Also it does not reflect the longest periods likely to be served by some of those given life sentences following the abolition of capital punishment in 1965, who have not yet been released. Corresponding percentages for earlier years could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Prison Officers (Overtime)

49. Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the amount of overtime worked by prison officers.

Mr. Mellor: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply which I gave to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Warwickshire, North (Mr. Maude) on 31 January at column 237.

Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis

50. Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis; what subjects were discussed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: I last met the commissioner on 25 March, when we discussed a range of issues related to policing in the metropolis arising from my recent meetings with right hon. and hon. Members for constituencies in the Metropolitan Police district.

Prisoners (Psychiatric Treatment)

53. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of the prison population have been diagnosed as being in need of psychiatric treatment; and of these how many are not receiving such treatment.

Mr. Mellor: The only available figures are the six-monthly returns from medical officers of prisoners whom they assess as suffering from a mental disorder as defined in part III of the Mental Health Act 1983. According to the census carried out on 31 December 1984, there were 282 such prisoners on that date. We are considering the need for research on the psychiatric characteristics of the prison population as a whole, including those who do not come within the terms of the Act. Substantial psychiatric resources are available for the treatment of prisoners who may be broadly described as mentally abnormal; it is for the medical officer concerned to decide what treatment is appropriate in a particular case.

Industrial Disputes (Police Operations)

55. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what operational lessons the police have learnt as a result of the miners' dispute; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given earlier today to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby).

Garage Forecourts (Alcohol Sales)

56. Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek powers to prohibit or discourage the granting of off licence sales for alcoholic beverages on premises situated on garage forecourts.

72. Sir William van Straubenzee asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any proposals for the amendment of the licensing laws relating to the sale of alcohol at petrol-filling stations.

Mr. Mellor: The Government are very much concerned about the dangers of drinking and driving and are, therefore, reviewing the matter.

Public Order Review

59. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will publish his Department's review of public order.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend will announce the conclusions of the review of public order law as soon as possible.

Multi-occupied Houses (Fire Precautions)

64. Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the code of practice for means of escape in case of fire in muti-occupied houses to be made available to local authorities.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We hope to publish the final version of the code of practice later this year after a consultation process involving interested organisations, including the local authority associations.

Naturalisation

65. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many naturalisation applications have been refused in each of the last three years; and how many concern women whose husbands are living abroad with no right of entry to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waddington: The total number of applications for naturalisation refused in each of the last three years is :

	Number of Applications
1982	1,121
1983	819
1984	1,247

The further information sought is not available.

Identity Cards

67. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent consideration has been given to the introduction of identity cards.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend receives suggestions from time to time that identity cards should be introduced but we do not consider that their introduction would be desirable.

Immigration Control (CRE Report)

68. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what conclusions he has come to regarding the recommendations put forward by the Commission for Racial Equality in its report on immigration control procedures.

70. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will now make a statement on the recent report by the Commission for Racial Equality on immigration control procedures.

73. Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to complete his study of the recommendations in the Commission for Racial Equality report on immigration control procedures.

Mr. Waddington: I refer the hon. Members to the reply I gave to a question from the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) on 28 February at column 248.

Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance he proposes to issue to officials in his Department in the light of the Commission for Racial Equality report on immigration control procedures.

Mr. Waddington: The instructions to staff were being reviewed, and a new approach to training being developed, when this report was published. The views expressed by the Commission for Racial Equality will be taken into account in pursuing this work.

Visiting Forces Act (Drug Offences)

69. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the cHome Department whether he will take steps to gather and publish annually the number of occasions on which visiting forces in Britain involved in drug offences contravening British law have claimed primary jurisdiction for their nationals under the Visiting Forces Act in a way which has removed them from the jurisdiction of British courts.

Mr. Mellor: We are not satisfied that the collection of this information would be cost-effective or serve any practical purpose.

Licensing Laws

75. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the Government have any plans to abolish the licensing laws.

Mr. Mellor: We have no such plans.

Crime Prevention

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to increase financial support for crime prevention schemes following the increase in both violent and non-violent crime revealed by his Department's 1984 statistics.

Mr. Brittan: Financial support for crime prevention schemes is provided through the urban programme. It has been increased from £3·2 million in 1983-84 to approximately £6·3 million for 1984-85.

45. Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what evidence he has to show that better crime prevention could lead to a reduction in burglaries and incidents of auto-theft.

57. Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent research has been undertaken by his Department into the contribution towards reducing crime levels which can be made by local crime prevention planning.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The crime prevention unit, which my right hon. and learned Friend established within the Home Office in November 1983, has undertaken a number of locally based research and development projects in conjunction with the police and other agencies into burglary, autocrime, and disorder associated with licensed premises. These projects have confirmed the value of locally planned initiatives against crime as recommended in the joint departmental circular on crime prevention of 30 January 1984. Reports on completed projects are available through the Home Office crime prevention unit.

48. Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to better assist victims of crime and encourage crime prevention.

Mr. Mellor: With regard to assistance for victims of crime, I refer the hon. Member to the recent Government reply (Cmnd. 9457) to the report of the Home Affairs Committee on compensation and support for victims of crime (HC 43). In addition, consideration is being given to possible improvements in the compensation powers of the criminal courts and in the arrangements for informing victims of the progress of prosecutions and for applying for compensation orders; legislation is to be introduced during the life of this Parliament placing the criminal injuries compensation scheme on a statutory footing; and the United Kingdom is to ratify shortly the European convention on the compensation of victims of violent crimes.

With regard to crime prevention, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given earlier today to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean).

Drinking and Driving

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent consideration he has given to the deterrent aspects of current drinking and driving legislation; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Current drinking and driving legislation, which is contained in the Road Traffic Act 1972, as amended by the Transport Act 1981, is designed to deter possible offenders both by the severity of the maximum penalties and by the increased effectiveness of enforcement by the police. The maximum penalty for driving with excess alcohol contrary to section 6 of the 1972 Act, is six months imprisonment or a £2,000 fine (level 5 on the standard scale) or both. Disqualification is obligatory, for a minimum of 12 months, or of three years where the offender has been convicted of the offence within the previous 10 years.

One of the major objectives of the changes enacted in 1981, which were brought into force on 6 May 1983, was to increase the likelihood of drunken drivers being detected and successfully prosecuted. This was achieved by simplifying the procedures to be used by the police at the roadside and subsequently at the police station, including evidential breath testing. Following the introduction of the new provisions both the number of roadside screening breath tests carried out and the number of successful prosecutions rose.

We will continue to keep the deterrent aspects of the legislation under review and my right hon. and learned Friend expects to receive shortly the report on the monitoring of evidential breath testing.

Winson Green Prison

Sir Reginald Eyre asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what improved arrangements will be made at Winson Green prison, Birmingham, for solicitors to conduct private interviews with prisoners awaiting trial.

Mr. Mellor: We are urgently seeking a way of improving the arrangements. I shall reply in full as soon as possible.

Radio Broadcasting

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether he intends to undertake a review of future development proposals in radio broadcasting; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether he intends that community radio stations will be subject to the same degree of regulation as British Broadcasting Corporation and independent local radio;

(3) whether he has any plans to alter the existing regulatory arrangements for radio broadcasting.

Mr. Giles Shaw: As outlined in the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) on 23 January at columns 417-18, the degree of regulation of community radio and its relationship with, and implications for, existing and prospective sound broadcasting services are among the matters which fall to be considered in the context of our study of how the development of community radio can best be taken forward. My right hon. and learned Friend hopes to make a further statement before long.

Terrorism

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will meet the Minister of the Interior of the other member states of the Council of Europe to discuss and co-ordinate counter-terrorist measures.

Mr. Brittan: The Government are working actively in a number of international groups to promote co-operation and co-ordination in counter terrorism.

Ministers of Justice of the Council of Europe passed a resolution on terrorism at their last meeting in Madrid in May 1984 which I attended. Since then a working group has been examining ways of building upon this; and we are playing a full and active role in the Group's deliberations. There are no immediate plans for a further meeting of Ministers of Justice of member states of the Council of Europe on this subject but I discuss it at my meetings with individual Ministers.

Identification Parades

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will now consider instructing the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to establish counting procedures for the number of informal identification parades completed each year in underground stations and public places;

(2) how many formal identification parades were undertaken by Metropolitan police officers in each year since 1979; how many of the suspects identified in this form were subsequently prosecuted; of this number how many were convicted and acquitted; and how many of those parades produced a false identification at the time of the identification parade where the suspect selected was an ordinary member of the public invited to stand in the identification parade;

(3) how many suspects were identified by informal identification procedures for each year since 1979; how many of those suspects were subsequently acquitted or not charged; how many false identifications were made at the time of the informal parade; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of the Police of the Metropolis that each occasion on which a formal or an informal identification parade is held is recorded in the local police station occurrence book. This information is not collected centrally and I see no justification for asking the Commissioner to do so in the future. The position is similar in provincial forces. However, a special survey conducted in the Metropolitan Police in 1982 and 1983 showed the following approximate results:

	Formal Parades	Informal Parades
1982	428	74
1983	430	131

Information about the outcome of cases which have involved an identification parade is recorded only in the papers relating to the individual case.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will consider advising the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to review the force general order on identification parades to tighten up procedures relating to informal identification parades to eliminate the opportunity for bias and error in identification.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis will be reviewing his force general orders on identification parades in order to meet the requirements of the code of practice on identification to be made under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

Departmental Expenses

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total cost to his Department of civil servants attending Standing Committee G considering the Local Government Bill.

Mr. Brittan: This information is not available.

Equal Opportunities Commission

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of the staff of the Equal Opportunities Commission is employed upon investigations and what proportion on purely administrative tasks.

Mr. Waddington: It is not possible to divide up the work of the Commission's staff in this way.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much has been spent by the Equal Opportunities Commission in each of the last three years on the employment of public relations consultants.

Mr. Waddington: Nothing so far, but I understand that the Commission has recently authorised expenditure of up to £8,000 on fees to public relations consultants.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost of the recruitment of the new chief executive of the Equal Opportunities Commission; and how much was paid to the recruitment consultants concerned.

Mr. Waddington: I understand from the Commission that the directly attributable costs of recruitment of the new Chief Executive are currently estimated at about £13,700, of which £7,728 represents fees to consultants.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of the Equal Opportunities Commission's expenditure is spent upon salaries, rent, rates, telephone, travel and other similar expenditure and what proportion is devoted to specific projects within the commission's terms of reference.

Mr. Waddington: I refer the hon. Member to the account of the Equal Opportunities Commission for 1983-84 which was presented to Parliament and ordered by the House of Commons to be printed on 23 October 1984 as Paper 631.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to produce an information pack for schools on the Metropolitan police, and their duties to the public; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. The Metropolitan police has already produced a range of material providing information about the role and duties of the police, which is used in support of the wide ranging programme of activities with junior and secondary schools.

Nationality Fees

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it is his intention not to increase nationality fees as from 1 April.

Mr. Brittan: I have today written to my hon. Friend confirming that the Government's policy of full cost recovery will be met for the next 12 months by maintaining all fees at the levels set in the British Nationality (Fees) Regulations (SI 1984 No. 230) in April last year. In real terms these fees are broadly the same as those charged in the mid-1970s. The Government believe that this decision will benefit all potential applicants. A copy of the budget for the nationality operation in 1985-86 has been placed in the Library of the House.

Local Radio

Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the extension of the independent local radio network.

Mr. Brittan: The third report of the Home Office local radio working party, published in 1980, put forward proposals for the further development of local radio. In the light of comments on the report, my noble Friend the Viscount Whitelaw approved in principle in 1981 the provision of independent local radio services at a number of additional locations, bringing the total of possible locations up to 70. My noble Friend noted, however, that full implementation of the proposals would take a number of years, and that there might need to be a degree of flexibility about the most suitable and practicable way of bringing a service to a particular area in the light of developments in the economy generally.

The payment of secondary rental by profitably independent local radio stations has enabled the Independent Broadcasting Authority (IBA) to provide a service to 51 of the 70 locations, leaving 19 approved but unserved areas. Necessary modifications to the rental structure and financial pressures on the independent local radio system have, however, significantly constrained the funds available to the IBA for extension of the network. Moreover, in the light of broadcasting and other developments in recent years, the authority takes the view that few of the unserved areas would now attract an advertising income sufficient to sustain an independent local radio station. Against this background, and as a means of bringing an independent local radio service to areas which would otherwise remain unserved, the IBA has proposed that:

(a) Services should in appropriate cases be provided by enlarging the catchment of neighbouring franchise areas. The extended area would be advertised as and when the contract for the relevant existing station is due to expire.

(a) The contractor for the new area should provide the means, by way of advance payment, to enable the IBA to install transmitting equipment and allied facilities for the extended area.

I accept the IBA view that unless some new approach is adopted, areas at present unserved are likely to remain so. I also agree that, provided that arrangements for forward funding can be developed between the IBA and the potential franchise holder, the extension of existing areas would help strengthen the viability of independent local radio as a whole. There is, of course, already some measure of association between radio stations in what were initially conceived as separate franchises. I also believe it necessary to canvas fully local opinion in the areas concerned. I have therefore approved in principle, subject to the results of this local consultation, the IBA's proposals to seek to extend over the next 12 months or so the Nottingham franchise to serve Derby; the Portsmouth franchise to serve Southampton; the Wolverhampton franchise to serve Shrewsbury-Telford; and the Reading franchise to serve Basingstoke-Andover. This will not preclude the setting up of separate ILR stations for the different localities in the future if circumstances permit.

So far as consultations are concerned, there is a statutory requirement on the IBA (section 19(3) of the Broadcasting Act 1981) to take such steps as appear to them appropriate to ascertain the opinions of the public in the relevant area about the service to be provided by the authority, and to take into account these opinions and any comments or suggestions about the service. The authority attaches particular importance to this process, and will take the opportunity to outline in more detail their intention to seek fresh investment and new directors from the new locality, and to require an appropriate measure of separate programming for different parts of the extended franchise area.

The revised arrangements however will not take effect if the consultation process shows them to be generally unacceptable locally. In such circumstances, the IBA would seek to re-let the existing franchise area only.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Namibia

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why Her Majesty's Government refuse to grant developmental aid to Namibia until the implementation of United Nationsa Security Council resolution 435.

Mr. Raison: Because to do so would imply recognition of South Africa's occupation of the territory which we regard as unlawful and would invite criticism that we were contributing towards the cost of this occupation by providing development assistance.

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government will grant developmental aid to Namibia following the recommendations of two independent parliamentary delegations which have visited Namibia in the current year.

Mr. Raison: No. We shall be ready to consider providing development assistance once Namibia has achieved internationally recognised independence.

TRANSPORT

A419/A417 (Traffic Statistics)

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has on traffic volumes on the A419-A417 link between the M4 and the M5 in the last five years.

Mr. Spicer: The following information is available in respect of traffic flows on the A419-A417 link, on the basis of 16-hour daily average flows, in respect of the locations indicated:

Speed Control Humps

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of applications received from local authorities throughout England for the construction of speed control humps; how many of these have (a) met and (b) failed to meet the criteria laid down in the relevant legislation; and if he is satisfied that the criteria are adequate to encourage local authorities to construct speed humps.

Mrs. Chalker: Local authorities do not need to apply to me for permission to construct road humps on their own roads. I am aware that some authorities have found the present regulations for new humps too restrictive. I am therefore in the process of revising them to allow greater flexibility, without prejudicing road safety.

Saltash Bypass

Mr. Hicks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his decision following the public inquiry in May 1984 about the proposed Saltash bypass section of the A38 trunk road improvements; when it is hoped work will commence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I am pleased to be able to announce the joint decision of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and myself to make the line, side roads and compulsory purchase orders in respect of this scheme in the terms in which they were published. We now intend to press ahead with the outstanding preparatory works and plan to start construction as early as practicable next year.

Midland Link Motorways

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Transport if any tests have been made on the fixing and integrity of the central reservation rails of the elevated sections of midland link motorways.

Mrs. Chalker: We have tested the central reservation rails on a number of sections of the midland link viaducts. We are continuing to replace any lengths of rail shown to be below strength.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Transport if any claims for work over the tender price have been received in respect of any contract for the repair of parapet walls and rails of elevated sections of midland link motorways.

Mrs. Chalker: The contractor for the Oldbury viaduct parapet rail repair has claimed on extension of time. This has not been agreed.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Transport if the specification for grout has been changed in any way for any contract for the repair of parapet walls and rails of midland link motorways since the tender period.

Mrs. Chalker: A marginal change to the specification for grout has been made during the course of the current contract.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many contracts have been let for the repair of parapet walls and rails of the elevated sections of midland link motorways; and what are the values of these contracts and the companies awarded them.

Mrs. Chalker: One contract has been awarded to McTay Construction Ltd. in the sum of £155,228·00 for the repair of parapet rails on Oldbury viaduct.

Departmental Expenses

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total cost to his Department of civil servants attending Standing Committee G considering the Local Government Bill.

Mrs. Chalker: This information is not available.

EMPLOYMENT

Industrial Injuries (Inquiries)

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the maximum and minimum periods between the report of a case of industrial injury to the Factories Inspectorate and the conclusion of the inspectorate's inquiry; and what recommendations he has made as to a reasonable period of time for such an inquiry.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Information on the period between the report of an industrial injury to the Factories Inspectorate and the conclusion of the inspectorate's inquiry is not readily available.

The length of the time taken to inquire into cases of industrial injury varies considerably for a number of reasons.

Factors which may lengthen an inquiry include complex technical investigation, tracing witnesses, and the possibility of prosecution.

I have made no recommendations as to a reasonable period of time for such an inquiry.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give, from the survey of youth training scheme providers reported to the last meeting of the Manpower Services Commission's youth training board, the number and proportion of mode A trainees who (a) are one year trainees only, (b) are apprentices or other long-term trainees and (c) are employees.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The following table, which is based on the survey of youth training scheme providers, shows both the proportion, and an estimate of the number, of mode A trainees on the scheme in March 1984 who were one year trainees only, apprentices or other long-term trainees and employees.

	Percentage of Trainees	Estimated Number of Trainees
One year trainees only	78	141,000
Apprentices and other long-term trainees	18	33,000
Employees (other than apprentices and long-term trainees)	4	7,000

Labour Statistics

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons were made redundant in Derbyshire in 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Alan Clark: The available information, relating to confirmed redundancies, is given in the following table:

Redundancies confirmed as due to occur in Derbyshire†*

	Redundancies
1983	6,494
1984	7,575

Notes:

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the average number of redundancies in the east midlands between 1977 and 1979 and between 1980 and 1982.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information, relating to confirmed redundancies, is available from table 2.30 of the labour market data section of the Employment Gazette, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list all the vacancies recorded at the jobcentres and professional and executive recruitment office in Leicester at the latest date for which the data are available.

Mr. Peter Morrison: On 8 February 1985, the latest date for which figures are available, there were 1,221 unfilled vacancies at the Leicester jobcentre and 127 at the professional and executive recruitment office. A full list of these vacancies could not be obtained without disproportionate cost.

However, information is collected on the number of unfilled vacancies held at the jobcentre according to the broad industrial and occupational category to which they belong. Details are as follows for the latest available dates. This information is not available for the vacancies held at the professional and executive recruitment office.

Programme vacancies are not analysed according to occupational and industrial categories.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give a breakdown by region of the number of people in employment, whole-time equivalent, in each of the years since 1977; and what percentage this figure represents of total work force in the region in each of those years.

Mr. Alan Clark [pursuant to his reply, 26 March 1985]: The following tables give the available information.

Table 1 gives, for the regions and dates specified, the civilian employed labour force (employees in employment plus the self-employed). Her Majesty's Forces, which are normally included in the employed labour force figures, are not analysed regionally.

Table 2 gives the figures in table 1 expressed as a percentage of the civilian working population (civilian employed labour force plus the unemployed).

Figures for part-time workers are included on a one-to-one basis and are not converted to whole-time equivalents as detailed information on the hours worked by part-time employees is not available.

Young Workers Exchange Programme

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish the numbers of young British workers obtaining places on the European Community young workers exchange programme; and if he is satisfied at the number of British workers by comparison with their European counterparts obtaining places on this programme.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: During the years 1979-1983 young people from the United Kingdom obtained 779 of 3,977 places allocated under the second programme of exchanges. I am satisfied that the UK is getting a fair share of the places allocated on this schemes.

Unions (Membership)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish in the Official Report such information as he has for the past five years showing the number of people belonging to trade unions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The available information was published on pages 28-30 of the January 1985 issue of Employment Gazette which is available in the Library.

Wages Councils

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Employment what recent representations he has received concerning the possible abolition of the wages councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend and I have received a number of representations this year. The great majority advocate either abolition or major reform of the wages council system. A consultative paper was issued on 21 March setting out broad options for the future of the councils seeking views by the end of May. Decisions will be taken when responses to the paper have been considered.

Community Programme

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many community programme places were being supported in the Leicester travel-to-work area for each of the last 12 months for which statistics are available; of these places, how many were full-time; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. Friend's statement on 21 March 1985 at columns 1024-5 about our plans to expand the community programme from 130,000 to 230,000 places by June next year. The numbers of filled places being funded under the community programme in particular travel to work areas is not readily available and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. Available information relates to Leicestershire and is as follows:

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of people on the community programme get jobs afterwards.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Sample survey evidence indicated that when interviewed eight months after leaving the programme a third of former participants had a job, and a further 5 per cent. were in training.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people are on youth training schemes within the city of Leicester; how many companies are supporting the youth training scheme in Leicester; and if he will give the number of companies and young people involved in each month since the scheme began.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Government Policy

Mr. John Townend asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement about the Government's policy on employment.

Mr. Tom King: I have today laid before the House the White Paper "EMPLOYMENT The Challenge for the Nation" (Cmnd. 9474).

This sets out the Government's views on what we all must do to help create jobs and reduce unemployment. The key contribution of Government is to create an economic climate in which enterprise can flourish; it can help to improve the labour market by encouraging better training and more flexibility; and it also provides special help for those worst affected by unemployment. But as the White Paper makes clear, the Government cannot do what the nation will not. It cannot on its own create jobs. Everyone including trade unions and individuals must share the responsibility for responding to change, so that new jobs will be created.

PRIME MINISTER

President Belaunde Terry (Press Conference)

Q56. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister from what sources, other than Her Majesty's ambassador in Lima, Her Majesty's Government received reports of the press conference held in Lima by President Belaunde Terry on 2 May 1982.

The Prime Minister: The authoritative report was the telegram from Her Majesty's ambassador in Lima. As my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs told the hon. Member on 1 March at column 300, this was sent at 0144 GMT on 3 May 1982.

European Day of Music

Q62. Sir David Price asked the Prime Minister how she intends to participate in the European Day of Music, Saturday 22 June.

The Prime Minister: Saturday 22 June has been designated by the European Music Year (UK) Committee as a day to celebrate amateur music-making, and musicians and schools are being encouraged to participate in large numbers. I have no plans to attend any specific event on that day, but hope to attend several events during the year.

Engagements

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 28 March.

Mr. Marlow asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 28 March.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 28 March.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 28 March.

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 28 March.

Mr. Leigh asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 28 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Phone Tapping

Mr. Cohen asked the Prime Minister if, pursuant to her answer of 5 March, Official Report, column 775, she will define what she means by the term accountable to Parliament in this context; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: It is an important part of my and my right hon. and learned Friend's duty to satisfy ourselves that the security service operates entirely within the letter and spirit of its directive. We are accountable to Parliament for that responsibility as for the discharge of our other duties, but in line with the policy which successive Governments have followed, it is not the practice to disclose detailed information about security matters.

Education Achievements

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Prime Minister to what Her Majesty's Government attribute the difference between the relative performance of pupils in Wales and in England in overall education achievements and in examination failure rates among pupils; and what Her Majesty's Government intend to do to remedy the situation.

The Prime Minister: The one significant difference between England and Wales is in the percentage of pupils leaving maintained schools with no GCE O-Level or CSE certificates. The difference has persisted for many years though the figure in both countries has fallen markedly since the raising of the school leaving age. One factor which seems likely to contribute to the higher Welsh figure is that the certificate of secondary education examinations take place in Wales after the Whitsun leaving date and so generally exclude pupils leaving at that time. It may also be that CSE is less valued in Wales and that Welsh schools have adopted a more restrictive policy of examination entry. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales has made plain his concern about the achievement of school pupils in Wales with the publication of a number of documents which have been discussed in detail with education authorities and others in recent years, and the Government has this week published the White Paper "Better Schools" (Cmnd 9469) which sets out its objective of improving standards generally and a programme for achieving that end.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Departmental Achievements

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list his Department's principal achievements since 1979.

Sir Keith Joseph: The over-riding objectives have been to raise standards at school of children of all abilities and to achieve better value for money throughout the education system. Since 1979 the proportion of children commencing education before the age of 5 has increased an the proportion staying on beyond 16 has also increased. Pupil-teacher ratios in primary and secondary schools have improved as have achievements in school at A level. Spending per pupil has increased in real terms an now stands at record levels.

The Government's principal achievements in respect to the schools are set out in the White Paper "Better Schools" (Cmnd. 9469) published on 26 March 1985.

In other parts of the education system the Government has prompted improvements in performance by:

In further education

Setting out and implementing important decisions for vocational education in the White Paper "Training for Jobs";

The formation of the Business and Technician Education Council with an important role in the preparation of skilled manpower;

Introducing the new Certificate of Pre-Vocational Education (CPVE) as an additional option in the range of courses preparing young people for the world of work, and available in both schools and colleges;

The establishment of a scheme of in-service training grants for further education lecturers;

The establishment of College-Employer Links Project (CELP) in eight LEAs, aimed at increasing colleges' responsiveness to employers needs and the awareness of the latter of college facilities;

Expanding the work of the further education unit, giving it new status and developing the presentation of its reports.

In adult and continuing education

Launching a programme (PICKUP) to promote provision of updating and broadening the skills of those in mid-career;

Establishing over 100 Local Collaborative Projects in which educational institutions and firms work in partnership to offer adult training and updating—a joint venture between PICKUP and the MSC within the Government's Adult Training Campaign;

Initiating a programme (REPLAN) for meeting more effectively the educational needs of unemployed adults;

Promoting the establishment of a national unit for the development of continuing education.

In higher education

Initiating a major debate, in consultation with others, on national higher education strategy into the 1990s;

The admission to higher education of record number of students;

Initiating a wide-ranging review of financial support for students in higher education;

Establishing the Educational Counselling and Credit Transfer Information Service (ECCTIS) in a pilot region; and (more recently) supporting the developments of a computer-aided careers guidance system for graduates;

Establishing the new National Advisory Body for Public Sector Higher Education and endorsing its plan for the continuation of the significant shift towards science and engineering and other vocational subjects, and for the more efficient use of constrained resources generally;

Providing resources for specific initiatives in engineering and technology, and particularly information technology; for "new blood" in the universities; and for the enhancement of equipment in selected centres of high quality research in the universities;

Appointing a Committee of Enquiry (under Sir Norman Lindop) to review academic validation procedures in the public sector of higher education;

Providing support for a programme of efficiency studies in the universities.

Generally in education

Publishing reports by Her Majesty's Inspectorate and introducing arrangements for more systematic follow-up action, and publishing the annual HMI Report on the effects of LEA expenditure policies;

The provision of grant of up to £30 million of expenditure in 1985-86 on selected activities of national education importance, as provided for under the Education (Grants and Awards) Act 1984;

Introducing new arrangements for decision-making and management within the Department, aimed at greater efficiency and value for money.

In science

Maintaining a level of funding for the Science Vote which has broadly kept up with general inflation;

Making available additional resources to help re-equip the best university research teams to the highest standards;

Making available additional funding to the Science Vote for the British Antarctic Survey; for top quality university research proposals; and for restructuring programmes designed to change the balance of the Research Councils' activities better to reflect current priorities and financial circumstances;

Initiating a substantial programme for research and training in information technology;

Initiating through the Advisory Board for the Research Councils and in consultation with the Science and Engineering Research Council a major review of United Kingdom involvement in high energy particle physics;

Encouraging the Research Councils to publish Corporate Plans which embody strategy reviews of their respective programmes.

Ethnic Minority Children

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out in the Official Report, in each of the last five years, public expenditure on the teaching of English to ethnic minority children; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: It is not possible separately to identify expenditure on the provision to ethnic minority children of English as a second language teaching since it is increasingly delivered in the context of normal lessons in the classroom.

As my right hon. Friend said in his statement on 14 March about the final report of the Swann committee, good practice in the teaching of English to children of Commonwealth origin, as endorsed by the committee, will continue to be supported by grants made by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966. Roughly half the local authority expenditure on education being supported by section 11 grants goes on the teaching of English as a second language. Figures for the last five years are as follows:

Financial year	Local authority educational expenditure supported by grant under section 11 £
1979-80	40,076,045
1980-81	53,715,772

Financial year	Local authority educational expenditure supported by grant under section 11 £
1981-82	56,592,291
1982-83	68,456,613
1983-84	74,736,446

School Curricula

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what measures have been taken since 1979 to encourage a reappraisal of the curriculum used in schools and in teacher training institutions to reflect the multi-racial nature of British society.

Mr. Dunn: A great deal of work has been undertaken in recent years by local education authorities, teacher training institutions and individual schools to take account of the ethnic diversity of British society. For the Government's part, my right hon. Friend described in his statement to the House on 14 March at column 451 the measures being adopted in the curriculum and teacher training fields. Criteria for the approval of initial teacher training courses were issued in April 1984. They include requirements that students should be prepared to teach the full range of pupils whom they are likely to encounter in an ordinary school, with their diversity of ethnic and cultural origins, to respond flexibly to such diversity and to guard against preconceptions based on the race of pupils. Students should also be given a basic understanding of the society in which their pupils are growing up, with its cultural and racial mix. All courses of initial teacher training will be reviewed against the criteria over the next three to four years. My right hon. Friend will also be proposing to the local authority associations that from 1986-87 onwards the in-service training grants scheme should include training dealing with the need to respond to ethnic diversity. The Government has asked local education authorities to review their policies for the school curriculum, recognising among other factors the changing nature of our society, including its religious, ethnic and cultural diversity. This theme was explored in the booklet "The School Curriculum" issued in 1981 by my right hon. Friends the then Secretary of State and the Secretary of State for Wales.

Burnham Committee

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what complaints and representations he has received about the current membership pattern of the Burnham committee; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Department has received requests for a review of the teachers' panel of the Burnham primary and secondary committee from nine organisations and five individuals, and the matter has also been referred to by others writing on a variety of educational matters. Most argue that the changes in membership of the teacher unions since 1981 should be reflected in their representation on the Burnham committee. I believe that the time for a review of the committee's membership may come before long but I am not convinced that that time has yet arrived.

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will initiate discussions with teachers' organisations concerning the conventions of negotiating procedures relating to the Burnham committee.

Sir Keith Joseph: No.

Open University

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the overseas earnings of the Open University; and what information he has as to how they compare with similar earnings by other universities.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Open University's overseas earnings for the academic year 1984 were £0·418 million, almost all of which came from sales by the University's marketing company, Open University Educational Enterprises Ltd. This sum represented about 0·5 per cent. of the university's recurrent income for that year. The latest information available on overseas earnings for the other publicly funded United Kingdom universities is for the academic year 1982-83. The overseas earnings for that year were £96·4 million, most of which came from overseas student fees, the remainder from overseas research grants and contracts. This sum represented about 5 per cent. of the universities' total net recurrent income.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the percentage change in grant in real terms of (a) the Open University and (b) other universities between 1980-81 and 1986-87.

Sir Keith Joseph: The decrease in the Open University's recurrent grant in real terms (as defined in Cmnd. 9428) between the financial years 1980-81 and 1986-87 is estimated to be 11 per cent.

Comparing the Open University figure with levels of funding for other universities in Great Britain is complicated because of the changes in funding arrangements that have taken place. Adjusting for the increase made to recurrent grant to compensate the universities for alteration in the level of home tuition fees, the decrease in recurrent grant paid to universities in Great Britain through the University Grants Committee over the same period is estimated to be 10 per cent. No adjustment has been made to take account of other funding changes in this period.

Examination Results

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Department has reached its conclusions about possible methods of comparing examination results from different types of school system; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Diocesan Education Committee, Cornwall

Mr. Hicks asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the outcome of the application by the Cornwall local education authority on behalf of the diocesan education committee for a supplementary allocation of funds for the financial year 1984-85; and if he will list the projects together with the amount of grant aid that he has approved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The Department met in full Cornwall county council's request for an increase from £35,000 to £145,000 in their allocation for capital expenditure on voluntary aided and special agreement schools to enable additional grant at 85 per cent. of the expenditure involved to be paid in 1984-85. The projects which received grant-aid are:

Cornwall

Gipsies

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the estimated number of gipsy children of school age not receiving educational provision; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: It was estimated in 1983 that there were between 12,000 and 15,000 travellers' children of school age in England. Of these, the evidence gathered by Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools and set out in the HMI discussion paper "The Education of Travellers' Children", published in 1983, suggested that between 40 and 50 per cent. of primary aged children may have been attending school whilst as few as 10 per cent. to 15 per cent. of secondary age children were thought to be registered at school. Since the publication of that document a number of LEAs have reviewed their provision for travellers' children in the light of it.

ENERGY

Departmental Achievements

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list his Department's principal achievements since 1979.

Mr. Peter Walker: My Department's objectives and principal achievements were described last year in my reply to the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) at columns 92-94.

Since then we have continued to make encouraging progress. Our policies have helped to make 1984 a record year for oil and gas exploration and development in the North Sea, and the North Sea contribution to United Kingdom employment has been further expanded:

—our offshore supplies industry has had one of its most successful years ever, with United Kingdom-based industry taking a 74 per cent. share, worth £2·65 billion, of total UKCS orders. We are continuing with our major initiatives in the export field;

—a record number of exploration and appraisal wells were drilled;

—a record number of North Sea projects were approved;

—a record demand for offshore licences has been attracted by the ninth licensing round;

—net additions to our remaining proven and probable gas reserves have increased our confidence that indigenous resources can satisfy most of our needs for the remainder of this century.

The energy efficiency campaign is resulting in a upsurge of interest and activity in energy efficiency measures. There has for example been a 50 per cent. increase in the take-up of extended survey grants, a 33 per cent. increase in savings under our demonstration scheme and a 30 per cent. expansion of our voluntary homes insulation projects which have now treated some 100,000 homes.

The sale to the private sector of the British Gas interest in the Wytch Farm oilfield and the flotation of Enterprise Oil have been successfully carried through. We have announced our intention to abolish the British National Oil Corporation.

With Government support, the electricity and coal industries have enabled the electricity system to withstand a year-long coal strike without power cuts and with only limited damage to the rest of British industry.

We continue to encourage the energy nationalised industries in their efforts to greater efficiency and for the second year running, price increases will be less than the rate of inflation. A new financial target and performance aim has been agreed for the electricity supply industry for the years to 1987-88.

We have announced our intention of introducing legislation to enable the UKAEA to move onto a more commercial footing by operating as a trading fund from April 1986.

The management of energy research and development has been strengthened by the formation of a unified research and development budget and an expanded role for the advisory committee on research and development for fuel and power (ACORD).

NORTHERN IRELAND

Archbishop O'Connor

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he, or any Ministers, or personnel within the Northern Ireland Office, met Archbishop O'Connor of New York when he made a fact-finding visit to Northern Ireland in 1984 as the guest of Cardinal O'Fiaich.

Mr. Scott: Yes; my right hon. Friend met the archibishop with other American bishops on 22 October 1984. They were also given factual briefing by officials.

NHS Prescriptions

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what figures are available to indicate, by convenient district units, the number of National Health Service prescriptions issued in each of the past five years;

(2) what figures are available to indicate, by convenient district units, the number of National Health Service prescriptions issued in each of the past five years to patients who were exempted from prescription charges.

Mr. Chris Patten: The available information is as follows:

Voluntary Bodies (Grants)

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a list of those voluntary bodies which received grants under class C3 from the Northern Ireland Department of Health and Social Services; and if he will list the amounts received in each case for the last five years.

Mr. Chris Patten: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Ancillary Workers (Bursaries)

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he takes to ensure that bursaries available for the training of social workers, radiographers, occupational therapists, chiropodists and dental students, from funds provided by his Department, are taken up; and if he will take steps to ensure that there is no shortfall in the intake of students for these courses next year.

Mr. Chris Patten: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Radiation (Disease Patterns)

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will establish an expert committee to study patterns of disease which have a possible association with radiation.

Mr. Chris Patten: I have today announced the establishment of such a committee. It will be chaired by Professor Lowry, head of the Department of Oncology and Cancer Studies at Queen's university, Belfast and the remaining membership will comprise Professor Bridges of the Department of Haematology, Professor Nevin of the Department of Medical Genetics and Dr. Blaney of the Department of Community Medicine, all Queen's University. The terms of reference of the committee will be "to assemble and analyse epidemiological data in Northern Ireland on the patterns of disease which have a possible association with radiation".

I have asked the committee to submit a progress report by the end of March 1986.

Local Elections

Mr. W. Benyon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has anything to add to the statement made by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Chelsea (Mr. Scott), on 7 March, Official Report, column 1233, regarding responsibility for the legislation governing local elections in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: Paragraph 11 of schedule 2 to the Northern Ireland Constitutional Act 1973 provides that local government elections in Northern Ireland are an excepted matter. I regret that I gave a contrary impression during the debate on 7 March 1985 on the Local Elections (Northern Ireland) Order 1985 at column 1233.

Scheduled Offences

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish in the Official Report for the years 1984 and 1985 to the nearest convenient date the number of persons charged with scheduled offences whose cases were concluded and who were (a) charged with scheduled offences and pleaded guilty, (b) charged with scheduled offences and pleaded not guilty, (c) found guilty of scheduled offences and (d) found not guilty of scheduled offences having pleaded not guilty.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 25 March 1985, c. 34]: The following information relates to those persons whose cases proceeded to trial for scheduled offences. For 1984 these figures are respectively (a) 433, (b) 81, (c) 471, (d) 43. The equivalent figures for January 1985 are (a) 45, (b) 7, (c) 49, (d) 3.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Constant Attendance Allowance

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) on 18 March, Official Report, columns 380-1, how many fee-paid medical practitioners carry out the medical examinations for constant attendance allowance generally and in Wales; what is the average number of such examinations carried out by each weekly, generally and in Wales; and what extra training such medical practitioners receive, initially and on a continuing basis, to enable them to carry out such examinations and to complete the appropriate forms of application for this benefit.

Mr. Newton: The number of fee paid medical practitioners who carry out examinations for attendance allowance in Great Britain is 2,167. The average number of examinations carried out by each is 115 annually. In Wales there are 223 such medical practitioners who carry out 150 examinations each on an annual basis. Newly recruited medical practitioners are given a training session. The first reports are monitored and further advice given if needed. All are monitored regularly every six months. Additional advice and training are given as needed.

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of reports of medical examinations for constant attendance allowance carried out by his Department's appointed and trained general practitioners are considered either inadequate or inappropriate when monitored by his Department's regional medical officers and the Attendance Allowance Board during consideration of such applications for benefit.

Mr. Newton: I am unable to answer in the form requested as records of reports from the examining medical practitioners which are considered inadequate are not kept. However, the number of examining medical practitioners whose reports were considered to need improvement were 208.

In the six months to end of February 1985, letters of advice were sent to 122 and retraining given to 78 of these doctors. Eight are no longer used.

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many general medical practitioners specially trained by his Department to carry out medical examinations of applicants for the constant attendance allowance have had their contract terminated in each of the years since 1979 to date (i) generally and (ii) in Wales; and if he will detail the reasons for such practitioners no longer being asked to carry out such examinations.

Mr. Newton: Medical practitioners who examine for attendance allowance do not have a contract. The number no longer used in each year since 1979 is not known and could be produced only at disproportionate cost.

The number of examining medical practitioners no longer used in Wales in the past year is 10, two of them because of inadequate reports and eight reaching the age of 72 years or retiring because of ill-health.

Housing Benefit

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has recently received from elderly citizens, individually and through their reperesentative organisations, regarding the changes in housing benefits; and if he will make a statement as to how retirement pensioners have been affected by such changes in Government policy.

Mr. Whitney: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) on 18 March at column 378. The changes introduced in November were carefully designed to ensure that the poorest were protected. Those receiving supplementary benefit or with incomes below the housing benefits needs allowance — for pensioners up to about £10 a week above basic retirement pension levels—were not, in most cases, affected by the changes. For the great majority of pensioner householders the average loss in November will have been 32p a week.

Social Security Reviews

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why his Department has commissioned an opinion poll on the subject of the reviews into the social security system; and what questions are being asked.

Mr. Newton: The poll was commissioned in order to add to the wide-ranging evidence received by the review teams and to information available from past surveys about social security. Questions and results will be made available when the conclusions and proposals arising from the review are published.

Chiropodists

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will introduce legislation to establish minimum standards of theoretical and practical training to be attained by persons wishing to practise under the title chiropodist; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hon. Member's question touches on one aspect of the question of protection of title for all professions supplementary to medicine (including chiropody) and I refer him to my reply to him on 27 March.

Health Authorities (Strategic Plans)

Dr. Owen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what growth targets have been given by his Department to regional and district health authorities in preparing their strategic plans for 1985 to 1994; how many of these authorities have complied with these targets; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Regional health authorities are required to prepare their strategic plans using the long-term resource assumptions set out in Health Circular (83) 12 a copy of which is in the Library. We will be reviewing regional plans in the light of these and other requirements when they are all received later this year.

Kidney Donors (Campaign)

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what success has been achieved in his Department's campaign to promote the donation of kidneys; if he will introduce a national scheme akin to the computerised North-West Kidney Lifeline scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: In the 12 months following the launch in February 1984 of our campaign to increase public awareness of the benefits of organ transplantation and to promote the donor card scheme, over 12·5 million new donor cards have been issued and the number of kidney transplants performed have risen by 30 per cent. over the previous year. Further publicity to maintain the campaign's momemtum has been arranged.

We are reviewing the achievements and experiences of the North-West Kidney Lifeline scheme, but it is too early to say whether it might be suitable for application outside its present area of operation.

NHS Domestic Services (Bolton)

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the proposed agreement between Bolton district health authority and Spinneys meets the criteria of competition he has laid down; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have not yet been sent any proposed agreement between Bolton health authority and Spinneys. We expect to receive details of any proposal from the regional health authority when they have been finally drawn up.

Death Grant

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has had any recent discussions with interested organisations about the level of the death grant; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I met a deputation from the Dignity in Death Alliance to discuss the death grant on 28 February. The subject was also raised by representatives of the Pensioners' National Convention at their meeting with the Prime Minister on 7 March and by a delegation from Pensioners' Voice whom I met on 20 March. The grant is among the matters being considered in the current social security review.

Suicides

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many girls aged under 16 years committed suicide in England and Wales during the period 20 December 1984 to 11 January 1985; and in which county each of these suicides occurred.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is not yet available. However the numbers of suicides occurring in the period specified, but registered in either December 1984, January or February 1985, will be available by about June 1985. Because of the time required to complete inquests, final figures will not be available until about Spring 1986.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many girls under the age of 16 years have committed suicide in each of the years since 1967 in England and Wales.

Mr. John Patten: Information in the exact form requested can be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However the numbers of deaths from suicide for females aged under 15 years of age are routinely available and are given in the table.

Drug Trials

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will consider introducing legislation to govern the trial of new drugs on healthy volunteers.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have no plans to do this at present. The Medicines Commission concluded last year that legislation was not required but recommended that professional bodies and the Association of British Pharmaceutical Industries revise and update their existing guidance to members. I understand this is being done.

In Vitro Fertilisations

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what persons or organisations were consulted by his Department before they gave advice that a fourth month time limit on fertilisations in vitro would not inhibit continued use of this technique.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am advised that no advice has been given by our Department in these terms. I am writing to the hon. Member.

Miners (Supplementary Benefit)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, in cases where miners returning to work have suffered compulsory deductions from a week's wages in excess of 50 per cent., he will take steps to ensure payment of supplementary benefit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Persons in full-time work are excluded from receiving supplementary benefit, though this exclusion does not apply for the first 15 days in employment. Thereafter benefit can be paid only in certain situations, defined in the Supplementary Benefit (Urgent Cases) Regulations 1981, and will normally be recoverable. Net earnings are treated as a resource in the calculation of benefit when there is entitlement. Regulation 10(4) of the Supplementary Benefit (Resources) Regulations 1981 lays down what deductions are to be made from gross earnings in calculating net earnings for this purpose.

The application of these regulations to the circumstances of particular cases is a matter for the independent adjudicating authorities.

NHS Prescriptions (Season Ticket)

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will permit patients who currently obtain drugs prescribed under the National Health Service by holding a season ticket to continue to obtain the same drugs during the life of that season ticket, if specifically prescribed by their National Health Service general practitioner.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The season ticket is prepayment in lieu of NHS prescription charges it offers one "bargain" charge for a period of time to a patient who might otherwise pay more by way of numerous separate prescription charges for all his medical needs. It can never have been regarded as a purchase of entitlement to particular medicines. Friom 1 April it will cover the prescription charge for any medicine available on the NHS but not the private dispensing costs of medicines not so available.

Advisory Committee Report

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he can now announce when the Social Security Advisory Committee will be publishing its third report.

Mr. Tony Newton: I understand that the third report of the Social Security Advisory Committee, covering its work in 1984, was published yesterday. Copies are available in the Vote Office.

Board and Lodging Payments

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the average weekly supplementary benefit payment, exclusive of personal allowances, paid to (a) single people, (b) couples without dependent children, (c) single parents with one dependent child, (d) single parents with two dependent children, (e) single parents with three or more dependent children, (f) couples with one dependent child, (g) couples with two dependent children and (h) couples with three or more dependent children who were assessed as boarders living in (i) private rented acommodation, (ii) bed and breakfast accommodation and hotels, (iii) hostels and (iv) common lodging houses in (a) December 1982 and (b) December 1983; and if he will give this information for Great Britain as a whole, and for each social security region.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 25 March 1985, c. 86-7]: Information is not available in the form requested; and reliable information for couples and claimants with children cannot be given. The available information is set out in the table:

Mortality Statistics

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has concerning the numbers of women aged (a) under 16, (b) under 20, (c) under 25 and (d) in total who have died in each of the years since 1965 through conditions attributed to the use of the contraceptive pill.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 11 March 1985, c. 75]: A lot of information has been published on investigations into the mortality of users of the contraceptive pill. We also have available information from death certificates and adverse drug reactions reports submitted to the Committee on Safety of Medicines.

However a check of all this information confirms that none is sufficient to allow firm conclusions to be drawn about the numbers of deaths which were caused by the pill.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

RAF Basic Trainer

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what advance warning was given to the Stock Exchange of the announcement concerning the Royal Air Force trainer aircraft.

Mr. Pattie: None.

British Overseas Trade Board

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is satisfied with the change in the number of small companies as opposed to large companies that have received support under the overseas projects fund and the market entry guarantee scheme since 1979.

Mr. Channon: Information is not readily available to show how many small firms have been supported by the overseas projects fund since 1979. But many small firms have certainly benefitted from the OPF as suppliers to successful larger contractors.

An analysis of the market entry guarantee scheme based on turnover figures and adjusted for inflation, suggests that in 1979 some 36 per cent. of companies receiving support under MEGS could be classified as small companies; in 1984 the figure was some 54 per cent. In February 1984, the Department reduced the minimum funding level under MEGS to improve the scheme's attractiveness for small companies.

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the reallocation of British Overseas Trade Board resources since 1979, reducing support for overseas trade fairs and increasing support for the overseas projects fund and the market entry guarantee scheme, has resulted in an increase in the number of small manufacturing companies exporting their products.

Mr. Channon: I expect the changes to BOTB services since 1979 to have helped many small manufacturing companies to export their products. The market entry guarantee scheme is aimed very specifically at helping smaller firms; the support for trade fairs, gross expenditure on which from 1979 to date has been broadly maintained in real terms, also helps many small firms seeking major contracts, benefits a large number of smaller firms associated with the work as subcontractors and in other ways. This scheme's share of the overall budget this year is less than that in 1979-80.

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations his Department has received from the Building Materials Export Group in response to the British Overseas Trade Board consultation document issued in December 1984 about proposed changes to the British Overseas Trade Board budget.

Mr. Channon: A number of representations have been received from the building materials export group. The British Overseas Trade Board has taken full account of the views expressed by the group in deciding how best to use the funds available. The results will be announced shortly.

Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations his Department has received in response to the British Overseas Trade Board consultation document issued in December 1984 about proposed changes to the British Overseas Trade Board budget.

Mr Channon There has been a wide ranging response to the British Overseas Trade Board's consultation document both from representative bodies and from individual firms. The BOTB has taken full account of views expressed in deciding how best to use the funds available. The results will be announced shortly.

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is satisfied that the reallocation of the British Overseas Trade Board resources since 1979, reducing support for overseas trade fairs and increasing support for the overseas project fund and the market entry guarantee scheme, has led to an increase in United Kingdom manufactured exports as a proportion of total United Kingdom exports.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to the reply, 27 March 1985]: I would expect that the changes to BOTB services since 1979 have benefited both manufactured and invisible exports equally, particularly those from smaller firms. But it is not possible to quantify precisely the effects of the changes. All three schemes mentioned are open to all firms, whether manufacturing or services sector.

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied that the interests of small companies are adequately represented on the British Overseas Trade Board.

Mr Channon [pursuant to the reply, 27 March 1985]: Yes. Of the 17 businessmen on the British Overseas Trade Board, three are chairmen or managing directors of small firms. A fourth pays special attention to the views of the chamber of commerce movement which represents many small firms. These four members make up the business representation on the finance and general purposes committee which advises the board on the allocation of resources and the export services.

Weighing Machines

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has made a comparison of the accommodation and overhead costs he charges for type approval of weighing machines with the accommodation and comparable overheads of a private industrial company doing business in central London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Multi-Fibre Arrangement

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give a breakdown for each of the multi-fibre arrangement categories 1-123 of (a) the number of items and (b) the total value of items in each category which have been imported in each of the last five years for which figures are available from (i) European Economic Community countries and (ii) low-cost countries.

Mr. Channon: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Textile Imports

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what has been the percentage annual increase in the total value of textile imports from (a) low-cost and (b) other developed countries in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available;

(2) what has been the total value of textile imports from (a) low-cost and (b) other developed countries in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available; and what percentage of the total annual value of such imports these totals represent in each of those years.

Mr. Channon: The information which can be provided without excessive cost is set out in the following table. The definition of textiles is narrower than that normally used.

Ships (Credit Scheme)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will place in the Library the documentation made by Her Majesty's Government on the talks on a European Economic Community home credit scheme for ships built in European Economic Community yards.

Mr. Butcher: No formal proposal has been put forward by the European Commission about this. The Commission is currently considering with member states the possibility of increasing the incentives for EC shipowners to place orders in Community shipyards.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will place in the Library a copy of the document submitted to him by the General Council of British Shipping on changes in the credit arrangements for ships built in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Butcher: Replies were given jointly by the GCBS and BS to a discussion paper put to them by my Department in 1983 concerning possible changes that might be made to these credit arrangements. However, it is not Departmental policy to publish private documents.

Privatisation and Government Procurement

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what procedures are followed when major Government announcements on procurements are made during the middle of an offer for sale of Government-owned shares in companies which are affected thereby.

Mr. Butcher: Steps are taken to ensure that any prospectus for an offer of Government-owned shares in a company reflects any Government decisions material to the company.

British Aerospace

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is calculated to be the loss in the value of the Government's shareholding in British Aerospace plc as a result of changes in the market value between 21 and 22 March.

Mr. Butcher: The British Aerospace share price stood at £3.90 at the close on 21 March and at £3·80 at the closure on 22 March. On the basis of these prices, the Government's shareholding had a stock market value of approximately £377·7 million and £386 million on the respective dates, a different of £9·7 million. On 26 March the share price closed at £3·98, giving a value for the Government shareholding on that date of approximately £385·5 million, a rise of £7·8 million above the value on 21 March.

EC (Industrial Council)

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the European Community Industrial Council held on 26 March.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Council, at which I represented the United Kingdom, confirmed its firm adherence to the deadline of 31 December 1985, beyond which no further payments of aid to the steel industry will be allowed. It agreed a proposal for amendments to the steel aids code, which will extend the deadline for the payment of operating aid from 31 December 1984 to 31 December 1985, and will permit member states to increase the total sums of aid beyond the levels previously fixed in June 1983. All aids will continue to be subject to authorisation by the Commission under the conditions set out in the aids code, extra aids will be available either for financial restructuring or for costs incurred because of capacity reductions.

The Council also discussed the ferrous scrap market. Most member states accepted that, although prices had risen over the last few months, there was no underlying shortage of supply and controls would therefore be inappropriate. However, ministers agreed that a study group should be set up. The Commission will prepare a paper on Spain and the Community scrap market.

The Council indicated acceptance of the Commission's proposals for small increases in the minimum prices for certain steel products. Some member states argued for higher increases, but I supported the Commission's proposal, taking account of the interests of steel users as well as steel producers.

In a discussion on EC/US steel relations, the Council agreed a firm declaration on recent United States protectionist moves on steel imports.

I welcomed a further Commission report on advanced manufacturing technology, stressing the urgency of work in this field, particularly on standards.

South Africa (Code of Conduct)

Mr. Bendall asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will report on how British companies have complied with the European Community's code of conduct for companies with interests in South Africa during the 12-month period to 30 June 1984.

Mr. Channon: By 20 March 1985, 171 companies had submitted reports to the Department under the code of conduct. Copies of the reports, and of the Department's analysis and summary, have been placed in the Library of each House. These documents may also be inspected at the Department's library, at the British embassy in Pretoria, at the British consulate-general in Johannesburg, and at the British consulates in Cape Town and Durban.

Reports were received from the great majority of British companies with interests in South Africa, and the Government are grateful to companies for their continued efforts in reporting. The majority of companies have continued to make progress in meeting most of the code's requirements, and the returns again showed evidence of British companies' increased dealings with the emerging trade unions in South Africa, and a greater commitment to training, education and community projects. The Government will continue to urge companies to comply fully with the code.

Kearney and Trecker Marwin Ltd.

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the Government's interests in Kearney and Trecker Marwin Ltd.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Government have disposed of their interest in Kearney and Trecker Marwin Ltd. to Vickers plc who are now the sole shareholder. Those interests consisted of 900,000 non-voting preference shares and an unsecured loan to KTM of £1 million, both arising from a refinancing agreement made in 1976 under S8 of the Industry Act 1972. The shares were transferred for a nominal sum and the loan for £250,000 in each case representing a considered view of the commercial value.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

El Salvador

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what criteria he proposes to judge the fairness of the forthcoming elections in El Salvador.

Mr. Renton: We shall judge the fairness of the elections not only by the degree of genuine choice we assess the voters have been given, but also in the light of the particular circumstances of El Salvador, among them the campaign by insurgents to disrupt polling.

Latin America

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps have been taken by the European Economic Community to revise trade agreements with Latin America as a result of the expected accession of Spain to the Community.

Mr. Rifkind: The Community has only a trade agreement with Uruguay and economic and commercial co-operation agreements with Mexico and Brazil. An economic and commercial co-operation agreement with the Andean pact signed in 1983 has still to be ratified by some Andean pact members. There are no plans at present for the Community to revise these agreements to take account of Spanish accession.

Peru

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on current relations between her Majesty's Government and Peru.

Mr. Renton: We enjoy friendly relations with Peru and maintain frequent contacts on a wide range of subjects.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to Peru regarding violations of human rights.

Mr. Renton: The Peruvian Government participate in the work of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights and is well aware of our views on human rights issues. We understand that the Peruvian Government have responded to allegations of human rights abuses by inviting the UNCHR working group on involuntary and enforced disappearances to investigate the situation for themselves.

Assistance (Refusal)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will now list those countries to which the United Kingdom refuses to supply (a) military aid or assistance and (b) financial or other such aid.

Mr. Luce: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Chile

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action the Government have taken regarding individual cases of human rights violation in Chile; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The Chilean Government are very well aware of our concern about reports of human rights violations in Chile.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent visit by officials from his Department to Chile, stating in particular (a) the reason for the visit, (b) the persons met on the visit, (c) whether human rights issues were discussed and with whom, (d) whether military aid or co-operation was discussed and with whom, (e) whether any invitations to Chilean persons were extended and (f) whether any invitations to Ministers were extended by the Chilean authorities.

Mr. Renton: A senior Foreign and Commonwealth Office official visited Chile from 26-28 February during a tour of four South American countries. His purpose was to obtain first hand impressions about the current situation in Chile and the prospects for an early return to democracy. He met a wide range of Chilean opinion including members of the Government, democratic opposition parties, trade union leaders and human rights groups. The theme of human rights was a point of special concern in all his conversations. No invitations for visits, in either direction, were extended.

Council of Ministers

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report a statement of forthcoming business in the European Community Council of Ministers.

Mr. Rifkind: The usual written forecast was deposited in the House earlier today. At present three meetings of the Council of Ministers are planned for April.

The Agriculture Council is due to meet on 1-4 April and on 22-23 April to continue discussion on the Commission's price proposals for 1985.

The Foreign Affairs Council is expected to meet on 29-30 April to consider any follow-up action required in the light of the 29-30 March European Council. It will also discuss any outstanding issues in the enlargement negotiations; the Commission's proposals on integrated Mediterranean programmes and guidelines for negotiations with the Community's Mediterranean partners to take account of the effects of enlargement. Ministers may also consider the draft negotiating mandates for the second European Community-Yugoslavia financial protocol and for a European Community-Central America co-operation agreement.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Private Members' Bills

Mr. White asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will list the sponsors of those private Members' Bills which received the Royal Assent in each year since 1955.

Mr. Biffen: The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

WALES

Nuclear Waste Contamination

Mr. Harvey asked the Secretary of State for Wales if there is any evidence of contamination along the north Wales coast from nuclear waste emitted by the Sellafield nuclear plant.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Routine monitoring of coastal waters has been carried out for many years to ensure that discharges of radioactive waste, from whatever source, do not pose a threat to the public. Results, published annually by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in its aquatic environment monitoring report on radioactivity in surface and coastal waters of the British Isles, show that any exposure of members of the public would be small in relation to the international safety limit and there is therefore no evidence to suggest that people using the beaches, for example, are at risk.

Welsh Language

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether negotiations with the appropriate and interested bodies over the setting up of a Welsh language development organisation have been concluded; and if he will make a statement of his future plans as to Welsh language co-ordination in education.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: I am now considering the responses to my recent consultations on this subject and am not yet in a position to make an announcement.

Agriculture (Structure Plan)

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is now in a position to publish details of the new structure plan for the agriculture industry from the European Economic Community.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The new structures regulation was approved by the EC Council of Agriculture Ministers on 12 March 1985. We shall shortly be issuing a consultative document setting out our proposals for implementing the regulation.

Death Grant

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Wales what recent representations he has received from the Welsh Consumer Council regarding the level of the death grant; what response he is making; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: In August last year, I received from the Welsh Consumer Council a copy of a report published by the National Consumer Council on the future of the death grant. My response made it clear that substantive comments on the issues raised was a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services who is responsible for the administration of this grant.

Cancer Screening

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied with cancer screening facilities in Wales; and how many computer-based call and recall schemes exist in Wales, by area health authority.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Population based schemes of screening for cancer have been developed for only a small number of types of this disease. The best example of such a scheme is the cervical cytology service which is the only one to have been introduced nationally to cover an age/sex based section of the population. As I have already said in the reply on cervical cancer screening, given to the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) on 22 March at column 627, a working group is being set up to examine urgently the adequacy of the present provision of the service and necessary future developments. Some health authorities in Wales screen women for breast cancer, but because the relative effectiveness of different screening procedures is still under study there is no nationally agreed scheme. Health departments are currently funding trials and it is expected that the first results will be available in 1988. The small number of workers in high risk groups who have been, or are, exposed to certain carcinogens through their occupations are also screened under arrangements supervised by the Health and Safety Executive.

At present there are no computer based call and recall schemes in Wales, but I refer again to my answer to the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Williams asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many cases of, and deaths from, cervical cancer were reported in West Glamorgan, Wales, and the United Kingdom in each year since 1979; and what percentage of women received cervical cancer screening in each of these areas in each of these years.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information is given in the following table.

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983
West Glamorgan
Number of registrations of cervical cancer*	55	47	55	34	N/A

Information on the other countries of the United Kingdom is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretaries of State for Social Services, Scotland and Northern Ireland.

DEFENCE

Overseas Personnel (Training)

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Defence what checks are made on the past conduct of personnel chosen for military training in Britain from countries such as El Salvador; and if their personal record is a bad one, if the application is then rejected.

Mr. Lee: Candidates for places on military training courses in the United Kingdom are checked to ensure that they meet pre-course professional standards and conditions. Although assessment of their personal suitability is the responsibility of their own authorities, and it is obviously difficult to trace the whole background of the people concerned, we would naturally refuse to accept any candidate who did not meet the generally accepted standards on human rights.

RAF Upper Heyford

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is yet in a position to make a statement about the outcome of noise level testings in the proximity of RAF Upper Heyford.

Mr. Lee: The RAF Institute of Community Medicine has produced computer predicted contours and has taken validating measurements in the vicinity of RAF Upper Heyford. The results obtained are being carefully evaluated and a standard noise insulation grant scheme will be introduced if noise levels are shown to be above the qualifying level. It is to soon to say what the outcome of the evaluation will be.

USAAF (Green Flag Exercise)

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Defence which Royal Air Force aircraft recently participated in the United States air force's Green Flag exercise; and with what results.

Mr. Lee: Eight Tornado aircraft drawn from 9 and 27 squadrons are participating in Exercise Green Flag. In their deployment they have been supported by Hercules, Victor and VC 10 aircraft from the Air Transport Force. Exercise Green Flag continues until 30 March and it is therefore too early to comment on the results.

Greenham Common (Member's Correspondence)

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the hon. Member for Sunderland, North can expect to receive a reply to his letter dated 20 February, concerning an alleged shooting incident at Greenham Common on 12 February.

Mr. Heseltine: I have written to the hon. Member today.

British Aerospace (PC9)

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Defence when British Aerospace plc was informed that its final submission for the PC9 on 19 March was too late or otherwise unacceptable.

Mr. Butler: The British Aerospace submission of 19 March was received well after the closure date for final bids. There was no subsequent communication with British Aerospace until my right hon. Friend announced in the House on Thursday 21 March that we proposed to place the order for the new basic trainer with Shorts.

Stornoway Air Base

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what method will be used to supply the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation air base at Stornoway with aviation fuel.

Mr. Lee: Our original plans for the use of a single point mooring in Broad Bay are under review and other options are being considered. It is too early to indicate the outcome, but the local authorities will be fully consulted when our review is complete. We shall of course take into account representations already received.

Schools

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many private schools and how many state schools receive grants from his Department for the purchase of military equipment; if he will itemise the equipment and name the schools; and whether his Department also pays travelling allowances to pupils at these schools taking part in training exercises and camps both in the United Kingdom and overseas.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 14 March 1985, c. 204]: The Ministry of Defence does not provide grants to schools for the purchase of military equipment which is supplied according to laid down scales through the normal services systems. Grants are, however, made to cover minor administrative costs and training aids which are not available through the military supply chain. The number of schools involved is 57 state schools, 194 private, four voluntary aided and four maintained service schools (three in Germany and one in Cyprus). To itemise the equipment concerned could only be done at disproportionate cost.

Travel at public expense within the United Kingdom is limited to attendance on courses and for authorised training. Expenditure on travel outside the United Kingdom is made from non-public funds.

CIVIL SERVICE

Job Dispersal

Mr. Parry asked the Minister for the Civil Service (1) if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's current policy with regard to the dispersal of Civil Service jobs to (a) Merseyside and (b) Liverpool;

(2) what is his estimate of the number of Civil Service jobs which will be dispersed to (a) Merseyside and (b) Liverpool in 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Government are committed to carrying out the dispersal programme announced on 26 July 1979. That means 1,250 posts will be transferred to Merseyside. No provision was made for the transfer of posts to Liverpool.

To date, 1,064 of the posts designated for Merseyside have gone with the Home Office move having been completed in June 1983. Questions of detail concerning the timing of the remaining moves are matters for the Secretaries of State concerned.

Regional needs will continue to be taken fully into account should there be a need to locate new work or relocate existing work in the future.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Cash Limits

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give revised cash limits for 1984-85 which take account of the decision by some Departments not to seek supplementary provision to cover the carry-forward allowed under the end-year flexibility schemes.

Mr. Peter Rees: Under the end-year flexibility schemes announced in 1983, some 23 1984-85 cash limits were increased to allow for the carry-forward of underspend in 1983-84 — [31 July 1984, columns 189-92.] In the case of six voted cash limits, the relevant Departments have not sought parliamentary approval of the extra provision in a Supplementary Estimate. To keep the control figures in line, the cash limits are accordingly being reduced. A list is shown in the following table.

Revisions to 1984-85 cash limits resulting from the carry forward of capital underspend in 1983-84 not being required

EC (Payment Appropriations and Commitments)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if unused European Economic Community payment appropriations and commitments can be carried forward automatically from year to year.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Unused payment appropriations may be carried forward to the next financial year only, in accordance with article 202 of the treaty and article 6 of the financial regulation of 21 December 1977. Commitment appropriations may also be carried forward for a single financial year. Once a commitment has been entered into it remains in existence until liquidated. Appropriations relating to pay of staff members may not be carried over.

Special provisions apply to research and investment appropriations, as set out in Article 88 of the financial regulation.

Exchange Rate

Mr. White asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the real value of the pound sterling, compared with its present value, on 28 February 1974, 1975, 1976, 1977, 1978, 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information requested is as follows:

Real Sterling Exchange Rate Index
(Average 1975=100)

	February averages
1974	89·5
1975	98·5
1976	101·1
1977	94·8
1978	109·5
1979	107·0
1980	122·4
1981	136·6
1982	124·7
1983	112·5
1984	115·5
1984 September	110·5

Data Processing Staff

Mr. Warren asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement as to the reasons for proposing no salary increases in 1985-86 for data processing staff in the Civil Service and then withdrawing the proposals summarily.

Mr. Hayhoe: My hon. Friend is referring to the allowances paid to certain staff in the computing field. The proposal is that these allowances should increase by 4 per cent. But since in some respects the present arrangements for these allowances do not reflect current priorities in an area of fast moving technological change, we also proposed some changes in the context of the 1985 pay negotiations. Following representations from the union concerned, we agreed to withdraw certain aspects of the proposals and carry forward consideration of these matters outside of the pay negotiations. The union representing the staff concerned will be fully consulted about the future pattern of these allowances.

Company Cars

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what was the revenue raised by the taxation as a benefit of company cars in each of the past 10 years; and if he will estimate the likely yield for 1985-86;

(2) if he will consider raising the threshold to £10,000 for the taxation of company cars; and if he will estimate the ensuing change in annual revenue.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have replies as soon as possible.

European Monetary System

Mr. Soames asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what reasons the United Kingdom does not participate in the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave on 26 March 1985 to my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet).

Inland Revenue (Vacancies)

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many vacancies exist in the Inland Revenue by region and by grade at present and for each month over the past two years.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Development Land Tax

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what are the grades of the 80 staff in the Middlesborough development land tax office whose jobs will be lost as a result of the tax being abolished;

(2) at which valuation offices fewer staff will be needed as a result of the abolition of development land tax; and by how many at each;

(3) if he will give an undertaking that there will be no Civil Service redundancies arising from the abolition of development land tax.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Income Tax

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update, to take account of the 1985 Budget, the information on income tax reductions provided in his reply of 4 April 1984 to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), Official Report, columns 542-544.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer at what annual level of income a single person begins to pay less income tax than in 1979 following the Budget changes.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 27 March 1985]: A single man whose pay has increased in line with the national average will pay a smaller proportion of his earnings in income tax in 1985-86 than in 1978-79 unless his earnings in 1985-86 lie between £2,800 and £5,125 —that is, between about 27 per cent. and 50 per cent. of the average.

All those whose pay has risen in line with the national average have seen a real increase in their take-home pay since 1978-79.

Personal Allowances

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many people have been lifted out of tax by the personal allowances above that required increase by indexation; and how many of them (a) have children and (b) are estimated to be caught in the poverty trap;

(2) what is the cost to the Exchequer in 1985-86 of the married man's tax allowance in excess of the single person's allowance; how much of this cost it attributable to taxpayers aged below 65 years; and what is the weekly value of this extra relief to a married man paying income tax at the standard rate.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Cormorants

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will define the term, "serious ecohomic loss", as used in determining whether or not licences to kill cormorants should be granted.

Mrs. Fenner: I have nothing to add to the second paragraph of my reply to the hon. Member of 14 March.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will explain the basis on which the anonymity of applicants for licences to kill cormorants for commercial reasons is preserved.

Mrs. Fenner: Applications for licences under part I of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 are in principle treated as in confidence in order to encourage applicants to make use of available procedures. However, the Ministry and NCC always consult local interests in order to establish the facts of the case and the alternatives available.

Nutrition Labelling

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his draft guidelines on nutrition labelling will cover salt and sugar content of foods.

Mrs. Fenner: Yes, the draft guidelines will enable salt and sugar content of foods to be declared.

Fishing Industry

Mr. Forth asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the effects on employment in the United Kingdom's fishing industry of the possible entry of Spain and Portugal to the European Economic Community.

Mr. MacGregor: The Government's firm objective in the current negotiations on the entry of Spain and Portugal into the European Community is to ensure that the effective fishing opportunities of the United Kingdom fishing industry, and hence employment in the industry, are fully safeguarded.

Food Standards

Mr. Coombs asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to reduce the number of foods which are required to meet compositional standards.

Mrs. Fenner: It is the Government's intention to continue to move towards more informative food labelling so as to allow for a wide consumer choice of foods. This does not mean however that all food compositional standards are likely to disappear.

Mr. Coombs asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to update his Department's manual of nutrition, so as to reflect the recommendations of the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy report.

Mrs. Fenner: My Department plans to publish the new ninth edition of the "Manual of Nutrition", which is aimed at teachers and students of nutrition, in time for the academic year starting in September 1985. The ninth edition will include advice based on the recommendations of the recent COMA report on diet and cardiovascular disease along with other updated information.

Mr. Coombs asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his national food policy.

Mrs. Fenner: Our policy is to ensure the provision of adequate supplies of wholesome food, and to this end to foster in the United Kingdom efficient and competitive agriculture, fisheries and food processing and distribution industries. I am particularly concerned to encourage improvements in the quality, presentation and marketing of British food both at home and abroad. It was to achieve this that the Government set up Food From Britain.

Butter Fat

Mr. Coombs asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what research is being undertaken by his Department into alternative uses for excess butter fat.

Mrs. Fenner: None at present. It is, however, one of the items in the future programme of food research currently being considered by the priorities board for R and D in agriculture and food.

Horses and Ponies

Sir Kenneth Lewis asked the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will bring forward proposals to provide statutory protection against ill-treatment for horses and ponies by bringing them within the classification of agricultural animals.

Mrs. Fenner: I have no plans to bring forward such proposals as I believe that horses and ponies are adequately protected by existing legislation. Horses and ponies on agricultural land, are protected by the Agriculture (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1968, which makes it an offence to cause agricultural livestock unnecessary pain or unnecessary distress. More generally, all horses and ponies are covered by the Protection of Animals Act 1911 which is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Home Affairs.

African Swine Fever (Meat Imports)

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he is taking to check the import of meat products from Spain and Belgium in the light of the nine confirmed outbreaks of African swine fever in Belgium close to the Dutch border.

Mrs. Fenner: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Badgers

Mr. Soames asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) how many badgers were killed in each of the last three years under the anti bovine tuberculosis campaign;

(2) what evidence he has that badgers are carriers of bovine tuberculosis.

Mrs. Fenner: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Council of Agriculture Ministers

Sir John Wells asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Council of Agriculture Ministers' meeting in Brussels on 25 to 27 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: With my hon. Friend the Minister of State, I represented the United Kingdom at the Council of Agriculture Ministers in Brussels on 25 to 27 March.

The main subject of the Council was the Commission's price proposals. In addition to detailed discussion of the individual commodity proposals a series of bilateral meetings was held with the Commission and Presidency to identify points of difficulty for individual Member States.

In the light of the outcome of these discussions the Council decided that decisions could not be reached this week and that discussions should resume in Luxembourg on 1 April.

The Council also decided that the marketing years for milk products, beef, sheepmeat and dried fodder would be extended until 14 April as the marketing years for these regimes would otherwise terminate at the end of the month.

A conciliation meeting was held with the European Parliament delegation on the wine reform package and a declaration was agreed with it on aspects of implementation.

Milk Quotas

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when it is anticipated that the work of the milk tribunals in dealing with appeals for extra quota will be completed.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 14 February 1985, c. 255]: I have today laid before Parliament the Dairy Produce Quotas (Amendment) Regulations 1985 which will make the changes necessary to implement the package of changes to the Community rules which were recently agreed by the Agriculture Council. Principal among these are the facility for producers with mixed businesses to interchange unused direct and wholesale quotas and the provision to allow (in respect of the first year of quotas) unused quota to be re-allocated between producers within a region and between regions. I am pleased that this package of changes has wiped out the liability for levy in the United Kingdom for this year, except just possibly for a few direct sellers.

The amendment regulations also enable Ministers to allocate additional quota to small producers and remote areas, these allocations being drawn from outgoers' quota.

The Dairy Produce Quotas Tribunal for England and Wales has now virtually completed its work. Letters will be going shortly after Easter to producers who have received secondary quota or exceptional hardship awards, notifying them of their final quotas for 1984-85. For this year, final quotas will consist of primary quota already allocated plus the following elements where appropriate:

(a) Base year revision awards met in full;

(b) Development awards to the extent of about 65 per cent. of the award;

(c) Exceptional hardship awards to the extent of about 75 per cent. of the award (based on an allocation for this purpose of 60 million litres from outgoers' quota).

Because no wholesale producers will have to pay levy this year, the restriction of the development and exceptional hardship awards has no practical effect.

Direct sellers will receive their full base year revision awards, development awards and exceptional hardship awards.

Within the next few weeks producers in England and Wales will also be informed of their 1985-86 quotas. We shall at this stage aim to provide for the restoration to base year levels of quotas totalling less than 200,000 litres, as well as for an increased allocation of development and exceptional hardship awards, but this will depend upon the sufficiency of outgoers' quota. Letters will go out as soon as possible.

We have made every endeavour to inform producers of their final quotas as rapidly as possible. But the tribunal and the local panels have had to deal with an enormous volume of work—22,250 cases before local panels, with 5,700 appeals to the Tribunal and 5,100 exceptional hardship cases. We are continuing to press ahead to complete the outgoers' scheme.

In Northern Ireland producers have offered only about 12 million litres under the outgoers' scheme, whereas provision was made last May of some 66 million litres to be purchased there. To alleviate the situation in the Province we are considering using the resources previously allocated there to purchase quota from outgoers in Great Britain who would otherwise be disappointed by being unable to enter the scheme; this will, however, depend upon the total volume of acceptances.

Farmers (Diversification)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what finance has been allocated to farmers from European Economic Community resources to promote diversification from farming to tourism and other industries; and when these funds will be available for payment.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 25 March 1985, c. 3]: The recently agreed EC regulation for improving the efficiency of agricultural structures includes provisions which permit member states to provide aid for investments under approved improvement plans on farms in designated less favoured areas for the development of tourism or craft industries. Such aid would be reimbursed partially from the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund but no estimates are available of the cost of these specific measures in the Community.

As I have previously announced, it is my intention to implement these provisions when I introduce new grant arrangements later this year.

ENVIRONMENT

Rent Arrears

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the rent arrears for each year since 1979 for (a) Lichfield district council, (b) Cannock Chase district council and (c) Stafford borough council.

Sir George Young: Gross rent arrears on 31 March in each of the years since 1979 were as follows:

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Lichfield District Council	n/a	63	46	49	111	138
Cannock Chase District Council	52	77	98	147	166	195
Stafford Borough Council	44	31	49	122	98	104

Housing Starts

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the number of housing starts in the east midlands in 1978-79 and 1983-84.

Sir George Young: Total dwellings starts in the east midlands region were 18,559 in 1978-79 and 16,520 in 1983-84.

Local Government Act 1972

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to repeal section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have no present plans to do so. The committee of inquiry into the conduct of local authority business, the establishment of which my right hon. Friend announced on 6 February, has been asked to consider amongst other matters the need to clarify the limits and conditions governing discretionary spending by local authorities. We shall consider the need for legislative change in the light of the committee's recommendations.

Rating Revaluation

Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce whether there will be a domestic revaluation.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave) to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) on 22 October 1984 at column 191.

Council Housing

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about when contracts were last entered into by the Walsall metropolitan borough council for council house building; and if he will give the number of public sector dwellings in the borough needing improvement, modernisation and substantial repair work.

Sir George Young: Figures provided to my Department by Walsall MBC in its annual housing investment programme submissions show that no new council dwellings have been started since 1979-80, for which the number was 35.

Information on the condition of public sector dwellings in the borough is not available in the form requested. However, the council has provided an estimate of the number of unfit dwellings, dwellings fit but lacking basic amenities and non-standard dwellings in need of renovation in the 1985-86 housing investment programme return, which is available in the Library.

Planning Appeals

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment in respect of how many planning appeals which were the subject of a public inquiry or written representation, where the reports of inspectors were delivered to him prior to 1 January 1984, he has not yet made a decision; and if he will give similar information about reports delivered to him prior to 1 September 1984.

Mr. Macfarlane: Fifty appeals made under section 36 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, for which an inspector's report had been received prior to 1 September 1984, were awaiting decision by my right hon. Friend on 28 February 1985. Of these, 23 were appeals on which the inspector's report had been received prior to 1 January 1984.

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to determine the outcome of the appeal by Costain Homes Ltd. and Milton Hutchings Ltd. against the decision of the London borough of Hillingdon in respect of Pield Health Nurseries; why it has not yet been determined; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: My right hon. Friend wrote to the parties on 2 January saying that he was minded to allow the appeal but sought further information before reaching a decision. This information has now been received and a decision will be issued as soon as possible.

Housing (Economies of Scale)

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any evidence about the economies of scale in housing management.

Mr. Gow: The success of locally-based housing management teams in improving run-down local authority estates has been demonstated by the Department's priority estates project (PEP).

The Department's report "Local Housing Management" (1984), based on a PEP survey of 20 estates projects, suggest that local management is a cost-effective answer to the drain on resources resulting from void properties, vandalism, rent arrears and inefficient repair services which often characterise run-down estates.

In its new phase, PEP is developing local management and maintenance budgets which will provide detailed information on comparative costs. The expenditure of the Cloverhall tenants' management co-operative in Rochdale will also be monitored.

Sheltered Housing

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the local authorities which make service charges for sheltered housing; and how much of the service charge is met by housing benefit.

Mr. Gow: I regret that the information requested is not available.

"Tower Blocks"

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he can yet make a statement in response to the report by the polytechnic of the South Bank entitled "Tower Blocks".

Mr. Gow: The report details imaginative ways in which local authorities and other agencies have put tower blocks to good use in the light of local conditions. It does not call for a response from my right hon. Friend.

Departmental Expenses

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many visits abroad have been made by Ministers in his Department in the years 1983-84 and 1984-85 to date.

Sir George Young: DOE Ministers carried out 13 official engagements overseas during 1983-84 and 17 during 1984-85.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the total cost of ministerial hospitality in his Department in the years 1983-84 and 1984-85 to date.

Sir George Young: I shall answer this question shortly.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the total cost of furnishing Ministers' offices in his Department in each year since 1979-80.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information is as follows:

Year	Cost (excluding VAT) £
1979-80	2,576
1980-81	518
1981-82	2,022
1982-83	5,794
1983-84	14,044
1984-85	8,975

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the total cost of providing Ministers' cars in his Department in each year since 1979-80; how many cars are provided; and how many trips have been made outside London.

Sir George Young: The numbers and costs of the cars in the years concerned are as follows:

	Number	£
1979-80	6	92,040
1980-81	7	131,040
1981-82	7	138,580
1982-83	6	143,520
1983-84	6	164,450
1984-85	6	155,150

Separate records of the trips made outside London are not maintained.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which grades of civil servants in his Department are allowed to have official supplies of alcohol in their offices; how much has been spent by his Department in each year since 1979-80 on such items.

Mr. Macfarlane: The permanent Secretaries of the Department each have authorised drinks cabinets. They may authorise such expenditure on the part of other senior officers: one such authorisation has currently been given.

Records of expenditure of this kind prior to 1982-83 are incomplete; expenditure from 1982-83 has been as follows:

1982-83	110
1983-84	235
1984-85	435

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much has been spent on official supplies of alcohol to Ministers' offices in this Department in each year since 1979-80.

Sir George Young: Expenditure on Departmental Ministers' drinks cabinets, which include non-alcoholic drinks, has been as follows:

1979-80	1,511
1980-81	1,728
1981-82	2,184
1982-83	2,188
1983-84	1,905
1984-85	2,003

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the total cost of staffing and maintenance of Ministers' offices in his Department for each year since 1979-80.

Sir George Young: I shall answer this question shortly.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which Civil Service grades in his Department are allowed to make charges for official hospitality; and how much was spent on official hospitality by civil servants in each year since 1979-80.

Mr. Macfarlane: Expenditure on official hospitality other than tea and coffee at official meetings is subject to the approval of at least an assistant secretary and normally a higher grade. The total spent on official hospitality by the Department (including the PSA and costs incurred by Ministers) since 1979-80 has been:

	£ thousands
1979-80	83
1980-81	88
1981-82	94·4
1982-83	108·8
1983-84	98·5
1984-85	*108·6

*Estimated outturn.

These figures are in cash terms.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many official cars are maintained by his Department; what is the total annual cost; and who uses them.

Sir George Young: Six ministerial cars and one permanent secretary car costing £175,430 per annum. In addition the Building Research Establishment operates four official cars but the costs are not separately identified in its budget. The cars are used by:

The Secretary of State
Ministers of State (3)
Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State (2)
Permanent Secretary (1)
Authorised staff of the Building Research Establishment (4)

This is exclusive of the 1,450 cars operated by The Crown Suppliers for the use of other Government Departments and other public sector bodies.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the total cost to his Department in each year since 1979-80 of toilet rolls, disposable cups, stationery, teabags, office furniture, newspapers and periodicals.

Sir George Young: The information for DOE Central is as follows:

	Stationery * £	Office Furniture £	Newspapers and Periodicals £
1979-80	†	‡	99,700
1980-81	607,284	‡	110,400
1981-82	461,471	‡	91,500
1982-83	503,796	‡	105,600

1984-85	273,565 ‖	•824,400	105,600

Notes:
* Includes the cost of toilet rolls for which no separate figures are available.
† stationery was provided by HMSO on Allied Service terms under which costs were not passed onto Departments.
‡ cannot be obtained without disproportionate cost.
‖ a contributory factor to the reduction this year is the establishment of the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission.
¶ separate information for the cost of disposable cups and tea bags in not available.
• Estimated.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much has been spent by his Department on telephone calls in each year since 1979-80.

Mr. Waldegrave: The cost of British Telecom calls in the Department (including the PSA) since 1979-80 has been:

Year	£ thousands
1979-80	2,759
1980-81	3,784
1981-82	3,813
1982-83	3,787
1983-84	3,626
*1984-85	3,474

These figures are in cash terms.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much has been spent on postage by his Department in each year since 1979-80.

Mr. Waldegrave: The cost of postage in the Department (including the PSA) since 1979-80 has been:

Year	£ thousands
1979-80	1,316

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the total cost to his Department of official travel in each year since 1979-80.

Mr. Waldegrave: The cost of official travel and subsistence in the Department (including PSA) since 1979-80 has been:

	£ thousands
1979-80	9,698
1980-81	10,535
1981-82	10,087
1982-83	11,064

Local Government Bill

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the average daily number of civil servants from his Department attending Standing Committee G considering the Local Government Bill; and what was the total cost.

Sir George Young: This information is not available.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the Greater London council, the Inner London education authority and the metropolitan county councils were informed of the Government's amendment to the Local Government Bill seeking further controls over certain activities of those local authorities; what is the nature of the proposed controls; from what date they become effective; and what method was used to advise the local authorities.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The nature of the proposed new control over the GLC and metropolitan county councils, since approved by the House, covering enforceable agreements and arrangements, and the amendments to those contained in the 1984 Act, was set out in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) on Thursday 21 March at columns 543-45.

Letters giving details of the proposals were delivered by hand to the chief executive of the Greater London council and the chief officer of the Inner London education authority by 4.15 pm on the same day, and by 3.30 pm at the latest to the chief executives of each of the metropolitan county councils.

The chief officer at ILEA has confirmed receipt of the letter that afternoon. In the case of the GLC, this courtesy was clearly unnecessary since I understand that a press conference was held to outline the council's reactions at 2.30 pm, before my announcement to the House. My officials briefed the press at 3.30 pm.

Crown Suppliers

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total value of business between local authorities and the Crown Suppliers in each of the accounting years since 1979.

Sir George Young: The total value of direct sales of business between local authorities and the Crown Suppliers in each of the accounting years since 1979 were as follows:

1979-80	233,096
1980-81	145,887
1981-82	69,820
1982-83	245,922
1983-84	147,952
1984-85*	538,621

* February.

The figures do not include the value of orders placed through the direct call-off contracts. In these cases the bills are paid by the authorities themselves.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what warehouse facilities in the London area are maintained by the Crown Suppliers.

Sir George Young: The Crown Suppliers occupy 9,708 sq m of storage accommodation at the India pavilion, Exhibition ground, Wembley. These facilities are used primarily for the disposal by public auction of furniture and equipment that is beyond economic repair, and for the storage of furniture and equipment used on ceremonial occasions. Storage and distribution of furniture and equipment for the use of the public sector organisations supplied by the Crown Suppliers in the London area is undertaken from its store at Milton, near Abingdon, Oxon.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if the Crown Suppliers are currently able to offer supplies of paper, educational stationery, art and craft materials, science equipment and chemicals, audio-visual equipment and food for school meals to the London boroughs.

Sir George Young: The Crown Suppliers do not currently offer supplies of paper, educational stationery, art and craft materials, audio visual equipment or food for school meals. All except the latter might be available under Government contracts arranged by HMSO. The Crown Suppliers do, however, supply some laboratory equipment, mainly benching and fume cupboards, and some chemicals which are mainly procured for cleaning purposes.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which London boroughs avail themselves of the services offered by the Crown Suppliers.

Sir George Young: The following London boroughs have availed themselves of the services offered by the Crown Suppliers:

Southwark
Bromley
Lewisham
Enfield
Croydon
Harrow
Ealing
Hillingdon
Waltham Forest
Islington
Hammersmith/Fulham
Havering
Westminster City Council
Corporation of London
Walthamstow
Hounslow

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the value of business between the London boroughs and the Crown Suppliers in each of the accounting years since 1979-80.

Sir George Young: The value of business between the London boroughs and the Crown Suppliers in each of the accounting years since 1979-80 was as follows:

1979-80	91,200
1980-81	32,552
1981-82	17,337
1982-83	206,857
1983-84	111,689
1984-85*	460,014

* (February).

The figures do not include the value of orders placed through the direct call-off contracts. In these cases the bills are paid by the authorities themselves.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information his Department has of comparable product prices offered by the Crown Suppliers and the Greater London council supplies department.

Sir George Young: No direct comparison has been made between the prices offered by the Crown Suppliers and the GLC supplies department.

The Crown Suppliers prices are however continuously monitored and the results are published in its annual report and accounts which is available in the Library of the House.

Gipsies

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the current number of illegally encamped gipsy caravans in England and Wales.

Mr. Macfarlane: The number of gipsy caravans on unauthorised sites in England in July 1984 reported by district and London borough councils was 3,930.

The figures for Wales can be obtained from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Rates

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what public statements he has made about the relative levels of increase in the rate poundage in (a) the Isle of Wight and (b) the 19 Conservative-controlled county councils in England: and if, in the light of the information given to the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight on 22 March, Official Report, column 638-9, he has any further statement to make on this matter.

Mr. Waldegrave: In his speech to the Conservative local government conference on 9 March my right hon. Friend contrasted the average increase of 31 per cent. in the precepts of Conservative controlled non-metropolitan County Councils in the last four years with the comparable average increase of 62 per cent. in the precepts of Labour controlled non-metropolitan councils. He then observed that though the alliance controls few counties, the increase in the precept of the Isle of Wight over the same period was nearly 40 per cent.; and that this was far higher than the equivalent 28 per cent. increase in neighbouring Hampshire. My right hon. Friend had already made this latter comparison in a speech to Hampshire Conservative councillors and prospective councillors on 16 February.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why one of his Department's officials made reference at a press conference on 21 March to a counter-obstruction unit set up within his Department in connection with the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The House has been informed on several previous occasions of the responsibilities of the small division set up to administer those measures in the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act and the Local Government Bill which require the GLC and the metropolitan county councils to obtain my right hon. Friend's consent before proceeding with certain decisions. This has allowed over 4,000 specific applications for consent, to date, to be dealt with quickly. That division also advises my right hon. Friend on what further measures may be needed to counter possible activities of those authorities likely to be prejudicial to the interests of successor authorities and their ratepayers.

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report a list of the voluntary bodies for which he has approved grants by the Greater London council under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972.

Sir George Young: I shall reply shortly.

Departmental Staffing

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the total staffing of his Department in each year since 1979-80.

Mr. Waldegrave: The number of staff employed by the Department of the Environment (including PSA) since 1979-80 is as follows:

	Number
1 April 1979	50,258
1 April 1980	46,102
1 April 1981	43,507
1 April 1982	38,802
1 April 1983	36,491
1 April 1984	33,836
1 April 1985	*33,009

* Estimated.

Litter

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will initiate an analysis of the type of litter deposited by members of the public in the hedgerows and ditches and other areas; if he will introduce further preventtive measures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Some information is already available on the type of litter deposited by the public and the Government do not plan to instigate a specific study of this matter. We believe that the long term solution to the problem must lie in educating the public not to drop litter. To this end we give financial support to the Keep Britain Tidy Group who offer a systematic litter abatement programme for adoption by local authorities. This recognises that litter is produced from many sources, and can be effectively tackled in the long term only by community co-operation.

The Government believe that the existing legislation provides sufficient back-up to this community approach.

Ozone Layer

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in regard to the convention for the protection of the ozone layer negotiated under the auspices of the United Nations Environment Programme.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department led the United Kingdom delegation at the diplomatic conference in Vienna which completed work on the text of the convention on 22 March. The United Kingdom expects to sign the convention shortly. The European Community and all other member states are expected to become parties, along with at least 20 other countries.

The convention—which will be formally known as the Vienna convention for the protection of the ozone layer—is the first global convention to be concluded under the auspices of the United Nations Environment Programme. It established a framework for a range of possible measures to protect the ozone layer along lines that are fully compatible with the Community's environment policy of concentrating on the prevention rather than the cure of damage.

Agreement was also reached in Vienna to continue work on an associated Protocol to control the use of chlorofluorocarbons, the family of chemicals principally implicated in potential depletion of the ozone layer.

Geographic Information

Mr. Andy Stewart asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the setting up of a committee of inquiry into the handling of geographic information in the United Kingdom, as agreed in the Government's response to the First Report of the House of Lords Select Committee on Science and Technology on remote sensing and digital mapping, Cmnd. 9320.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 28 February 1985, c. 233]: On the setting up of the committee of Inquiry into the handling of geographic information in the United Kingdom, I am pleased to announce that the following people have also been appointed members of the committee.

Dr. J. Balfour—Chairman of the Countryside Commission for Scotland 1972-1982.

Mr. I. Gilfoyle — Deputy County Planning Officer, Cheshire CC.

Prof. D. Rhind — Head of Geography Department, Birkbeck College, University of London.

Mr. F. P. Russell — Distribution Engineering Manager, British Gas.

Dr. R. Schiller — Head of Research at Hillier Parker, Chartered Surveyors.

Mr. G. Singh—Chairman and Executive Director, Pinpoint Analysis Ltd.

Mr. D. T. Sinker—Managing Director, Hunting Surveys and Consultants Ltd.

Dr. J. R. Townshend—Reader in Geography, University of Reading.

Waste Disposal

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will initiate discussions with the manufacturers and distributors of beverages sold in metal cans and with the tobacco companies whose products are sold in packets about measures to seek to encourage the public to dispose of empty containers properly through refuse collection facilities.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his answer, 27 March 1985]: My Department already has regular contact with the packaging industry and particularly the industry committee for packaging and the environment which actively campaigns for the proper disposal by the public of empty containers. This is achieved in a wide variety of ways including strong encouragement for the use of appropriate labelling on packaging to effect recycling or proper disposal. We also give direct support to the Keep Britain Tidy Group for their comprehensive litter abatement work which includes substantial interface with industry to obtain appropriate labelling of packaging containers and litter bins with the international Tidyman symbol. The group also operates a systematic community environment programme involving industry and local authorities.

SCOTLAND

Licensing Laws (Report)

Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when the report into experience in Scotland following reform of the liquor licensing laws in 1976 will be received by Her Majesty's Government; when it will be published; and when he expects to announce the conclusions of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. Friend expects to receive the report of the OPCS survey into attitudes to the licensing laws in the summer. Publication is expected before the end of the year, but we hope to publish preliminary key findings of the survey in June. Once the necessary consideration and consultations have been undertaken, my right hon. Friend will make a statement about his conclusions, probably in the Spring of 1986.

Housing Finance

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report in respect of each local housing authority in Scotland (i) the rate-fund contribution to housing revenue accounts budgeted for in 1985-86, (ii) the statutory limit to such contributions allowed by law, (iii) the average weekly rent increases for 1985-86 and (iv) the percentage increase in average weekly rents for 1985-86 over 1984-85.

Mr. Ancram: The information requested is set out in the following table:

Notes

1. The information contained in columns 1, 3 and 4 of the table is taken from returns, or in the case of Stirling, other information, submitted to the Scottish Development Department by authorities. Information from Clydebank district council and Western Isles islands council has yet to be received.

2. The figures in brackets in Column 1 are credit balances.

3. Changes in an authority's housing stock, e.g. through sales, can result in a marginal increase or decrease in the average rent. The rent increase figures shown in column 3 are not, therefore, necessarily wholly the result of authorities' decisions on rent levels.

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report in respect of each district and islands area of Scotland the amounts paid or estimated to be paid by the Housing Corporation in respect of (a) new built housing and (b) improvements to housing (i) in cash terms and (ii) per head of population.

Mr. Ancram: The information requested for 1983-84, the most recent year for which figures are available, is set out in the following table:

Rateable Values

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report for each local authority area in Scotland the percentage increase in the average rateable values of (a) domestic, (b) commercial, (c) industrial, (d) public utilities and (e) miscellaneous properties as a result of the recent revaluation.

Mr. Ancram: The only complete information available centrally is based on assessors' estimates made at 1 November 1984 of the valuations to be effective from 1 April 1985. The figures for average increases in rateable value have been calculated by comparing 1 April 1985 estimates with 1 April 1984 valuations and thus do not take account of new entries in the valuation roll during 1984-85 nor of appeals settled in that year. The figures for "commercial" and "miscellaneous" subjects could also be misleading due to some reclassification of individual subjects between these categories. Subject to these comments, the average percentage increases in rateable values in each local authority area at revaluation are as follows:

Area	Domestic per cent.	Commercial per cent.	Industrial per cent.	Public Utilities per cent.	Miscellaneous per cent.

Housing Improvement Grants

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many housing improvement grants have been paid in Scotland for each year from 1982 to date.

Mr. Ancram: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Estimated number of grants paid
1982	24,000
1983	46,000
1984	57,000

The figures, which are based on incomplete returns, include grants paid for improvement, conversion and repair, and the provision of standard amenities.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will provide the latest estimates for spending on housing improvement grants by each district council in Scotland for 1984-85 and 1985-86, indicating, in each case, the potential under or overspend on original estimates (a) in cash terms and (b) in percentage terms.

Mr. Ancram: Expenditure on housing improvement grants is one component of non-housing revenue account block expenditure, and will depend on how authorities choose to spend the resources allocated to them for that block. The only estimates of expenditure specifically on housing improvement grants in 1984-85 were those submitted by local authorities in January 1985 and are given in the table below. There are no other estimates with which to compare them. Estimates for 1985-86 are not available.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the most recent information he has on the amount likely to be spent on housing improvement grants in Scotland and Inverclyde, respectively, during 1984-85 and 1985-86.

Mr. Ancram: The amounts estimated to be spent on housing improvement grants in Scotland and Inverclyde district during 1984-85 are £149 million and £1·885 million respectively. Estimates for 1985-86 are not available.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is, in real and cost terms, the total estimated spending on housing improvement grants by district councils for 1984-85 and 1985-86; and how this compares with the figures for 1983-84.

Mr. Ancram: Total estimated expenditure by local authorities on housing improvement grants in 1984-85 is, in cash terms and at 1983-84 prices, £149 million and £142·6 million respectively. This compares with £181 million spent in 1983-84.

An estimate for 1985-86 is not available. Expenditure on housing improvement grants is one component of non-HRA block expenditure, and will depend on how authorities choose to spend the resources allocated to them for that block.

Housing Action Areas

Mr. White asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of houses improved and demolished in housing action areas in each year since 1970.

Mr. Ancram: The information requested from 1978 onwards, when statistics were first collected, is shown in the following table:

Period	Number of dwellings
	Improved	Demolished
1 April to 31 March
1978-80*	5,376	4,975
1980-81	2,761	821
1981-82	3,646	1,153
1982-83	3,426	974
1983-84	4,616	994

* 2 years.

Labour Statistics

Mr. White asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many job opportunities are available to young people in (a) the Glasgow, Pollok constituency, (b) the Glasgow area and (c) Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information requested is not available: statistics on job vacancies are not classified by age group. Rather than entering the labour market directly young people may prefer to take advantage of the opportunities available for further education and training, and the expansion of the youth training scheme will be of particular benefit in this respect.

Mr. White asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the present level of youth unemployment in the Glasgow, Pollok, constituency; and what were the figures for 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information on youth unemployment is not available on a constituency basis. However, the number of unemployed young people aged under 18 in the Shawlands, Govan and Barrhead jobcentre areas within which the Glasgow, Pollok constituency is located is available in the House of Commons Library for the period requested.

The figures are not directly comparable due to the change in October 1982 from a registrant to a claimant-based count.

Woodilee and Stonyetts Hospitals

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress is being made on the modernisation and maintenance of the Greater Glasgow health board houses at Woodilee and Stonyetts hospitals.

Mr. John MacKay: This is a matter for the health board. I am informed by the board that substantial progress has been made on the first phase of the programme which involves expenditure of over £200,000. The board was however informed on 21 March that the contractor involved had been taken into receivership. The board is urgently negotiating with another contractor to take over and complete the works with the minimum of delay, and hopes to be able shortly to determine the full extent of work which it will be able to carry out in the new financial year.

Administration of Justice (Cash Limit)

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what change will be made to the 1984-85 cash limit for Class XV, Vote II, Administration of Justice, Scotland.

Mr. Younger: The outturn for this Vote for 1983-84 showed expenditure of £50,000 in excess of that year's cash limit. The overspend arose as a result of a mis-estimation of expenditure required for services provided under the property repayment services scheme. In accordance with normal practice, the cash limit for this Vote for this financial year is reduced by the amount of the previous year's overspend. The cash limit will therefore be reduced by £50,000 from £7,662,000 to £7,612,000.

Area Health Boards

Mr. Ewing asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the membership of the area health boards in Scotland, indicating for each board the names of members who were not reappointed in the recent appointments, together with the names and nominating organisations of the new members appointed to replace them.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 18 March 1985, c. 402-3]: The information is set out in the following tables, detailing each individual health board.

Crime Statistics

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the number of reported break-ins and attempted break-ins to all forms of property in Scotland for each of the years from 1979 to date; what the percentage increase is from 1979 to date; in how many instances no charges were ever made; and what percentage of the total this represents.

Mr. Ancram [pursuant to his reply, 16 January 1984, c. 160]: The information is set out in the following tables:

Housebreakings recorded by the police, Scotland

Year	Number Recorded	*Number not cleared up	*Percentage not cleared up
1979	68,505	54,453	79·5
1980	70,130	54,546	77·8
1981	85,160	67,841	79·7
1982	94,818	77,759	82·0
1983	95,236	77,742	81·6

Percentage change 1979-1983 39·0

Attempted Housebreakings recorded by the police, Scotland

Year	Number Recorded	*Number not cleared up	*Percentage not cleared up
1979	8,130	6,736	82·9
1980	8,316	6,702	80·6
1981	10,521	8,612	81·9
1982	11,453	9,537	83·3
1983	13,284	11,160	84·0

Percentage change 1979-1983 63·4

* A crime is regarded as cleared up if one or more offenders is apprehended, cited, warned or traced for it. Since crimes may be cleared up in the year following the date of recording (or later), the figures for crimes recorded and crimes cleared up in any particular year are not strictly comparable; but any consequent distortion would be minimal.

Note

The figures for housebreaking include breaking into all types of building, including both residential and commercial property. These figures do not include breaking into other types of property such as cars (classified as thefts by opening lockfast places). The number of cases in which no charge was made is not available in the form requested; but the tables indicate the number and percentage of cases not cleared up. The figures for housebreaking are for the years to 1983, the latest date for which information is available.

WALES

Salmon

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for Wales what action his Department has taken since 1979 to counter the threat to salmon stocks from (a) illegal netting, (b) predation, (c) pollution, (d) water abstraction, and (e) poaching, respectively; and what action his Department takes to monitor salmon stocks.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: In Wales responsibility for the control, maintenance and development of salmon fisheries is vested in the Welsh water authority by the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975. Since 1979 I have confirmed a number of byelaws made by the Welsh water authority to control salmon fishing and protect salmon stocks.

The consultation paper on the review of inland and coastal fisheries in England and Wales, published jointly in 1981 by my Department and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, recognised illegal netting and poaching as a major problem. Reactions to the paper indicated widespread support for some kind of salmon sales control scheme. Subsequently, fisheries departments have reviewed thoroughly the proposals by the salmon sales group of the National Water Council for a salmon-tagging scheme. Serious practical difficulties over the implementation of such a scheme have been identified, including control of imports, the handling of British farmed salmon and the control of tags. These difficulties and other aspects of salmon sales control remain under urgent examination, and an announcement will be made as soon as conclusions are reached.

My Department has no evidence that salmon suffer predation in Wales or in Welsh coastal waters to an extent which would justify specific action.

The Welsh water authority's statutory responsibilities require the striking of a suitable balance between its water abstraction, pollution control, fisheries and amenity functions. Where there is a game fishery, particular attention is given to ensure that discharges to the river do not adversely affect the fishery. For abstraction, the aim is to ensure that water levels do not reduce to the point where fish stocks are harmed. As part of the implementation of the Control of Pollution Act 1974, my Department, along with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, has in January this year issued a booklet entitled "Code of Good Agricultural Practice," designed to minimise the risks of pollution from farming practices and to give guidance on good agricultural practice for the purposes of section 31(2)(c) of that Act.

In order to monitor salmon stocks, fisheries scientists from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food collect and collate data supplied by the water authorities relating to both restocking and catching—by all means —of salmon. Data for 1983 will be published shortly in the fisheries laboratory data research series, and a copy will be placed in the Library of the House.

Council Tenants (Subsidy)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the average central Government subsidy per council tenant by county in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Based on returns made by local authorities to the Welsh Office, the average central Government subsidy per council tenant by county in 1984-85 is as follows:

	Average subsidy pa per tenant £
Clwyd	Nil
Gwynedd	4
Dyfed	47
Powys	47

New College, Cardiff

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 25 March, Official Report, column 6, what is his estimate of the number of jobs which will be created if the offer of a payment of an £80,000 grant to New College, Cardiff, is taken up; and what conditions he has attached to the offer of this grant.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: For reasons of commercial confidentiality, the number of jobs promised by the project and the terms and conditions attached to the grant offer cannot be disclosed.

Job Creation

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether, for the purposes of grant paid under the Industrial Development Act 1982 in respect of job creation, he draws any distinction between those classified as employed or self-employed and if, in the case of the latter, any grant is paid direct to those persons whose jobs have been so created.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The appraisal of applications for regional selective assistance under the Industrial Development Act 1982 involves detailed scrutiny of the employment associated with each project. Assistance is related only to jobs provided by the applicant company or firm as a direct consequence of the project.

Payment of grant is made to the company or firm carrying out a project and not to individual employees.

Sir Melvyn Rosser

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all those appointments held under his patronage by Sir Melvyn Rosser since 1979.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have not appointed Sir Melvyn Rosser to any public body in Wales for which I am the responsible appointing Minister. I was consulted by the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission prior to Sir Melvyn's initial appointment as chairman of the MSC Committee for Wales in 1980, and on his reappointment in 1983.

Residential Homes

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the total number of people employed by local authorities in Wales from 1980 to the latest available date in connection with their duties under the Residential Homes Act 1980.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: This information is not available.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what additional resources have been made available to local authorities in Wales to enable them to meet their responsibilities under the Residential Homes Act 1980 for each year of its operation.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No additional resources were made available specifically. Local authorities were expected to meet the cost of their responsibilities under the Act within their total budgets for personal social services. Under current legislation, the Registered Homes Act 1984, there has been a substantial increase in the fees payable by those seeking registration; the level of these fees is to be reviewed in the light of operational experience.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what expenditure has been incurred by his Department for each year since 1980 on the administration of the Residential Homes Act 1980 or on any matters arising from the Act.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: This information is not available.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many applications for registration have been refused and how many licences revoked per county in Wales under the Residential Homes Act 1980 during each year of its operation.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many old persons' homes have been registered per county in Wales under the Residential Homes Act 1980, for each year of its operation.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested is given in the following table:

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Black Children (Nottingham)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has about the number of black children suspended from schools in the Nottingham area; how this compares with the national average; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The Government do not collect information on school pupils on an ethnic basis; nor are there national figures about suspensions from schools.

University Visitor

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he proposes to introduce any changes in the role of the university visitor; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend has no power to determine the role of the university visitor. He is aware of the problems the hon. Member has in mind and is awaiting the outcome of the consideration being given by the CVCP to these and other matters.

Member's Correspondence

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to be in a position to reply to the letter sent to him by the hon. Member for Birkenhead on 19 December 1984 concerning the son of Mr. Francis Joseph McKeown.

Mr. Brooke: I replied to the hon. Member on 28 March 1985.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Youth Training

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the projects by name and indicate the number of trainees in each youth training programme and the action for community employment scheme, together with the amount of public money advanced annually to each scheme operating in Larne borough which is funded by the Department of Economic Development.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Famine (Petition)

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement in response to the petition on famine conveyed to him by the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield on behalf of constituents.

Mr. Raison: The Government are committed to providing emergency aid to Ethiopia and other famine stricken countries throughout 1985 and beyond. As was clear at the recent Geneva conference, our partners in the European Community, other donors and United Nations agencies share that commitment. Our humanitarian assistance is given without conditions, and our policy is to provide it to those in need wherever they may be. Within the limit of the resources available, we continue to improve the volume and impact of our longer term development aid to Africa through all appropriate channels.

PRIME MINISTER

International Youth Year

Mr. Cohen asked the Prime Minister how much money Her Majesty's Government have allocated and what activities are planned in respect of International Youth Year; and how much of this applies specifically to (i) unemployed and (ii) ethnic minority youth; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Total grant aid to the national co-ordinating committees in the United Kingdom is expected to be some £300,000. Many activities in Government programmes have relevance to the objectives of the year, including existing grants in connection with youth participation, support of a visit of 250 young people from 22 European countries, programmes in respect of the young unemployed and those from ethnic minorities. The youth training scheme also has particular relevance.

European Community (Spain and Portugal)

Mr. Forth asked the Prime Minister if she will ensure that, before Parliament is asked to approve the accession of Spain and Portugal to the European Economic Community, details of all of the additional costs and any loss of benefit to the United Kingdom are made available to Parliament.

The Prime Minister: Most recent Commission estimates suggest that at the end of transition enlargement will represent a cost to the Community budget as a whole of between 0·1 per cent. and 0·2 per cent. of the VAT own resources base annually. It is not yet possible to estimate actual costs and benefits to the United Kingdom. Because of the Fontainebleu abatement mechanism, the United Kingdom will pay around 7 per cent. net of the additional costs to the allocated Community budget arising from enlargement.

Mr. Peter Levene

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Prime Minister if, pursuant to her answer of 21 March, Official Report, column 571, she will list the organisation from which the secondment of Mr. Levene was considered.

The Prime Minister: No.

Defence Procurement

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Prime Minister whether, in the coming year, any official of the defence procurement section will be involved in vetting or awarding contracts in which United Scientific Holdings and related companies have an interest.

The Prime Minister: Any bids received in the coming year from United Scientific Holdings and its subsidiary companies for Ministry of Defence contracts would be vetted and examined by officials of the procurement executive in the normal way, but, as I have already made clear, Mr. Peter Levene would not be involved.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Prime Minister what steps are being taken to avoid any potential conflict of interest for the new Chief of Defence Procurement in vetting and awarding tenders to United Scientific Holdings and other related companies after April 1986.

The Prime Minister: Mr. Levene has resigned his directorships in United Scientific Holdings and all of its subsidiaries. He has disposed of his own and his immediate family's shareholdings in United Scientific Holdings.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Prime Minister what steps are being taken to avoid any potential conflict of interest for the new Chief of Defence Procurement in vetting and awarding tenders to members of the Defence Manufacturers Association.

The Prime Minister: Mr. Levene has resigned his directorships in United Scientific Holdings and all its subsidiaries. He has no formal connection with them or any other defence contractor whatsoever. He holds no shares in any Ministry of Defence contractor in the United Kingdom or overseas.

Public Expenditure

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Prime Minister (1) if she will cause to be published in the Official Report a table showing for the last year for which figures are available the sums of money spent on (a) roads and road improvement, (b) sewerage, (c) new housing, housing repairs and house modernisation, (d) hospital and health service building works, (e) education building, (f) new works on airstrips, (g) harbours and repairs and (h) modernisation of such facilities.

(2) if she will cause to be published in the Official Report a table showing for the last year for which figures are available the sums spent on (a) roads and road improvement, (b) sewerage, (c) new houses, housing repairs and house modernisation, (d) hospital and health service building work, (e) education building, (f) new work on airstrips, (g) harbours and repairs and (h) modernisation of such facilities in Scotland.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to her reply, 27 March 1985]: The information requested is set out in the following table, which should be read with its footnotes.

Public Expenditure in Certain Categories, 1983-84 (£ million)*

	Great Britain	Scotland

NATIONAL FINANCE

Multi-fibre Arrangement

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many Customs and Excise officials have specialised in the implementation and enforcement of the multi-fibre arrangement and other textile trade regulations in each year since 1979.

Mr. Hayhoe: Since 1982, six Customs and Excise headquarters officials have specialised in the implementation of the multi-fibre arrangement; previously the figure was five. All officials responsible for enforcing controls on imported freight are expected to take account of the MFA and other controls relating to the textile trade, but it is not known whether any specialise in this work. In addition, since 1980 Customs investigation division has deployed a team of around 10 specialist investigators devoted to licensing matters generally.

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many prosecutions of importers have taken place in each year from 1982 for the fraudulent importation of textile and clothing goods in circumvention of the quotas agreed under the multi-fibre arrangement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Companies and individuals prosecuted each year from 1982 for the fraudulent or attempted fraudulent importation of goods in circumvention of quotas agreed under the multi-fibre arrangement are as follows:

	Number
1982	19
1983	3
1984	6
1985	2

*To date.

Since 1983, Customs normal policy has been to offer to compound proceedings in all but the most blatant cases of fraud. A significant number of cases are, therefore, settled out of court. However, to identify the number of cases involved would involve a disproportionate use of resources.

Taxation and National Insurance

Mr. Rooker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will now update his answer to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr of 27 March 1984, Official Report, column 109, by giving information about the reductions in the basic rate of income tax which would be necessary to restore tax payments to their 1978-79 levels in 1985-86.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Rooker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated yield from all sources of taxation, including excise and other duties, for 1985-86; what was the comparable yield for 1978-79 revalued at 1985-86 prices; and if he will publish a breakdown by categories of the real increase in taxes between 1978-79 and 1985-86, similar to that in his answer of 28 March 1984, Official Report, column 206.

Mr. Moore: The estimated total yield of taxes, local authority rates and national insurance contributions is £138 billion in 1985-86; the yield in 1978-79 revalued at 1985-86 prices using the GDP deflator is £109 billion. The other information requested is in the table.

† Components do not sum to total because of rounding.

Mr. Rooker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will provide information on the net income after income tax, national insurance contributions and child benefit at (a) actual prices and (b) equivalent 1984-85 prices of typical household units (i) single, (ii) married couple, (iii) married couple with two children and (iv) married couple with four children, whose earnings from work are equivalent to the following points on the male earnings distribution: (1) lowest decile, (2) median and (3) highest decile for each year since April 1978.

Mr. Moore: Information in the following tables is based on estimates of earnings for those in full-time work paid at adult rates, with pay unaffected by absence. Estimates are based on information from the new earnings surveys.

Income tax rates and allowances for April 1979 are those specified in the Finance Act 1979, later replaced by those announced in June 1979; for other Aprils, they are the rates and allowances for the financial year immediately following. Taxpayers are assumed to have no reliefs or allowances other than the appropriate personal allowance. National insurance contributions are at the contracted-in rate.

The calculations take no account of means-tested benefits to which those at the lowest decile may be entitled. Changes in the purchasing power of net earnings have been calculated by reference to movements in the general index of retail prices between Aprils.

Mr. Rooker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the comparison between the yield in real terms in 1978-79 and what he is now proposing for 1985-86 in (a) direct taxes including national insurance and (b) indirect taxes.

Mr. Moore: The information is in the following table:

Changes on 1978-79

	£ billion, 1985-86 prices
Direct taxes*	+16·9
Indirect taxes†	+12·1

† Including employers'NICs.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will construct an index, with 1978-79 equalling 100, of the changes in the level of income tax and national insurance contributions for each subsequent year for a taxpayer on (a) two thirds, (b) average, (c) five times average and (d) 10 times average earnings for households where the taxpayer is (i) single, (ii) married, (iii) married with two children and (iv) married with four children, and in all cases assuming that the wife does not work, in the manner of the answer of 23 November 1983, Official Report, column 171-2.

Mr. Rooker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will construct an index with 1978-79 equalling 100, of the changes in the level of income tax and national insurance contributions for each subsequent year for a taxpayer on (a) half, (b) two thirds, (c) average, (d) five times and (e) 10 times average earnings for households where the taxpayer is (i) single, (ii) married, no children (iii) married with two children and (iv) married with four children, in all cases assuming the wife does not work.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 21 March 1985, c. 603]: The following table shows (a) income tax plus national insurance contributions less child benefit, where appropriate, as a percentage of gross earnings ; and (b) real net income after income tax, NIC and child benefit in index number form with 1978-79 equalling 100. The calculations assume that the taxpayer has no reliefs other than the appropriate personal allowance and that national insurance contributions are at the contracted-in rate. Average earnings ae those for full-time males paid at adult rates whose pay was not affected by absence. Figures for 1984-85 and 1985-86 are provisional.

Mortgage Interest (Wales)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average mortgage interest tax relief per owner occupier by county in Wales.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Fatchett asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list regional gross domestic product per head, expressed as a percentage of the United Kingdom average for each year since 1978.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Finance Bill

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Finance Bill will be published.

Mr. Peter Rees: The Finance Bill will be published on Tuesday 16 April.

SCOTLAND

Broadleaved Woodland

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if the Forestry Commission will give an undertaking to meet the national voluntary conservation organisations concerned about broadleaved woodland before 8 May.

Mr. John MacKay: The views of the major voluntary conservation bodies have been clearly presented to the Forestry Commission, which does not feel that there is a need for special meetings with them before the seminar on 8 May.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what action has been taken to ensure that an agreement is reached between the Forestry Commission and the Nature Conservancy Council regarding management guidelines for broadleaved woods.

Mr. John MacKay Discussions are continuing between the Forestry Commission and the Nature Conservancy Council on these management guidelines.

Felled Woodland (Replanting)

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the areas of felled woodland which have been replanted by the Forestry Commission in each of the last 10 years, and also showing the percentage of that area which has been planted with each of the main tree species.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Forestry Policy (Seminar)

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if the Forestry Commission will invite Friends of the Earth, Scotland, to take part in its seminar on forestry policy on 8 May.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission has been concerned to keep the numbers of persons attending the seminar within manageable proportions in order to ensure a constructive discussion. The bodies invited represent a balanced cross-section of interests. In these circumstances, the commission does not propose to issue any further invitations.

Housing

Mr. White asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many new houses were started in Scotland in the last six months for which figures are available; and how many were started in the similar period for each of the last five years.

Mr. Ancram: The information requested is shown in the following table and refers to the period 1 July to 31 December each year.

Period July to December	Number of dwellings started
1979	11,629
1980	6,805
1981	6,832
1982	8,810

Salmon Stocks

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what action his Department has taken since 1979 to counter the threat to salmon stocks from (a) illegal netting, (b) predation, (c) pollution, (d) water abstraction, and (e) poaching, respectively; and what action his Department takes to monitor salmon stocks.

Mr. John MacKay: The principal measures taken are as follows:

(a) Illegal netting: The ban on drift net fishing for salmon in the sea off Scotland has been continued and enforcement of that ban by the Fishery Protection Service has been stepped up with considerable success. Power has been taken in the Inshore Fishing (Scotland) Act 1984 to prohibit the carriage by British fishing vessels in Scottish waters of certain types of nets used mainly for illegal fishing. Power has also been taken to prohibit fishing for salmon in the sea by specified nets set from the shore.

(b) Predation: Licences have been issued under the Conservation of Seals Act 1970 for defensive shooting of seals at salmon net fishing stations during close seasons and under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 for the shooting of cormorants, goosanders and mergansers to prevent serious damage to salmon fisheries.

(c) Pollution: The prevention of pollution of Scottish rivers is a matter for the river purification boards, but the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland has an ongoing research programme to measure the effects of acid deposition and afforestation on freshwater ecosystems. In 1983 the Scottish Development Department published "Water Pollution Control in Scotland: Recent Developments" which reported continuing progress in the field of water pollution control. The report concluded that 99 per cent. of Scottish rivers were now unpolluted or of fairly good quality.

(d) Water Abstraction: Legislation governing the supply and resource protection of waters, together with the power to control the supply of water during periods of drought was consolidated and reaffirmed by the Water (Scotland) Act 1980. Certain problems regarding abstraction were identified by the Scottish River Purification Advisory Committee in its 1978 report on the control of water abstraction. My right hon. Friend intends to introduce legislation as soon as the parliamentary timetable permits to simplify the control provisions in the Spray Irrigation (Scotland) Act 1964 and to extend its application to other forms of irrigation.

(e) Poaching: We have been reviewing Scottish salmon and freshwater legislation and administration with interested organisations. Efforts by district salmon fishery boards and the police to control river poaching continue unabated and there were 324, 411 and 395 prosecutions in 1981, 1982 and 1983, respectively. The final figures for 1984 are not yet available but are thought to be approximately 320. We are considering possible systems of salmon sales control as a means of reducing illegal fishing in the rivers and in the sea.

(f) Monitoring of Salmon Stocks: Research into the state of salmon stocks is carried out at the Freshwater Fisheries Laboratory, Pitlochry. This includes a comprehensive system of catch recording and sampling. Exploitation rates are measured by tagging experiments. Detailed investigations are carried out on selected rivers.

Terrorism (Deaths)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of deaths which have occurred in Scotland in the years 1983 and 1984, respectively, connected with the present civil unrest in Northern Ireland; and how many of those deaths were caused by action taken by the police and each of the known terrorist or paramilitary groups.

Mr. Ancram: No such deaths have occurred in Scotland in the years in question.

Agricultural Land (Rating)

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish his Department's most recent estimate of the likely yield of rating on agricultural land.

Mr. Ancram: Agricultural land is by statute excluded from valuation for rating. Valuations on which any estimate of rate yield could be made are not, therefore, available.

Local Authorities (Debts)

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the amount of expenditure on debt charged in respect of past borrowings authorised by central Government in each local authority in Scotland and give the percentage which this represents.

Mr. Ancram: Since 1975 Scottish local authorities have not required the Secretary of State's consent to borrow for capital expenditure purposes. Figures are not available for the current cost to local authorities of borrowing authorised by the Secretary of State before that date.

Housing Benefit (Rating Expenditure)

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the amount of rating expediture in each of the district and islands authorities in Scotland on housing benefit and give the percentage of expenditure which this represents.

Mr. Ancram: The information is as follows:

The figures for islands authorities also include administration costs (including central administration) on rate rebates.

‡ Total expenditure against which housing benefit expenditure has been measured in percentage terms in column 2 is total expenditure relevant for rate support grant purposes, including loan charges, total rate fund contributions to the housing revenue account and total rate fund contributions to other non-relevant services (including rent rebates and allowances).

Health Boards

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list his responsibilities for Scottish health boards under the National Health Service.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend's responsibilities for Scottish health boards are set out in the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978, as amended principally by the Health Service Act 1980 and the Health and Social Services and Social Security Adjudications Act 1983.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidelines he has issued to Scottish health boards on expenditure within the National Health Service on items other than those directly connected with patient care.

Mr. John MacKay: Guidelines to Scottish health boards on matters relating directly to patient care, and to the other services required for the management and support of these services, are contained in circulars and other communicaions issued from time to time by the Scottish Home and Health Department. The guidance on these other services is very extensive, and cannot be summarised briefly.

Employment

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many manufacturing jobs were (a) lost and (b) created in Scotland in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information requested, for the period up to 1981-82, is available from the Scottish Manufacturing Establishments Record* and is set out in the table.

NOTE: Provisional estimates of the net changes in employees in employment in manufacturing are available from Department of Employment. For 1982-83 and 1983-84 there were decreases of 31,000 and 10,000 respectively.

* The Scottish Manufacturing Establishments Record (SCOMER) covers all manufacturing units in Scotland with 11 or more employees.

Electricity

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to place a statutory duty on the generating boards in Scotland to produce electricity at the lowest possible price.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I am satisfied that the boards' existing statutory duties, together with the objectives set by the Secretary of State, are sufficient to encourage the boards to produce electricity in the most economic and efficient way.

Cumbernauld

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many jobs in the high technology industries have been created; and how many have been lost in each year since May 1979 in Cumbernauld new town.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 27 March 1985]: The information requested is not available as there is no accepted definition of high technology industry. The available information for jobs in the electronics industry based on estimates compiled by Cumbernauld Development Corporation, is set out in the following table:

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Non-Tariff Barriers

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps have been taken to reduce the non-tariff barriers that exist between France and the United Kingdom and the other European Community countries.

Mr. Channon: The Council of Ministers has reached agreement on a number of measures identified at the European Council in December 1982 to reduce technical barriers to trade and ease frontier formalities between Community countries.

Bankruptcies

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many bankruptcies have occurred in the east midlands since May 1979.

Mr. Fletcher: The total number of bankruptcies administered from May 1979 to December 1984 inclusive by county courts in the east midlands was 2,080.

Kung Fu Weapons (Import)

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take steps to prohibit the import of the kung fu weapon known as death stars; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: There is no justification for a ban on such imports since the misuse of such articles is adequately covered by existing criminal legislation.

Tourism

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, pursuant to the answer of 25 March, he will list the current obstacles to the further success of tourism in Great Britain.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Manufacturing (Investment)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list, by region, the level of investment in manufacturing industry for the years 1979 to 1984, expressed in 1979 prices.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Exchange Risk Guarantee Scheme

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the future of the exchange risk guarantee scheme.

Mr. Norman Lamont: On 18 December I announced that the exchange risk guarantee scheme for loans from the European Investment Bank and the European Coal and Steel Community would be extended until 31 March 1985. The future of the scheme was to be reviewed in the light of the recently introduced changes in regional industrial policy. That review is nearly complete and I hope to be able to announce the Government's decision shortly. In the meantime, applications for cover under the scheme will continue to be accepted.

British Overseas Trade Board

Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is satisfied that the reallocation of British Overseas Trade Board resources since 1979, reducing support for overseas trade fairs and increasing support for the overseas projects fund and the market entry guarantee scheme, has assisted small United Kingdom manufacturing companies to increase their exports.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to the reply, 27 March 1985]: I would expect the changes to BOTB services since 1979 to have helped small United Kingdom manufacturing companies to increase their exports but it is not possible to demonstrate a direct relationship. The market entry guarantee scheme is aimed very specifically at helping smaller firms; the support for trade fairs, gross expenditure on which from 1979 to date has been broadly maintained in real terms, also helps many small firms; and the overseas projects fund, while aimed directly at firms seeking major contracts, benefits a large number of smaller firms associated with the work as subcontractors and in other ways. This scheme's share of the overall budget this year is less than that in 1979-80.

TRANSPORT

Departmental Achievements

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list his Department's principal achievements since 1979.

Mr. Ridley: The Government have increased competition in transport to promote better services to customers and greater efficiency.

The 1980 Transport Act deregulated the long distance express coach market, leading to a substantial number of new coach services and reduction in fares. The Public Transport Bill will remove restrictions on competition in the provision of local bus services throughout Great Britain (except for the time being in London) while maintaining standards of safety. The structure of the bus industry will be changed, including the privatisation of the NBC, to remove the dominance of very large public sector operators and to allow competitors an opportunity to enter the market. These proposals will end 50 years of protection and reverse the decline of the bus industry.

The Civil Aviation Act 1980 required the Civil Aviation Authority to give greater emphasis to competition between British airlines and to give users' interests equal ranking with those of airlines. The White Paper, "Airline Competition Policies", underlines the Government's commitment to this policy and the promotion of a sound and competitive multi-airline industry in Britain. We have obtained the agreement of the overseas countries concerned so that British Caledonian's exchange of routes with British Airways can go ahead on 31 March. As a result, British Caledonian will be strengthened and will be better placed to exploit new opportunities. We have also encouraged the development of services at our regional airports; Manchester in particular is becoming a major hub for both domestic and international services, with 17 new routes opening this year, including New York and Hong Kong. The Government have welcomed the Civil Aviation Authority's proposals for liberalising domestic services which, on many domestic routes, should enable airlines to operate in a virtually free market.

We have carried forward our commitment to the liberalisation of air services within Europe. We welcomed the adoption by the Council of Ministers of the directive on scheduled inter-regional air services although we regretted its limited scope. The Council has now agreed guidelines which, although not as liberal as we hoped, should allow further useful European Community measures to be adopted before too long. In the meantime, we have negotiated with the Netherlands new bilateral arrangements which are by far the most liberal in Europe. This and liberal arrangements we have recently negotiated with the Federal Republic of Germany and Luxembourg are already leading to improved services, lower fares and increased travel. We have secured routes from London to several major European destinations for a second United Kingdom carrier and have opened up the London-Hong Kong route to British Caledonian and Cathay Pacific in addition to the existing British Airways service.

In other discussions within Europe, the Government have been pursuing vigorously their commitment to liberalise road freight. The European Community has agreed to double the existing quota by 1989 and to work towards the elimination of quota restrictions. We have also achieved significant increases in permits in other bilateral discussions. The Government are continuing to pursue their policy that world shipping markets should be kept open to competition. In particular, we are taking a leading role in the efforts to secure an agreement between the consultative shipping group countries and the United States on competitive access to each other's ocean shipping trades; we will be striving within the European Community to achieve a liberalisation of the internal shipping market on the basis of proposals put forward by the Commission and we will soon be acceding to the United Nations code of conduct for liner conferences in the context of the Community Brussels package.

We have substantially extended opportunities for the private sector within the transport field. The National Freight Corporation was sold in 1982 to a consortium of its own managers and employees and is now operating more profitably. Associated British Ports has also made a good start in the private sector. We have sold 37 our of 38 English motorway service area leases, earning £50 million and leading to better, more competitive services to motorists. British Rail's hotel, ferry and hovercraft activities have all been privatised, and more than £300 million of non-operational property has been sold. Legislation has been passed to privatise British Airways. In 1981 the design and supervision work on motorway and trunk road schemes worth over £2,000 million was transferred to private firms of consulting engineers and work on further schemes valued at over £700 million has since been placed with private firms.

The Government have encouraged a more competitive approach and greater efficiency within the public transport industries. In October 1983 we gave the chairman of the Railways Board clear and realistic objectives for his business. These included achieving a reduction of over 20 per cent. in real terms in the requirement for PSO grant by 1986 while providing attractive and reliable services to customers; we also made clear that we did not wish BR to embark on a programme of major route closures. With our encouragement, BR has established a firm policy on competitive tendering; and it has also drawn up criteria for assessing proposals for the introduction of competition for the provision of support services to the railway.

The London Regional Transport Act has established a better organisation for public transport in London. I have given the chairman of LRT objectives for his business including more attractive bus and underground services; involvement of other public and private operators; and improving value for money for passengers, ratepayers and taxpayers. I have set a tough but realistic financial target to halve revenue subsidy by 1987-88. The successful drive on efficiency by the new board of LRT has already resulted in a planned reduction in revenue support for 1985-86 by some £60 million, allowing increased investment while holding the ratepayer levy to some £50 million less than the amount of the GLC's budgeted grants to LRT in 1984-85. I have approved the formation of LRT's operating companies—London Bus Limited (LBL) and London Underground Limited (LUL)—which commence trading on 1 April 1985. Better co-ordination between LRT's and British Rail's services for London is being achieved.

The Transport Act 1983 requires PTEs to invite tenders for operation of any service or ancillary function where suitable, and under other provisions of the Act we have issued statutory guidance to the metropolitan county councils on the level of public transport revenue support so helping to protect ratepayers from unreasonably high public transoprt subsidies.

We have approved investment to improve services to the travelling public. Since 1979, BR has invested some £2 billion plus about £100 million each year installing continuous welded rail. Major schemes authorised by the Government include the electrification of the ECML and new builds of locomotives, coaching stock, and multiple units. Capital investment by LRT has been increased by some £45 million in 1985-86. An extension of LRT's Piccadilly line to Heathrow terminal 4 is under construction, as is the Docklands light railway costing some £77 million. We have approved the construction and financing of new passenger terminals and other improvements at Heathrow and Gatwick airports; we have also maintained a high level of provision for capital investment at regional airports.

Progress with the motorway and trunk road construction programme has been very good. The spending cuts in the programme made by the last Labour Administration have been reversed; expenditure is now running at 30 per cent. in real terms above the level in 1979. We have completed more than 480 miles of new national roads, including some 200 miles of motorway, and renewed to modern standards the equivalent of 380 miles of older motorway. Priority has been given to the completion of the M25; the final contracts have been let and the road is on target for completion in 1986. Schemes bypassing 145 towns and villages have been completed and a further 150 bypass schemes are now either under construction or in earlier stages of preparation. Important steps have been taken to promote competition in road construction and maintenance. Fee competition for consultants has been introduced and competition on time taken on site added to price competition for motorway maintenance schemes as an experiment.

We have also given generous support to local authority spending on roads. Transport supplementary grant has been turned into a capital-only grant for roads expenditure; the 1985-86 settlement covered £320 million of accepted expenditure including 289 major schemes.

We have taken action to help elderly and disabled people and to draw attention to their transport needs. In May 1983, my Department organised the mobility road show, a motor show for disabled people, which gave them an opportunity to test drive a wide range of cars. A second mobility road show is to be held later this year.

Good progress has been made in safety and environmental protection. We have introduced a package of measures to improve the safety of the heavy lorry, to make it less environmentally intrusive and to improve its efficiency so minimising the number of lorry journeys. In 1979 and 1984 we introduced noise certification orders giving effect to the latest agreed ICAO aircraft noise certification standards. This policy has contributed to the progressive phasing out by airline operators of non-complying jet aeroplanes and their replacement with quieter ones resulting in a real improvement in the noise climate around United Kingdom airports. We have improved motor cycle training and testing, brought in a new penalty points system for motoring offences, and improved the safety of children in cars. Following a vote in this House we have introduced compulsory front seat belt wearing. We have improved the enforcement of parking regulations and introduced a streamlined and more effective procedure to deal with drinking and driving offences. I have recently announced a review of road traffic law.

Sealink Ferries (Deaths)

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will set out in the Official Report for each of the last six years, the number of people who have died on Sealink ferries plying to and from British ports in respect of (a) British, (b) Belgium, (c) Dutch and (d) French vessels; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The number of people who have died on Sealink ferries registered in the United Kingdom is:

	Number
1979	9
1980	8
1981	*11

	Number
1982	5
1983	5
1984	8

* includes three deaths on vessels not previously identified as part of the Sealink fleet.

Information about foreign registered vessels is not available.

Seafarers' Safety (Persian Gulf)

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Transport how he proposes to seek to ensure that United Kingdom seafarers on foreign ships with foreign ship owners are informed of the risks of sailing into the Persian Gulf;

(2) what steps he proposes to take to seek to ensure the safety and well being of United Kingdom seafarers on foreign ships with foreign ship owners by securing for them the same rights as the seafarers on British ships sailing into the Persian Gulf;

(3) what steps he intends to take to seek to ensure that British seafarers are not coerced into sailing into the Persian gulf war zone;

(4) what advice he currently offers to shipowners as to circumstances in which they should not send their vessels into the Persian Gulf war zone;

(5) if he has any plans to take over from shipowners the responsibility to inform the crews of the dangers of sailing in the Gulf;

(6) if, in the light of increased hostilities, he will issue further and more detailed advice to seafarers sailing into the Persian Gulf;

(7) what assessment he makes of the requirement for more regular updates and detailed information to seafarers sailing into the Persian Gulf such as location, frequency and effects of attacks on civilian shipping;

(8) what action he takes against shipowners who are found to have penalised seafarers for exercising their right not to sail into the Persian Gulf war zone.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have periodically issued guidance to United Kingdom shipowners and seafarers' unions on the situation in the Gulf, most recently on 15 February and in these terms:

> The Iran/Iraq conflict continues to present a threat to shipping in the Gulf. The Government's advice to British shipping companies remains that they should consider the latest information on the situation in the Gulf before deciding to send vessels into the area. It is for the companies to inform their crews about the risks involved. Masters should exercise all necessary vigilance whilst in the Gulf.

I believe that owners and masters are best placed to inform crews of the dangers a voyage to the Gulf may involve and to decide on measures of safety in particular circumstances, and I have no intention of taking over those roles.

The general guidance I issue is reviewed regularly in the light of the latest reports of attacks on shipping. These attacks are, of course, reported on extensively in the press, by radio and by television, in the United Kingdom and abroad. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office has made arrangements for British seafarers to be able also to obtain advice on current situations from diplomatic posts in the areas of potential danger and the services of consular officials are available to seafarers in the usual way.

It is British shipowners' normal practice to inform their crews when a voyage will involve a passage within the Gulf, and the National Maritime Board agreement between the General Council of British Shipping and the seafarers' unions affords seafarers an opportunity to leave a ship if they wish to before it enters the designated war zone. The agreement was reached without intervention by me. I have no powers to enforce its continuance, or to require foreign shipowners to enter into similar arrangements.

DEFENCE

Departmental Achievements

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list his Department's principal achievements since 1979.

Mr. Butler: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) on 9 May 1984 at column 409. Since that date the principal achievements in the field of defence have included the following:

(a) we have sustained our role within NATO and our contribution to both the conventional and the nuclear forces of the Alliance;

(b) we are continuing to enhance the capailities of our armed forces to discharge the four principal roles we perform within the Alliance. The programme for replacing our Polaris strategic nuclear deterrent with Trident in the mid-1990s is proceeding on schedule. We are enhancing the United Kingdom's own defences through the introduction of new and improved equipment and by strengthening our regular and reserve forces. We are further improving the combat effectiveness, sustainability, and equipment of BAOR and RAF Germany, and have introduced, for example, the Saxon armoured personnel carrier, more Challenger tanks, Milan ATGW and Tornado GR1 aircraft into service. We have ordered a number of vessels for the Royal Navy during the year, including the first type 23 frigate, and are continuing to introduce modern and sophisticated weapons and sensors into the fleet;

(c) in concert with our allies, we have taken our part in the modernisation of NATO's intermediate-range nuclear forces, by continuing with the deployment of ground launched cruise missiles in the United Kingdom, following the Soviet Union's failure to accept measures of arms control that would have made this unnecessary. We have also participated in Alliance decisions on shorter-range theatre nuclear weapons that will lead to cuts of one third in the number of nuclear warheads deployed by the Alliance in Europe, resulting in the smallest stockpile in 20 years;

(d) in September 1984 we successfully mounted Exercise Lionheart, in which the largest ever deployment of troops from the United Kingdom to BAOR took place, to test procedures for rapidly reinforcing our forces in the central region;

(e) we have played a major role in seeking to foster greater co-operation between our European and other NATO partners and have participated fully in the increasingly significant activities of the independent European programme group, the Eurogroup and the Western European Union;

(f) we have continued to promote Western defence interests outside the NATO area;

(g) we have assisted in famine-relief operations in Ethiopia;

(h) we have achieved economies in defence procurement and support activities through the more widespread use of competition in defence contracts, and the privatisation or contracting out of activities. Increased efficiency has been pursued by the continuing transfer of resources from the support areas to the front line, and we have continued the steady reduction in numbers of United Kingdom-based civilian staff;

(i) using the powers conferred by the Ordnance Factories and Military Services Act 1984, we have transformed the royal ordnance factories into a company, Royal Ordnance plc, which now operates on a fully commercial basis in the same way as any other company;

(j) we introduced, on 2 January 1985, a major restructuring of the central organisation for defence, designed to provide stronger central control of defence policy, operations and resources, while decentralising day-to-day management responsibilities to the services and to the staff of the procurement executive.

Defence Expenditure

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of gross domestic product is now spent on defence; and how this compares with 1979.

Mr. Butler: Expenditure on defence in the current year, based on the United Kingdom definition of the defence budget, is expected to amount to 5·2 per cent. of GDP. The corresponding figure for 1978-79 was 4·4 per cent.

RAF (Basic Trainer Aircraft)

Sir Patrick Wall asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will release the information on which the Royal Air Force basic trainer decision was reached.

Mr. Lee: As my right hon. Friend explained on 21 March 1985, column 997, cost was the decisive factor in our choice of the Tucano aircraft. However, as my right hon. Friend also explained, we took full account of suitability for the RAF training role as well as the employment opportunities consequent on the RAF order and exports.

Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied that no elements of financial subsidy by the Brazilian Government or by the British Government were contained in the Short Brothers bid to supply the Tucano to the Royal Air Force.

Mr. Lee: As my right hon. Friend explained on 21 March 1985, at column 997, cost was the decisive factor in the choice of the Short Brothers Tucano, and the essential first consideration was value for money for the defence budget. Any element of financial assistance in the Shorts bid is a question that should be addressed to the company or to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Defence how long he estimates it will take before the re-engined Shorts Tucano will be available for flight testing; whether that aeroplane will be taken to royal aircraft establishment, Boscombe Down, for technical evaluation before signature of any purchase contract; and whether any other design changes are anticipated.

Mr. Lee: The re-engined Shorts Tucano will be available for flight testing in about a year.

Subject to completion of negotiations, the contract will be signed very shortly, well before the aeroplane is flown to the aeroplane and armament experimental establishment, Boscombe Down. As my right hon. Friend explained on 21 March 1985, at column 1003, such lack of final testing is a common phenomenon in competitions for defence equipment, and there is no likely reason why the Garrett engine will not prove perfectly satisfactory. No other design changes to the aircraft are currently anticipated.

Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what date, during the week commenced 18 March, British Aerospace submitted a final bid to supply the Pc-9 to the Royal Air Force; and what price was quoted in that submission.

Mr. Lee: On 19 March. It is not the practice to release details of tender bids which are commercially confidential.

Mr. Peter Levene

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence why Mr. Peter Levene, while chairman of United Scientific Holdings and a senior office-bearer of the Defence Manufacturers Association, was asked to approach defence manufacturers with a view to ascertaining their interest in contracts for managing the royal dockyards.

Mr. Butler: In order to establish the likely extent of such interest.

Nuclear Tests (Inquiry)

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will take steps to arrange for the medical records submitted to the National Radiological Protection Board as part of its inquiry into the medical consequences of the British nuclear tests in the Pacific in the 1950s, to be made available in summary form before the board completes its report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: The Ministry of Defence has provided all information required by the National Radiological Protection Board. As stated in my reply to the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) on 21 March 1985, at columns 579-80, service medical records are not required by the NRPB. I understand that it is not the board's intention to produce any form of interim report.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will take steps to make available to the National Radiological Protection Board during its inquiry into the medical consequences of the British nuclear tests in the Pacific in the 1950s the evidence submitted to the Australian Royal Commission examining the same subject.

Mr. Butler: The National Radiological Protection Board has been well aware for some time of the considerable bulk of documentary evidence that has been made available to the Australian Royal Commission. It is free to make any use of this information which it considers necessary.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest estimate of the date by which the National Radiological Protection Board is expected to have completed its study of the medical consequences of the British nuclear tests in the Pacific in the 1950s.

Mr. Butler: It is expected that, as previously announced, the study will be completed in October 1986.

EMPLOYMENT

MINIS (Departmental Benefits)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Employment what estimated financial benefits have been achieved in his Department in 1984-85 by the financial management initiative system.

Mr. Peter Morrison: In line with the two White Papers on financial management in Government Departments — Cmnd. 9058 of September 1983 and Cmnd. 9297 of July 1984—and the published reports on implementation in my Department, considerable progress is being made in introducing new systems to meet the objectives of the financial management initiative.

Much has already been done to increase cost-consciousness with top management review bodies supervising and strengthening efforts to improve efficiency and economy throughout the Department of Employment group. Comparing 1983-84 and 1984-85, the unemployment benefit service, for example, is increasing productivity with the ratio of numbers on its register to staff improving from 114:1 to 122:1; and output per staff unit in the employment division of the Manpower Services Commission is rising from 534 job placings to 615. There are similar improvements in vacancies notified, training applications taken and employment rehabilitation centre throughput. The net cost per person no longer unemployed by virtue of various employment measures has also fallen significantly. The Department of Employment group expects to have reduced permanent staffing by some 2,000 posts between April 1984 and April 1985 with roughly equal numbers coming from the Manpower Services Commission and the rest of the group.

For the future, the new systems will be used increasingly both to control costs better and to set challenging, yet practical, targets for achieving better value for money from the resources at our disposal.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what evidence there is in the survey of youth training scheme providers reported to the last meeting of the Manpower Services Commission's youth training board suggesting that the number of adult workers employed to supervise trainees on mode A of the scheme differs significantly according to the occupational training family of the trainees; and whether he will summarise such evidence.

Mr. Peter Morrison: There is no such evidence.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what new specific vocational opportunities he intends to introduce into the youth training scheme; and what initiatives he plans to promote, to extend the involvement of the private sector and charities in the community programme;

(2) on what factors he bases his estimation that once the second year of training announced in the Budget in respect of the youth training scheme is operational all school leavers under the age of 18 years will have access to a job, training or further education.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list region by region the number of companies which presently employ school leavers under the age of 18 years within the framework of the youth training scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information is not available.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the rate of employment in the service industries in the east midlands as compared with the national rate.

Mr. Alan Clark: In September 1984, the latest date for which information is available, it is estimated that of the 1,419,000 employees in employment in the east midlands, 755,000 or 53 per cent. were employed in the service industries. The corresponding proportion for Great Britain was 64 per cent.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the level of unemployment in Derbyshire at the latest available date; and what was the comparable figure in May 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. On 14 February 1985 the number of unemployed claimants in Derbyshire was 49,681. It is difficult to make a comparison with May 1979, because of the change in the basis of the count in October 1982, the 1983 Budget provisions which mean that some men, mainly aged 60 or over, no longer need to sign on at the unemployment benefit offices to receive benefit, and the change to a ward-based sytem for allocating claimants to localities. The number of registered unemployed in jobcentre areas approximating to Derbyshire in May 1979 was 14,988.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many 18 to 24-year-olds were unemployed in the east midlands in 1979 and 1984.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. The table shows figures for registered unemployed in the east midlands in October 1979, for unemployed claimants in October 1984, and figures for October 1982 on both bases.

The comparison is affected by the change in the basis of the unemployment count in October 1982.

Unemployment in East Midlands—18 to 24 years of age

	Numbers
Unemployed registrants
October 1979	24,332
October 1982	57,697
Unemployed claimants
October 1982	54,021
October 1984	62,309

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the rate of youth unemployment in the east midlands at the latest available date.

Mr. Alan Clark: Unemployment rates by age are calculated at national level only.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people in the east midlands have been unemployed for more than one year at the latest available date.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. On 10 January 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by duration is available, a total of 76,783 claimants in the east midlands region had been unemployed for over one year.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people became unemployed in the east midlands between December 1983 and December 1984.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. In the period between December 1983 and December 1984, on average 23,900 claimants became unemployed each month in the east midlands region, while an average of 22,800 claimants per month ceased to be unemployed.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people were unemployed in the east midlands in 1979 and 1984; and what was the rise in the rate of unemployment in that period.

Mr Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. The average number of unemployed claimants in the east midlands region in 1984 was 193,400 representing an unemployment rate of 12·1 per cent. The corresponding estimate for 1979 was 70,900, an unemployment rate of 4·4 per cent.

The comparison is affected by the 1983 Budget provisions which means that some men, mainly aged 60 years and over, no longer need to sign on in order to receive supplementary benefits or national insurance credits. It is estimated that some 14,600 men in the east midlands were affected.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list, for the latest available date, the current level of unemployment for the 16 to 19 age group by region, and the percentage of the total regional unemployment which this represents.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the Library. The figures relate to unemployed claimants on 10 January 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by age is available.

Unemployment by region—Under 20 years of age

Region	Number unemployed	Percentage of region total
South-East	121,799	15·3
East Anglia	14,243	17·2
South-West	34,877	16·3
West Midlands	60,954	17·1
East Midlands	34,426	16·7
Yorkshire and Humberside	57,250	18·4
North-West	80,230	17·4
North	43,112	17·7
Wales	33,778	18·2
Scotland	71,606	19·8
Northern Ireland	19,389	15·7

Wages Councils Orders

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the approximate number of employers governed by wages councils orders in the east midlands at the latest available date.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: On 1 January 1985 there were 16,500 employers on the Wages Inspectorate's register in the midlands east division.

Agricultural Workers

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will publish in the Official Report the amount paid out in redundancy payments to agricultural workers each year since 1970 and the numbers affected.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Separate figures are not available for this industry. Figures for the agriculture, forestry and fishing industries combined are as follows:

	Amount paid £ million	Number of employees
1972	1·1	4,313
1973	0·9	3,118
1974	1·1	3,038
1975	1·8	4,334
1976	2·2	4,742
1977	2·1	3,743
1978	2·3	3,599
1979	2·5	3,316
1980	4·3	4,670
1981	6·5	7,197
1982	6·1	6,065
1983	7·1	6,291

* 1st Quarter.

Parental and Family Leave

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the proposed European Community directive on parental and family leave; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Government believe that the matters covered by the draft directive are best dealt with between employers and employees according to their own priorities, needs and circumstances, rather than by Government or Community intervention. The Government are also concerned at the potential costs and administrative burdens such a measure would impose on employers and believe that measures of the kind envisaged in the draft directive are not priorities for additional public expenditure.

My Department is today consulting interested parties on the draft directive, and I shall report the outcome to the House.

Textile Industry

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what evidence has been sent to him or to the Manpower Services Commission regarding skill shortages in the textile industry generally, and specifically in hosiery and knitwear; and what discussions are being held with employers and trade unions to seek to overcome any obstacles to the recruitment of labour;

(2) whether he will request the Manpower Services Commission to send a task force to Leicester to prepare a report for him on the difficulties for employers in the hosiery and knitwear industry in filling vacancies for skilled workers; and whether he will request an early report on this matter.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I am aware of the concerns expressed by my hon. Friend and have seen the reports in the Leicester Mercury.

I have therefore asked the Manpower Services Commission to look into the issue as a matter of urgency and to report to me as quickly as possible. Following this investigation, it will be for the commission, in consultation with employers and trade unions, to decide what needs to be done to tackle any problems it may identify in this area. I will, of course, keep my hon. Friend fully informed about developments.

Wages Councils

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment what research he has conducted into the effects of wages councils on employment prospects.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) on 21 February 1985 at column 516.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment what consultations he intends to seek with representatives of the Confederation of British Industry to discuss the expected effects of abolition of wages councils on work forces.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend issued a consultative paper on 21 March setting out broad options for the future of wages councils and seeking views by the end of May. The Confederation of British Industry is amongst the bodies from which comments are being sought.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list (a) the proportion of female and male workers covered by each wages council order and (b) the proportion of full-time and part-time workers covered by each wages council order.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is not available for each wages council. It is estimated that about four fifths of workers covered by wages councils are female and that about two thirds of workers are part-time.

International Labour Convention 26

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment from what bodies he has invited responses to the consultative paper which he issued recently before taking his intended decision in June to deratify International Labour Convention 26.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend has invited a number of bodies representing employers' and employees' interests, as well as other interested organisations and individuals, to comment on the options for the future of wages councils set out in the consultative paper. My right hon. Friend is consulting the Confederation of British Industry and the Trades Union Congress on the Government's proposal to deratify International Labour Convention 26.

Overtime

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has about the current levels of overtime worked in each of the industries covered by wages council orders.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to tables 14, 15, X1 and 47 of the "New Earnings Survey 1984." Copies are available in the Library.

Miners (Unemployment Benefit)

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many cases involving the refusal of unemployment benefit to miners dismissed during and after the recent strike, have been brought to the attention of the adjudication officer by his Department; what action has been taken in those cases where the adjudication officer has made a ruling; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information about the number of cases is not readily available and can be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The subsequent action taken on benefit claims would depend upon the decision given by the adjudication officer.

Unemployed Young Persons

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether discussions have taken place between his Department and the Manpower Services Commission over financial responsibility for unemployed 16 and 17-year-olds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

ENVIRONMENT

Equal Opportunities Officer

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will now appoint a departmental equal opportunities officer with responsibility for co-ordinating the Civil Service policy of non-discrimination within his Department.

Sir George Young: Two such officers were designated for my Department in November 1984, one of them with specific responsibilities for staff in the Property Services Agency.

Rate Support Grant

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the accumulated reduction in rate support grant since 1978-79 in England at 1985-86 prices breaking down the figures between (a) 1978-79 and 1979-80, (b) 1978-79 and 1980-81, (c) 1978-79 and 1981-82, (d) 1978-79 and 1982-83, (e) 1978-79 and 1983-84, (f) 1978-79 and 1984-85 and (g) 1978-79 and 1985-86.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Rate support grant in England at 1985-86 prices for the years 1978-79 to 1985-86 was as follows:

	£ million
1978-79	12,226
1979-80	11,733
1980-81	11,623
1981-82	10,196
1982-83	9,565
1983-84	9,205
1984-85	8,585
1985-86	8,489

Merseyside Development Corporation

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the latest data on the expenditure to date by the Merseyside development corporation; and if these data can be divided as to whether the expenditure was undertaken on the Liverpool or Wirral side of the Mersey.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The expenditure to date by the Merseyside Development Corporation is £76·4 million. Of this amount, £73·3 million has been spent on the Liverpool side of the Mersey and £3·1 million on the Wirral side. I continue to seek ways to resolve the difficulties over those parts of the Birkenhead docks which lie within the MDC's designated area.

Construction (Expenditure Statistics)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has concerning per capita expenditure on construction in the latest year for which figures are available in United States dollar equivalents in the following countries: the United Kingdom, Canada, France, Japan, the Federal Republic of Germany and the United States of America.

Mr. Gow: I shall answer this question shortly.

Play Projects

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the Government's policy on funding permanent play projects under the traditional urban programme with particular reference to (a) existing play projects when they become time expired and (b) new play projects submitted for funding under the traditional urban programme.

Sir George Young: It is for local authorities to consider the long-term revenue funding of projects which they submit for initial support under the traditional urban programme. The urban programme offers capital resources, and revenue support for a limited term. When projects become time expired, they may be resubmitted for a further period of support. Applications for both new and time expired projects are considered on their merits against alternative possible uses for the available funds in terms of the extent to which they address special needs, the priority given them by the local authority, and the level of deprivation locally.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement about the arrangement for the transfer of the property rights and liabilities of the Greater London council and metropolitan county councils to successor authorities on abolition.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have today deposited in the Library of the House a copy of a memorandum containing the Government's proposals for the transfer of property rights and liabilities of the GLC and metropolitan county councils. This reflects the principles set out in the White Paper, "Streamlining the Cities" (Cmnd. 9063), and developed in "the Yellow Book" of July 1984.

Copies have been sent today to the local authorities concerned, and to other interested bodies, with a request for comments by the end of April. Further copies of the memorandum are obtainable from my Department.

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement about the future of the Greater London council's central purchasing unit in the event of the abolition of that council.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: In my statement in November about common specialist services, I said that their future was in the hands of successor authorities, but that my Department would use its good offices in considering how worthwhile services could be maintained if there was a demand for this.

It is clear that there is a general interest in the provision of a central purchasing service, probably under the aegis of ILEA, but equally that there are other practicable arrangements which are being considered.

The new ILEA will need to make its own purchasing arrangements. It could well be in its interests to continue to supply others, including London boroughs which have been using the unit. It would take some time for these authorities to set up other purchasing arrangements and they will soon need to start taking decisions. The Government hope that ILEA will open discussions with them as soon as possible, in the interests of the staff concerned and before the viability of the present unit comes into question.

My Department and that of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science continue to stand ready to use their good offices to that end.

Ministers' Offices (Staffing and Maintenance)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the total cost of staffing and maintenance of Ministers' offices in his Department for each year since 1979-80.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985]: The estimated total cost (at 1984-85 prices) of staffing Ministers' offices in the Department of the Environment for each year since 1979-80 is as follows:

	£ million
1979-80	0·858
1980-81	0·880
1981-82	0·831
1982-83	0·771
1983-84	0·817
1984-85	0·879

HOME DEPARTMENT

Detention Centres

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give details of the treatment that detention centre inmates will receive during the first week of their sentence under the extended short, sharp shock regime.

Mr. Mellor: Copies of a note summarising the main features of the new regime were placed in the Library and the Vote Office on 13 February 1985.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Home Office will be monitoring the effect of the extension of the short, sharp shock regimes to all detention centres.

Mr. Mellor: The new regime in detention centres is being covered under the general arrangements for operational oversight and statistical monitoring of young offender establishments.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the categories of offenders sentenced to periods at detention centres who will be excluded from the short, sharp shock regime.

Mr. Mellor: The new regime is in operation in all detention centres in England and Wales. All new receptions at detention centres have a thorough medical examination, and where an inmate appears to be unfit the medical officer is able to direct what restrictions should be placed on his activities or, if necessary, arrange for his admission to an outside hospital.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received any allegations of assault or mistreatment of inmates at Aldington detention centre.

Mr. Mellor: Recent allegations of staff misconduct at Aldington have been referred to the police for investigation.

Parole

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners, who were eligible for parole following the exercise of the powers contained in section 33 of the Criminal Justice Act 1982, had not been considered for parole by the time of their earliest release date in 1984 by the Prison Department.

Mr. Mellor: I am not aware of any eligible inmate who had not been considered for parole by his earliest date of release in 1984. If the hon. Member has any particular case in mind, perhaps he will write to me about it.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the criteria which are used by the Home Office to determine exceptions to the new parole regulations.

Mr. Mellor: Parole cases are considered on their individual merits. It is not possible to specify the circumstances that may be found to be exceptional.

Time Trials

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he hopes to introduce time trials to determine the length of statutory limit for remands; and if he will make a statement about the nature of those trials.

Mr. Mellor: We hope after consultation to begin the field trials later this year. We are considering their precise form and the areas where they should be held. The trials will be designed to test the feasibility and effectiveness of particular time limits, both generally and in relation to variations in the courts' work load between different areas; their implications for all concerned in the operation of the criminal justice process; and the procedures required to ensure and check compliance with such limits. My right hon. and learned Friend will ask prosecutors and the courts in the areas selected to arrange for cases to be brought to committal or trial as if the time limits which he will specify for the purpose of the trials were operative. Although under the field trials no legal consequences will follow from failure to comply with a time limit, arrangements will be made to identify those cases and to asses whether under the statutory scheme there would have been grounds for extending the limit.

Prisoners (Correspondence)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department in respect of which categories of prisoners correspondence to and from (a) Members of Parliament, (b) social workers, (c) probation officers and (d) legal advisers the correspondence is photocopied.

Mr. Mellor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to his questions on 25 March at columns 14-15. A prisoner's security category is not a relevant consideration, except to the extent that there is a relaxation of censorship in open establishments.

P5 Division

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the functions of P5 division of his Department; and in what circumstances this division liaises with the police.

Mr. Mellor: P5 division forms part of the directorate of operational policy in the prison department of the Home Office. Its role is to carry out various duties in relation to the following: prison security and control, the effective use of prison accommodation, policy and casework on unsentenced prisoners, fire precautions in prison department establishments, the transport of prisoners to court and between establishments, the security of custody areas in Crown court buildings, the production of prisoners at court in certain circumstances—for example, where a prisoner is a party to civil proceedings—planning for emergencies, prison statistics and the management of the prison dog service. In many of these functions there is naturally close liaison between the division and the police.

Terrorism (Deaths)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of deaths which have occurred in England and Wales for the years 1983 and 1984, respectively, connected with the present civil unrest in Northern Ireland; and how many of these deaths were caused by action taken by the police and each of the known terrorist or paramilitary groups.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to his question on 1 February at column 331.

Electoral Divisions (Shire Counties)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish a list of all the county electoral divisions or wards within the 39 English shire counties, identifying the district councils in which these divisions are situated.

Mr. Mellor: No such list exists at present and it could be compiled only at disproportionate cost. Copies of the relevant county electoral arrangemens orders are sent to the headquarters of all the major political parties.

Kung Fu Weapons

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received advocating legislation to stop the sale of weapons such as the kung fu weapon known as death stars.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Police National Computer

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why details of stolen construction plant and machinery are not placed upon the police national computer.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Details of some items of stolen construction plant and machinery are held on the police national computer.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those types of stolen goods, details of which are placed upon the police national computer.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The police national computer holds records of the following types of stolen property:

1. All vehicles.
2. Trailers, caravans and sidecars.
3. Plant including attachments and agricultural machinery.
4. Marine engines and outboard motors.

Police Cadets (Training)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will issue guidance to chief constables to ensure that police cadets are given adequate training in dealing with the theft of construction plant and machinery from construction sites.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Police cadets are appointed to undergo training with a view to becoming members of a police force, and it is not appropriate for them to be employed on operational duties needing police powers. The training provided for probationer constables covers a wide range of crime and crime prevention matters, and is kept under review to meet current needs. Dealing with plant and machinery theft is essentially an operational matter, and it is for individual chief officers of police to ensure that adequate measures are taken in each force.

Prevention of Terrorism (Advisers)

Mr. Mark Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has appointed any new advisers under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984.

Mr. Brittan: Mr. Henry Brooke QC has agreed to act as my adviser under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984, in addition to Mr. Hugh Carlisle QC and Sir Brian Bailey OBE, J.P.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Milk (School Supplies)

Mr. Jim Spicer asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the quantity of milk currently being supplied to each local education authority under European Economic Community regulations.

Mr. MacGregor: Quantities of school milk on which EC subsidy was claimed by local education authorities and local authorities in Great Britain during the 1983-84 school year, the latest for which figures are available, were as follows.

Quantities of whole milk for which subsidy was claimed by local education authorities for the school year 1983-84 (all figures in gallons)

Equal Opportunities Officer

Mr. Janner asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will now appoint a departmental equal opportunities officer with responsibility for co-ordinating the Civil Service policy of non-discrimination within his Department.

Mr. Jopling: A grade 5 officer in my Ministry was designated in February 1984 as equal opportunity officer, with responsibility for advising on the full scope of equal opportunity matters as they concern race and sex discrimination.

Salmon

Mr. Onslow asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action his Department has taken since 1979 to counter the threat to salmon stocks from (a) illegal netting, (b) predation, (c) pollution, (d) water abstraction, and (e) from poaching, respectively; and what action his Department takes to monitor salmon stocks.

Mr. MacGregor: In England and Wales responsibility for the control, maintenance and development of salmon fisheries is vested in the water authorities by the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975. Since 1979 we have confirmed many byelaws and orders made by English water authorities to control salmon fishing and protect salmon stocks.

Our consultation paper on the review of inland and coastal fisheries in England and Wales published in 1981 recognised illegal netting and poaching as a major problem and reactions to that document indicated widespread support for some kind of salmon sales control scheme. We have carried out a very thorough review of the proposals by the salmon sales group of the National Water Council for a salmon tagging scheme and this has indicated some serious practical difficulties over the implementation of such a scheme, including control of imports, the handling of our own farmed salmon and the control of tags. These difficulties, together with other aspects of salmon sales control, are under urgent examination and I will make an announcement as soon as we have been able to reach conclusions.

In January this year my Department and the Welsh Office jointly issued a booklet entitled "Code of Good Agricultural Practice" designed both to minimise the risks of pollution from farming practices and to give guidance on good agricultural practice for the purposes of section 31(2)(c) of the Control of Pollution Act 1974. In 1984, following a joint working party on which my Department and the Department of the Environment were represented, the National Farmers Union issued two booklets for fish farmers advising on standards of good husbandry and safe use of chemicals. Following a visit I made with my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Scottish Office, to the Solway area last year, a working party of the North West Water Authority and the Annan District Salmon Fisheries Board has been set up, with the co-operation of the Fisheries Departments, to examine whether joint arrangements can be worked out to control salmon fishing and reduce illegal netting in this area.

In 1981 the Government commissioned a study by the Natural Environment Research Council on the interaction between grey seals and fisheries. A report was published last year and the findings arre still being considered by the conservation and fisheries organisations directly concerned, including those with a particular interest in salmon. Last year the water authorities raised with us the possibility of a ban on fishing in times of drought. My offiicals are considering this possibility, but there is considerable doubt whether existing legislation provides the powers to implement bans at short notice. We shall be holding further discussions with the water authorities on this matter.

In order to monitor salmon stocks, my fisheries scientists collect and collate data supplied by the water authorities relating to both restocking and catching (by all means) of salmon. Data for 1983 will be published shortly in our Fisheries Laboratory Data Research series and a copy will be placed in the Library of the House.

Badgers

Mr. Soames asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what evidence he has that badgers are carriers of bovine tuberculosis.

Mrs. Fenner [pursuant to her reply, 28 March 1985]: Post mortem examinations of badgers taken in official investigations have revealed evidence of infection by bovine tuberculosis in over 1,500 animals. Tubercular lesions have frequently been found in lymphatic glands and in the lungs and occasionaly in the kidneys and other organs. Mycobacterium bovis has been isolated from all these sites and from samples of sputum, faeces and bite wound pus. Details of these studies have been published in appropriate scientific journals.

Mr. Soames asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many badgers were killed in each of the last three years under the anti bovine tuberculosis campaign.

Mrs. Fenner [pursuant to her reply, 28 March 1985]: The numbers of badgers taken in official investigations are as follows:

1982—1,005
1983—1,239
1984—1,333 (provisional)

The figure for 1982 excludes badgers killed by gassing before the suspension of gassing in June of that year.

African Swine Fever

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he is taking to check the import of meat products from Spain and Belgium in the light of the nine confirmed outbreaks of African swine fever in Belgium close to the Dutch border.

Mrs. Fenner [pursuant to her reply, 28 March 1985]: We introduced an immediate ban on imports from Belgium of pigmeat products which might give rise to risk when the first outbreaks of African swine fever were confirmed in that country. Subsequently, when the situation became clearer, all member states of the European Community agreed on co-ordinated action on similar lines in relation to the affected area. Imports from other parts of Belgium are subject to checks at the ports of entry.

Imports of pigmeat and pigmeat products from Spain were already banned for other animal health reasons.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Board and Lodging Regulations

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has had from the National Association of Probation Officers about his Department's proposals to alter board and lodging regulations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney The National Association of Probation Officers was one of the bodies which made representations to the Social Security Advisory Committee on our proposals for supplementary benefit board and lodging payments. In finalising the regulations now laid in draft before the House, we took account of the views of the Social Security Advisory Committee and the representations received.

Housing Benefit

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate how many tenants in each of the housing authorities in Wales will experience a diminished weekly housing benefit as the result of the new regulations published on 19 March; how many of those affected have already experienced a decrease in housing benefit in April 1984 and November 1985; and how many so affected are (a) pensioners and (b) handicapped people living in sheltered accommodation,

Mr. Whitney: I regret that the information on which to base the estimates requested is not available.

Social Security Reviews

Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to publish the recommendations of his social security reviews.

Mr. Whitney: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) on 12 March at column 107.

Resettlement Units (Costs)

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the average cost per bedspace per week in each of the resettlement units operated by his Department.

Mr. Whitney: The average cost per bedspace per week in each of the Department's resettlement units for the year ended 31 March 1984, is given in the table.

Unit	Cost per bed-space (£)
Alvaston (nr. Derby)	66·64
Brighton	102·98
Crown Quay Lodge (Sittingbourne)	101·71
Fazakerley (Liverpool)	104·13
Glasgow	97·38

Benefits and Allowances

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will present in tabular form for each year since 1979 (1) all supplementary benefit (a) claimants and (b) dependants, (2) all supplementary pensions (a) total, (b) retirement pensioners and national insurance widows and (c) other, (3) all supplementary allowances (a) total, (b) unemployed (i) with contributory benefit and (ii) without contributory benefit and (c) sick and disabled (i) with contributory benefit and (ii) without contributory benefit, (4) national insurance widows under 60 years, (5) other one parent families and (6) other claimants.

Mr. Whitney: The information is in the table.

Miners (Benefits)

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will explain the basis upon which miners dismissed during and after the recent strike are subject to a deduction of £16 per week from their social security benefits; what information he has as to the number of claimants affected in this way; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: A person who loses employment because of a stoppage of work which is due to a trade dispute at his place of employment is disqualified for receiving unemployment benefit unless he can show that he is not participating in or directly interested in the dispute, and the disqualification continues until the stoppage ends, unless he earlier becomes bona-fide employed elsewhere. Any supplementary benefit paid in respect of his dependants is subject to the deduction of a specified amount, currently £16 a week. When the stoppage of work ends is a question which has to be decided on the facts and in accordance with caselaw by the independent adjudicating authorities.

Information about the number of dismissed miners affected in this way is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Old People's Homes

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the maximum weekly sum currently payable to his Department's claimants in respect of accommodation at old people's homes; and if he has any plans to review this figure.

Mr. Whitney: Under the currently locally determined limits frozen at the levels applicable at 5 September 1984 the maximum amounts of supplementary benefit allowed for accommodation in residential care homes varies from £55 to £220 a week. Under the proposed new arrangements announced by my hon. Friend on 21 March at column 1008, a new structure of national limits based on different categories of establishments would be introduced as follows:

	Maximum weekly sum £
Residential care homes for the elderly	110
Residential care homes for the mentally ill	120
Residential care homes for drug and alcohol misusers	120
Residential care homes for the mentally handicapped	140
Residential care homes for the physically disabled below pension age	170

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action his Department has taken to ensure that benefit paid to claimants resident in old persons' homes is used for the purposes for which it is granted; and if he will make a statement on his Department's actions in ensuring the protection of the financial interests of such claimants.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the total annual sum by year from 1980 paid to Department of Health and Social Security claimants in respect of residence and maintenance in old persons' homes in Wales.

Mr. Whitney: Separate figures are not available for Wales and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Housing Benefit (Cost)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average payment of housing benefit per council tenant by county in Wales.

Mr. Whitney: The information in the table has been derived from authorities' initial claims for subsidy for the year 1984-85. The average weekly payment of housing benefit for council tenant, and new town tenant, recipients by county in Wales is estimated as follows:

	Certificated cases £	Standard cases £	All cases £

Board and Lodging Payments

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many (a) single people aged 16 or 17 years, (b) single people aged between 18 and 25 years, (c) single people aged between 26 years and retirement age, (d) single people aged over retirement age, (e) couples without dependent children, (f) single parents with one dependent child, (g) single parents with two dependent children, (h) single parents with three or more dependent children, (i) couples with one dependent child, (j) couples with two dependent children, and (k) couples with three or more dependent children in receipt of supplementary benefit were assessed as boarders living in (i) private rented accommodation, (ii) bed and breakfast accommodation and hotels, (iii) hostels and (iv) common lodging houses in: (a) December 1982 and (b) December 1983: and if he will give this information for Great Britain as a whole, and for each social security region.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 25 March 1985, c. 86-87]: Information is not available in the form requested; and reliable estimates for couples and claimants with children cannot be given. The available information is set out in the table.

PRIME MINISTER

Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Prime Minister if she will list all of Her Majesty's Ministers who have taken part in meetings of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council since October 1983 and the dates and locations of such meetings, together with the names of Ministers from the Irish Republic who were present.

The Prime Minister: I met the Irish Taoiseach at Chequers on 7 November 1983 and again on 19 November 1984 within the framework of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council. On both occasions I was accompanied by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. Dr. Garret FitzGerald was accompanied by the Tanaiste, Mr. Dick Spring, TD, and the Irish Minister for Foreign Affairs, Mr. Peter Barry TD. Other meetings under the auspices of the council have taken place as stated on the attached list.

2 November 1983 London	Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and Republic of Ireland Minister for Agriculture (Mr. Austin Deasy TD)
29 November 1983 Dublin	Secretary of State for Transport and Republic of Ireland Minister for Transport (Mr. Jim Mitchell TD)

26 March 1985 Dublin	Under-Secretary of State, Northern Ireland Office and Republic of Ireland Minister for Education (Mrs. Gemma Hussey TD)

Rates

Mr. George Robertson asked the Prime Minister if she will publish figures for the current year's rates increase for a sample of Scottish districts with comparable English local authority areas; and if she will arrange for these statistics to be allowable in appeals against the new revaluations in Scotland.

The Prime Minister: Information on rates in individual local authorities is contained in "Rating Review", which covers Scotland, and in "Finance and General Statistics" for England. Both publications are produced by CIPFA and are available in the Library.

The average domestic rate bill in Scotland, including water rates, in 1984-85 was £328, as compared with £393 in England for domestic rates and water charges. It is estimated that the corresponding figures in 1985-86 will be £397 and £429 respectively.

The fixing of rateable values, and the handling of appeals against the assessors' decisions, have to take account of statutory provisions, and I have no power to intervene in these processes.

Air Services (Far East)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Prime Minister if she will be discussing the current dispute between the Malaysian airline system and British Airways when she makes her official visit to Malaysia on 5 April.

The Prime Minister: I expect to do so. There have been constructive discussions between the two airlines about the scope for increased services, but it must be on the basis of equal opportunity; it will be necessary to resolve the problems created by the discriminatory tax measures introduced by the Malaysian Government.

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Prime Minister whether the subject of air services between Manchester and Colombo by Air Sri Lanka will be on the agenda for discussion during her forthcoming visit to the far east.

The Prime Minister: The Sri Lankan authorities have not indicated that they wish to discuss civil aviation during my visit. Arrangements for air services are usually in the first instance discussed bilaterally between the aeronautical authorities.

School Visits

Mr. Fisher asked the Prime Minister if she will list and date all the visits to schools that she has made during the last 12 months.

The Prime Minister: In the past year I have made visits to schools on two occasions:

21 September 1984 — Maes Garmon comprehensive school, Mold.

15 March 1985—St. Bartholomews, school, Newbury.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Pesticides

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total quantity of organophosphorus pesticides manufactured in the United Kingdom and imported; and if he will make a statement as to its distribution and handling and the present precautions advised by his Department in regard to its handling and usage.

Mrs. Fenner: The manufacture and import of pesticides are matters for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, while the safe handling of pesticides in the distribution trade is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment.

As regards advice on precautions to be taken when the pesticide is used, I should explain that many factors can affect the safety in use of a pesticide and formulated organophosphorus pesticides vary greatly from product to product. The precise active ingredient contained in the product, its concentration and the nature of the formulation (eg liquid, powder or granule) can all affect the safety of the product and hence the precautions which should be taken in handling and using it. Under the pesticides safety precautions scheme all the advice and recommendations necessary to ensure the safe use of a pesticide product, including, where necessary, the appropriate provisions of the Poisonous Substances in Agriculture Regulations, are clearly printed on the product labels.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Forth asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made, or is available to him, of the impact of the possible accession to the European Economic Community of Spain and Portugal on the total level of financial support within the common agricultural policy for wine, olive oil and tomatoes; and what are the implications of the proportion of the total budget of the common agricultural policy represented by this figure in terms of support for dairy products, cereals, beef and sheepmeat.

Mr. Jopling: Estimation of these future costs is beset by a number of major uncertainties about developments between now and the end of the 10-year transition period. Among these are the response of production in the acceding States to changes in national support prices towards Community levels; the evolution of CAP prices themselves in the light of resources available; and the impact on costs of future modifications in individual regimes, notably that for olive oil.

Agricultural Land (Milk Quotas)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has concerning the buying of agricultural land with quota and its subsequent disposal; and if he will estimate the effective value of quota in the market place in terms of £s per tonne of liquid milk.

Mr. Jopling: All transfers of land with quota attached require amendments to the quota registers which the Milk Marketing Board maintain on my behalf. From the forms which producers submit to amend the register it is possible to identify the names and addresses of both parties to the transaction, together with the addresses of all their farms supplying milk, and the amount of quota which has been transferred. When part of a holding has been transferred information on the area of land to which the quota is attached is also collected. No information is collected on the extent to which quotas affect land prices, which is the only way that any asset value of quotas in private transactions can be expressed at present.

Exchange Rate (Budget Calculations)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report the rate of exchange for the dollar against the European currency unit assumed in the 1983 and 1984 budgets, together with the actual rates in those years; and what is the assumed rate for the current year in the current budget.

Mr. MacGregor: The Commission's assumptions on the rate of exchange for the 1983 budget are not available, but the 1984 budget was based on a rate of $1=1·1 ecu. The actual rates in those years were $1=1·1 ecu and $1=1·3 ecu respectively. The 1985 budget has not yet been adopted.

Salmon

Mr. Maclean asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the objections which the salmon farmers' sector of the salmon trade has made to a system of salmon tagging.

Mr. MacGregor: Salmon farmers have said that they are generally opposed to the idea of tagging all Atlantic salmon, including farmed salmon, particularly in view of the difficulties which they see arising over tagging salmon taken from sea cages and the burden they consider it would place on their industry in terms of additional costs and decreased efficiency.

Mr. Maclean asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what proposals he has to reduce the present levels of salmon and sea trout theft by poaching;

(2) what practical problems need to be overcome before a system of salmon tagging is introduced; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: The taking of wild salmon and sea trout by illegal means is a matter to which the Government have given a great deal of attention, including a very thorough examination of the possibilities of controlling salmon sales by a tagging scheme. This has involved discussions with the interested parties which have identified particular difficulties over the successful implementation of such a scheme, including the control of imports, the handling of our own farmed salmon and control over the issue and use of tags. I will make an announcement as soon as we have been able to reach a conclusion.

Butter

Dr. Marek asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he can make of the percentage of European Economic Community intervention butter that was purchased by commercial retail organisations.

Mr. MacGregor: It is unlikely that commercial retail organisations will have purchased butter originating from intervention stocks except under the EC special sale scheme. 142,800 tonnes of intervention butter was made available at the end of 1984 in the Community under this scheme. This is equivalent to 14 per cent of Community interventions stocks of butter in the week that the EC commission regulation authorising the special sale entered into force. This butter was initially made available to packers and importers who are obliged to sell it for direct consumption and in general it will have been sold through commercial retail organisations.

Expenditure (EC)

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for each year since 1973 the total expenditure on each farm product for the European Economic Community as a whole under the common agricultural policy.

Mr. Jopling: The following table sets out the expenditure on each farm product under the guarantee section of the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund from 1973 to 1984. CAP expenditure incurred under the guidance section of the fund is normally not related to specific farm products.

Surplus Farm Products

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all the main European Economic Community farm products in store (surplus) for each of the past five years (a) by quantity, (b) by estimated days' supply and (c) by estimated value for the European Economic Community as a whole and for the United Kingdom separately.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) on 14 January, at column 30. The note referred to in that reply was updated on 13 March and I am sending my hon. Friend a copy. For details of quantities of EC stock levels of previous years I refer my hon. Friend to the further reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) on 23 January, at column 451-52. Recent values of EC and United Kingdom food stocks were given in the reply to the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) on 14 March, at column 423. Information on the value of Community stocks in previous years is provided in the Commission's annual reports on the agricultural situation in the Community which are available in the Library of the House.

I will write to my hon. Friend with the other information as soon as possible.

Milk

Mr. Wainwright asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many days from receipt by milk producers of his most recent offer to them to participate in the outgoers scheme he has allowed for (a) acceptance and (b) for ceasing to produce.

Mr. Jopling: Since 25 March, 187 producers with over 500,000 litres of quota have been invited to join the scheme. All of these had been told during February that if they were invited to join they would be required to stop production within three weeks. On this basis, they had indicated that they still wished to join the scheme. They have therefore now been asked to return their claim forms within one week and to cease milk sales within three weeks.

Prices

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the average market prices and intervention prices (or equivalent) for all the main European Economic Community farm products for each year since 1973 (a) for the European Economic Community as a whole and (b) for the United Kingdom separately.

Mr. Jopling: I will reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Students

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what information he has as to the number of students in the United Kingdom who have received awards from public funds for the purpose of postgraduate study in each of the last 20 years; and what was the total cost;

(2) what information he has as to the number of students in the United Kingdom who have received awards from public funds for the purpose of postgraduate study in each of the last 20 years, by gender;

(3) what information he has as to the number of postgraduate student awards which have been made in each of the last 20 years from public funds from each award-making body.

Sir Keith Joseph: The table provides for Great Britain, in 1982-83 and 1983-84, the number of postgraduate students in receipt of bursaries, studentships and fellowships from the Department and the research councils, and the costs to those bodies thereof.

Similar information for earlier years was published in Statistics of Education (vol. 5) Finance and Awards (HMSO), up to and including 1978-79, and thereafter in "Statistics of Finance and Awards" (DES), copies of which are available in the Library.

‡ Figures for men and women are not available separately in respect of awards made by the Department of Education and Science.

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what information he has as to the number of children of European Communities migrant workers who have received awards from public funds for the purpose of postgraduate study in the United Kingdom in each year since the United Kingdom joined the European Communities; and what was the award-making body;

(2) what information he has as to the number of students from member countries of the European Communities who have received awards from public funds for the purpose of postgraduate studie in the United Kingdom under the provisions of the Education (Fees and Awards) Act; and what was the award-making body in each case.

Sir Keith Joseph: This information is not collected by the Department.

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of Government spending on education in the United Kingdom in each of the last 20 years was represented by awards to postgraduate students.

Sir Keith Joseph: In both 1981-82 and 1982-83, the cost to the Department and the research councils of bursaries, studentships and fellowships to postgraduate students amounted to 0·5 per cent. of the total programme expenditure on education for Great Britain. Later information is not yet available, and that for preceding years could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students deemed to be overseas students have received retrospective awards from public funds for the purpose of postgraduate study in the United Kingdom as a consequence of the judgment given in the House of Lords on 16 December 1982; and what was the award-making body in each case.

Sir Keith Joseph: According to information available to the Department, there has been only one such award made to a postgraduate student. The award-making body in that case was the Scottish Education Department.

Equal Opportunities Officer

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will now appoint a departmental equal opportunities officer with responsibility for co-ordinating the Civil Service policy of non-discrimination within his Department.

Sir Keith Joseph: As was made clear in answers given to the hon. and learned Member on 26 April 1984 and 14 May 1984, at columns 60 and 19 respectively, a departmental equal opportunities officer was appointed within the Department on 30 March 1984. He has responsibility for providing advice on the full scope of equal opportunities' matters as they concern race and sex discrimination.

Multicultural Education

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will introduce legislation to require each local education authority to submit for his approval its policy statement on multicultural education; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: No. It is for individual local education authorities and schools to formulate their response to ethnic diversity in the light of their own circumstances.

"Better Schools"

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if, with reference to paragraph 106 of his White Paper, "Better Schools", Cmnd. 9469, he will publish in the Official Report a list of all those organisations and individuals who have expressed a view to him on the establishment of AS level courses; and which of those have expressed support and which have expressed opposition to the proposal.

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will estimate the additional costs for (a) central Government and (b) local education authorities of implementing his proposals on education of ethnic minority pupils published in Cmnd. 9469, "Better Schools";

(2) if he will estimate the additional costs for local education authorities of implementing his proposals on governing bodies and the legal framework published in Cmnd. 9469, "Better Schools";

(3) if he will estimate the additional costs for implementing his proposals on monitoring published in Cmnd. 9469, "Better Schools";

(4) if he will estimate the additional costs for (a) central Government and (b) local education authorities of implementing his proposals on in-service training published in Cmnd. 9469, "Better Schools";

(5) if he will estimate the additional costs for (a) central Government and (b) local education authorities of implementing his proposals on teaching quality published in Cmnd. 9469, "Better Schools";

(6) if he will estimate the additional costs for (a) central Government and (b) local education authorities of implementing his proposals on education of the under-fives published in Cmnd. 9469, "Better Schools";

(7) if he will estimate the additional costs for (a) central Government and (b) local education authorities of implementing his proposals on examinations and assessment published in Cmnd. 9469, "Better Schools";

(8) if he will estimate the additional costs for (a) central Government and (b) local education authorities of implementing his proposals on primary and secondary education published in Cmnd. 9469, "Better Schools";

(9) if he will estimate what additional expenditure on (a) books, (b) equipment, (c) science equipment and (d) school maintenance will be necessary to implement his proposals in Cmnd. 9469, "Better Schools".

Sir Keith Joseph: The costs to central Government of following-up the objectives set out in the White Paper "Better Schools" (Cmnd. 9469) will fall to be met within the planned provision for the Department of Education and Science and Welsh Office, described in Cmnd. 9428. The costs to local education authorities are discussed in general terms in chapter 11 of Cmnd. 9469. References are also made in other chapers to the resources implications of particular policies and proposals, for example those on the education of the under-fives (paragraph 130), the proposed new specific grant to support local education authority expenditure on most aspects of in-service training (paragraph 176) and the proposed new arrangements for school government (paragraph 262).

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what additional measures and staffing will be required to implement his proposals on monitoring published in Cmnd. 9469, "Better Schools";

(2) what additional staffing will be required to implement his proposals on governing bodies and the legal framework published in Cmnd. 9469, "Better Schools";

(3) what additional resources and staffing will be required to implement his proposals on education of ethnic minority pupils published in Cmnd. 9469, "Better Schools";

(4) what additional resources and staffing will be required to implement his proposals on in-service training published in Cmnd. 9469, "Better Schools";

(5) what additional resources and staffing will be required to implement his proposals on teaching quality published in Cmnd. 9469, "Better Schools";

(6) what additional resources and staffing will be required to implement his proposals on education of the under-fives published in Cmnd. 9469, "Better Schools";

(7) what additional resources and staffing will be required to implement his proposals on examinations and assessment published in Cmnd. 9469, "Better Schools";

(8) what additional resources and staffing will be required to implement his proposals on primary and secondary education published in Cmnd. 9469, "Better Schools";

Sir Keith Joseph: The possible implications for the number of teachers employed by local education authorities of the Government's policies for the schools were explored in the Department's discussion paper "Schoolteacher Numbers and Deployment in the Longer Term", and in the light of that analysis "Better Schools" (Cmnd. 9469) acknowledges that there is a need for some further limited improvement in the overall pupil to teacher ratio for England and Wales. The extent to which this can be achieved, and the pace of any change, must depend on future public expenditure plans.

The employment of non-teaching staff in schools is a matter for individual local education authorities. I look to them to continue to seek greater efficiency in this area taking account, for example, of recent advice from the Audit Commission and within the resources available to support provision in the classroom in pursuance of the policies in Cmnd. 9469.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if, in respect of paragraph 106 of Cmnd. 9469, "Better Schools", he will list those organisations or bodies which have supported or opposed the introduction of the AS level examinations.

Sir Keith Joseph: Over 200 responses were received to the proposals published in May 1984. Those who responded included higher education bodies (the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals, the Standing Conference on University Entrance, the Committee of Directors of Polytechnics, the Council for National Academic Awards and about 15 individual universities and polytechnics); the local authority associations; local education authorities (35); local advisers (5); colleges of further and higher education (20) and schools (about 50); all the GCE boards; the main teachers' associations; subject associations (9); employers' organisations (3); the TUC; professional and learned societies (15); and a variety of other bodies and individuals. No simple tally of those who supported and opposed the proposals is possible because many responses supported some aspects of the proposals while criticising others. Paragraph 105 of the White Paper summarises the tenor of the responses.

Human Embryo Research

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what resources are being made available through the Medical Research Council to finance its voluntary monitoring committee on human embryo research.

Mr. Brooke: The voluntary licensing authority for human in vitro fertilisation and embryo transfer has been set up jointly by the Medical Research Council and the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists. I understand from the MRC that the resources it needs to finance the authority will be found from within the council's grant-in-aid. It is still too early to estimate with any accuracy what the cost will be, but it is likely to be modest.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the members of the voluntary monitoring committee on human embryo research set up by the Medical Research Council.

Mr. Brooke: I understand that the full membership of the voluntary licensing authority set up jointly by the Medical Research Council (MRC) and the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists (RCOG) is as follows:

Chairman: Dame Mary Donaldson, CBE.

MRC Nominees: Anne McLaren, DPhil, FRS—Director, MRC Mammalian Development Unit.

Sir Douglas Black, MD, FRCP—Formerly Professor of Medicine, Manchester University. Formerly Chief Scientist, Department of Health and Social Security. Past President of the Royal College of Physicians.

Professor G. S. Dawes, CBE, DM, FRCP, FRCOG, FRS—Director of Nuffield Institute for Medical Research, Oxford.

Dame Cicely Saunders, DBE, FRCP — Founder and Medical Director, St. Christopher's Hospice.

RCOG Nominees: Professor M. C. Macnaughton, MD, FRCP (Glas), FRCOG, FRSE—President of the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists, Professor of Obstetrics and Gynaecology, Glasgow University.

Professor R. W. Shaw, MD, FRCS, MRCOG—Professor Obstetrics and Gynaecology, Royal Free Hospital School of Medicine, London.

J. D. O. Loudon, MB, ChB, FRCSE, FRCOG — Consultant Obstetrician and Gynaecologist, Edinburgh. Chairman, RCOG Ethics Committee.

Professor W. Thompson, MD, FRCOG — Professor of Midwifery and Gynaecology, Queen's University, Belfast. Chairman, RCOG Fertility Committee.

Joint MRC/RCOG Nominees: Penelope Leach, PhD, DipSocSci — Social Psychologist, Journalist, Broadcaster, Author.

Rev. Professor G. R. Dunstan, FSA—Formerly Professor of Moral and Social Theology, King's College, London. Chaplain to the Queen. Member, RCOG Ethics Committee.

Sir Cecil Clothier, KCB, QC — Formerly Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration. Formerly Health Service Commissioner for England, Scotland and Wales.

Susan Hampshire — Actress, Authoress, Executive Committee of Population Concern.

Secretary: K. I. Gibson, PhD—Medical Research Council Headquarters Office.

Education Welfare Service

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he proposes to issue a circular on school attendance and the role of the education welfare service, as announced on page 7 of the Government response to the second report from the Social Services Committee, Session 1983-84, Cmnd. 9298, and paragraphs 192-3 of the White Paper on "Better Schools", Cmnd. 9469.

Mr. Dunn: As my right hon. Friend said in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) on 22 March at column 626, a draft circular was sent on 21 March to local authority and teacher associations, and other relevant organisations. Copies of the document have been placed in the Library. Comments on the draft have been sought by 30 June. My right hon. Friend hopes that the final version of the circular will be issued soon after that date.

Undergraduate Degree Courses

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the average cost per year to the Exchequer of an undergraduate degree course, including maintenance.

Mr. Brooke: It is not possible to identify separately the costs of courses for undergraduates, nor to identify precisely the share of the cost of courses met from Exchequer funds. Approximate average annual expenditure per student for the financial year 1982-83 (the latest year for which information is available) was about £5,200. This figure is composed of the average institutional expenditure per student for universities in Great Britain and polytechnics and other major institutions of advanced further education in England, plus the average maintenance allowance per student for mandatory award holders.

Teachers (Statistics)

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of teachers in schools are graduates in the age groups (a) under 30, (b) 30 to 40, (c) 40 to 50 and (d) over 50 years.

Mr. Dunn: The proportions of full-time qualified teachers in maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools in England and Wales on 31 March 1984 who were graduates are as follows:

Age	Percentage
Under 30	72
30 and under 40	47
40 and under 50	32
50 and over	23

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science: (1) what proportion of teachers of (a) physics, (b) chemistry and (c) biology in secondary schools are graduates;

(2) what proportion of mathematics teachers in (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools are graduates.

Mr. Dunn: No information is available about the proportion of graduates among mathematics teachers in primary schools. Information from the the 1977 sample survey of staffing in maintained secondary schools in England and Wales indicated that of the full-time teachers recorded as teaching those subjects the approximate percentages who were graduates were, for mathematics, physics and chemistry respectively: 45; 70; 75. Comparable information is not readily available for teachers of biology.

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of teachers in (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools are graduates; and what were the figures for 1979 and 1974.

Mr. Dunn: The proportions of full-time qualified teachers in maintained schools in England and Wales who were graduates are as follows:

Year (at 31 March)	Primary (including Nursery) Schools	Secondary Schools
	per cent.	per cent.
1974	7	40
1979	13	48
1984	22	58

Graduate Teachers

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proposals he has to increase the proportion of graduate teachers in schools.

Mr. Dunn: The Government's policy is to move as quickly as possible towards an all-graduate teaching profession. Since 1980, with a limited number of exceptions, entry to initial teacher training has been through courses which are either designed for graduates on entry or lead to degree level qualifications. As a result, all new entrants to the teaching profession are now normally graduates. The Government commend the efforts made by many serving teachers who trained on non-graduate certificate courses to obtain in-service bachelor of education qualifications.

TRANSPORT

Taxis (Deregulation)

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Transport if the Government have received any representations concerning the greater deregulation of taxis.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have received over 500 representations concerning the Government's proposals for the taxi industry.

Singapore Airlines (Manchester Airport)

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the most recent representation which he has received from Singapor Airlines about its request for landing rights in Manchester; and what response he is making.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have not had a formal approach from Singapore Airlines since September 1984. I am however considering an approach which I received on 18 March from the Singapore Government about the proposed Singapore Airlines service to Manchester.

Road Accident Statistics

Mr. Hill asked the Secretary of State for Transport what were the numbers of fatal and non-fatal road traffic accidents, respectively in Hampshire, caused by excessive intake of alcohol, for the 12 months ended December 1984; and what were the comparative figures for 1983.

Mrs. Chalker: Causes of accidents are not identified in statistical reports. The numbers of injury accidents in Hampshire in which a driver gave a positive breath test were as follows:

	1983	1984 (Jan-Oct)
Fatal Accidents	7	9
Other Injury Accidents	333	307

Motor Cycles (Fairings)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation to make it mandatory for manufacturers of motor cycles to fit energy absorbing fairings on the machines.

Mrs. Chalker: Research into energy absorbing devices for motor cycles is currently being conducted by the transport and road research laboratory. The devices being investigated include fairings for the protection of the rider's lower limbs. The research is not sufficiently far advanced for mandatory application to be considered at present.

Under-run Guards

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to introduce a requirement for front under-run guards on commercial vehicles.

Mrs. Chalker: My Department's transport and road research laboratory is conducting practical tests on the effectiveness of front under-run guards, and when the results are available I shall consider whether these devices should be required on all new lorries.

M4 Motorway

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the stretches of the M4 motorway at present without a crash barrier and the dates such crash barriers are scheduled for installation.

Mrs. Chalker: The whole of M4 in England has central reserve safety fencing installed in accordance with normal standards.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to increase the traffic carrying capacity of the M4 motorway between London and Reading.

Mrs. Chalker: The M4 motorway is at present being widened between the Heathrow Spur (juntion 4) and the new M25 interchange. I have no plans for further improvement at this stage but the capacity of the remainder of the motorway between London and Reading will be kept under review.

East London Assessment Study

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what he estimates will be the cost of the East London assessment study which he has set up;

(2) what will be the cost to the taxpayer of his employing (a) Ove Arup and Partners, (b) Llewelyn Davies Planning and (c) Lovejoy and Partners as consultants for the East London assessment study.

Mrs. Chalker: This will depend upon how much work the successive stages of the studies require and the extent to which the GLC and the boroughs make available relevant data.

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Transport if the questionnaire issued by the consultants for the East London assessment study has been distributed on the basis of a random sample or as quota sample; and if anyone is responsible for checking the statistical validity of the sample.

Mrs. Chalker: I understand that the consultants have distributed leaflets inviting views on transport-related problems to as many as possible of the households within the study area and have also invited views in general advertisements.

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will instruct the consultants carrying out the East London assessment study to seek advice from independent consultants versed in survey techniques.

Mrs. Chalker: I am satisfied they have access to all the relevant skills necessary.

A52

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the latest position regarding the proposed bypass of the A52 trunk road at Bottesford, Leicestershire; and when a date for any public inquiry will be announced.

Mrs. Chalker: Draft line, side roads and compulsory purchase orders are due to be published during the summer of this year. If a public inquiry is necessary, the date will be announced about two months before it is due to start.

Bus Services

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Transport what are his intentions in dealing with cross subsidisation of bus services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) on 14 January, at column 50.

South Stack

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 21 March, Official Report, column 542, when the report of his Department's inquiry into the disappearance of the South Stack in the North sea was completed; on what date he received a copy of the report; what evidence the report adduces to suggest that the most probable reason for the vessel's loss was capsizing; whether the inquiry had available to it any evidence of the presence of British or other submarines in the vicinity of the South Stack immediately prior to her loss; and if he will make available a copy of the report to the hon. Member for Warrington, North.

Mr. David Mitchell: The inspector's report on the disappearance of the South Stack in the North sea was completed on 19 January 1984.

At the time of the vessel's disappearance the weather was good and there was no distress signal. Both facts suggest a sudden catastrophe such as capsizing.

The vessel was less than 12 metres in length and therefore did not come within the scope of the survey and certification regulations. It was, however, surveyed for insurance purposes by an independent surveyor. The vessel was known to carry two tons of permanent ballast but there is no record of the adequacy of its stability. It had been fitted for stern trawling and the outriggers are believed to have been subsequently extended. Such arrangements in small vessels can give rise to dangerous heeling forces when carrying the weight of gear and fish, particularly if the gear becomes snagged on the sea-bed. At the time of the loss there was no evidence of the presence of any submarine in the vicinity.

In accordance with normal practice a copy of the factual statement based on the inspector's report has been made available to the next of kin.

Air Services (Far East)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the dispute existing between the Malaysian airline system and British airways.

Mr. Ridley: I have nothing to add to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister today.

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received concerning the Britain-Singapore air service agreement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I am considering an approach which I received on 18 March about the proposed Singapore Airlines service to Manchester.

Motorways (Repairs and Construction)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list in the Official Report all planned motorway repairs and construction work in April; and if he will detail all planned work for the next six months.

Mrs. Chalker: I have placed in the Library of the House a copy of my Department's major motorway maintenance programme for 1985-86. That provides the information my hon. Friend is seeking on motorway maintenance.

In addition, during the first half of 1985-86 the following major improvements to the network will be in progress:

Motorway	Junction numbers	Details of work	Timing
M4	4-5	Addition of fourth lane in each direction	In progress, completion December 1985
M5	4-5	Addition of third lane in each direction; construction of M5/M42 junction.	In progress completion mid 1987
M6	4-5	Construction of M6/M42 junction	In progress, completion early 1986

A21

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to improve the A21 between Sevenoaks and Hastings; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: We have schemes in our national programme for bypasses of Pembury, Lamberhurst and Robertsbridge, at different stages of preparation. Three smaller improvements — at the southern end of the Tonbridge bypass, at Lindridge north of Lamberhurst, and Coopers Corner, north of Hurst Green—are included in the regional programme.

In addition, I shall be taking account of the results of a comprehensive study into further measures which might be needed along the A21 between Tonbridge and Hastings, in our current review of the trunk road programme.

Second Severn Crossing

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the progress of the study for a second Severn crossing.

Mr. Ridley: On 7 February 1984 I announced the setting up of the study and I have today published the report on the first phase which has been received from the consultants Messrs. W. S. Atkins & Partners and G. Maunsell & Partners. Copies of the report have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

As my hon. Friend informed the House on 13 December 1984 at column 578, many possibilities have been investigated for the location and type of river crossing and the link roads to the M4-M5 motorways. The consultants recommended for further study nine crossing options together with 21 route options for linking a new crossing to the existing highway network. The recommended crossing options are all situated south west of the existing bridge and north of Avonmouth and include a mix of bridges, driven tunnels and immersed tunnels.

They fall into three broad corridors—one between the existing bridge and the Dun Sands, one across the English Stones and the third corridor south of the English Stones but to the north of Avonmouth.

I agree with the consultants' recommendation not to consider further possible crossings north of the existing crossing nor south of Avonmouth. Also as the options in the third corridor are clearly more expensive in terms of capital costs I have decided it would be wrong to pursue these options further, and that it is fair to remove now any uncertainty in the minds of those who may fear planning blight.

Approval has been given to the consultants continuing further detailed work on the recommended options in the first two corridors. They will be having further consultations with interested local authorities and other bodies.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authority

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the sources of finance for (a) gross and (b) net capital expenditure by local authorities in total in England for each year from 1974 to 1985.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin Based on returns from local authorities, the information requested for England is as follows, where net capital expenditure equals gross capital expenditure less capital receipts. Information for 1984-85 is not yet available.

Spending Targets

Mr. Foster asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the local authority associations to discuss spending targets for the financial years 1985-86 and 1986-87.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend discussed the 1985-86 expenditure targets, and other aspects of the 1985-86 rate support grant settlement, with the local authority associations on 11 December 1984, at a meeting of the Consultative Council on Local Government Finance. We have not yet formally discussed with the associations the question of targets for 1986-87.

Conservation (Special Grants)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will outline the source or sources of funds made available to voluntary organisations in the conservation field in relation to his Department's special grants programme; and if he will list the extent of each of the contributions.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Countryside Commission has been informed of 64 management agreements that have been concluded by local authorities under the provisions of the 1981 Act. Of these, 38 involve no financial consideration.

International Conference Centre

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the total cost to date of the new international conference centre in Westminster; what is his latest estimate of the total cost; and if he will list the references or describe (a) the uses to which it will be put, (b) the charge to non-Governmental organisations, if it is made available to them and (c) his estimate of the annual revenue cost.

Sir George Young: Expenditure to 22 February 1985 on the construction and fitting out of the superstructure of the international conference centre (including the fitting out of the extention to the parliamentary telephone exchange) was £26·073 million. The current total estimated cost, at cash prices, including the estimated total cost of variation of price payments, is £46·4 million. The estimated cost of furnishings is £5·3 million. The current estimate of total cost of £54·775 million in Supply Estimates 1985-86 at constant 1985-86 prices includes furnishings.

The centre's primary function will be to accommodate Government conferences, at both national and international level. At other times its facilities will be available on commercial terms to other users, including private sector bodies. The precise charges for these facilities have not yet been settled. Further market research is in hand as a basis for making estimates of the likely annual revenue.

Community and Parish Councils

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is satisfied with the current operation and role of community and parish councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Parish councils have operated as part of local government since 1894. They continue to perform a useful role in community representation and in administering a limited range of local government services.

Community councils are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Urban Development Corporations

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, in respect of section 12 of the New Towns and Urban Development Corporations Act 1985 and schedule 31 to the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980, he will state the amounts borrowed by each of the urban development corporations; and what is the upper limit in each case.

Sir George Young: I refer the hon. Gentleman to "Accounts relating to issues from the National Loans Fund" for the years 1981-82 (HC 146 (1982-83) p. 76); 1982-83 (HC 159 (1983-84) p. 78); and 1983-84 (HC 106 (1984-85) p. 72). These accounts include a statement of cumulative grant paid as well as borrowing in relation to the financial limit then in force. There is no separate upper limit on borrowing.

Dog Licences

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on what has happened following the consultation paper reviewing dog licences and proposing new legislation to give local authorities the power to increase licence fees.

Mr. Waldegrave: The closing date for comment on the consultation paper was 28 February. Some 1,400 representations from a wide range of organisations and individuals have been received and are being considered.

Agricultural Land (Rating)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the yield from the imposition of a rate on agricultural land at the full rate charged by local authorities on commercial and business undertakings.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend to the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) on 22 March, at column 637.

Bradford

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the amount of derelict land in Bradford from 1979 to 1983 and the latest figures available by ownership under the headings of private, nationalised industry, local authority and Government or public corporation.

Mr. Macfarlane: The information on the amount of derelict land in England is not compiled in the precise form requested by my hon. Friend. The 1982 survey of derelict land in England shows that there were 326 hectares of such land in the metropolitan district of Bradford at 1 April 1982. The details of ownership are as follows:

	Hectares
Local authority	15
Other public bodies	24
Private	287

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the percentage increase in housing starts in Bradford in both the private and public sectors for 1984 compared with 1983 and compared with the United Kingdom as a whole.

Sir George Young: The following percentage changes are calculated from the reported number of starts in Bradford published in "Local Housing Statistics" issues 68 and 72, and starts in the United Kingdom published in table 1.2 of "Housing and Construction Statistics" No. 20.

Housebuilding Starts
January to September of 1983 and of 1984: percentage changes

	Public	Private	All
Bradford	+1	+51	+34
United Kingdom	−16	−7	−9

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what was the amount of urban development grant money allocated for economic projects in Bradford for the years 1982-83 and 1983-84; and what proportion that was of the total;

(2) what has been the number of jobs created by urban development grant projects since 1979 in Bradford.

Sir George Young: The city of Bradford metropolitan district council is a programme authority for the purposes of the Government's urban programme. Total urban programme expenditure in Bradford in 1982-83 was £6·33 million. Economic projects made up 10 per cent. of the approved programme for that year. Total expenditure in 1983-84 was £5·56 million. Economic projects made up 21 per cent. of the approved programme.

The council is in addition one of the authorities which have been invited to put forward schemes for urban development grant. Although one offer of UDG has been made, and other schemes are under discussion with officers of the city, no expenditure has yet been incurred.

Information about the number of jobs created in Bradford since 1979 in consequence of this expenditure is not available.

Crisis Management Measures

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Merionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas) on 12 February, Official Report, column 86, he will make a statement on how, and why, his Department takes part in corporate exercises of testing crisis management measures; and if he will list all such forthcoming exercises planned and all those which have taken place in the last two years.

Mr. Waldegrave: Officials of my Department attended inter-departmental meetings during WINTEX-CIMEX 85 at which crisis management measures were discussed. This was done because we would be responsible for taking decisions in a crisis which would affect other Departments, and vice versa. Such exercises have taken place early in the year for many years. It is likely that this pattern will continue in future.

Waste Disposal (Energy)

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what action he proposes to help develop energy from waste schemes in those local authorities where disposal costs for landfill are higher than the cost of mass incineration with heat and electricity recovery or refuse-derived fuel production;

(2) what steps his Department is taking to define investment opportunities involving private sector finance for local authority waste into energy recovery schemes.

Mr. Waldegrave: Guidance for local authorities and others on waste disposal options including incineration and the production of waste derived fuel is contained in my Department's publication "Mechanised Household Waste Sorting in the United Kingdom — A General Guide" published by HMSO in 1984; a copy is in the Library of the House of Commons. This document includes information on waste disposal options currently in use; costs and financing; opportunities for the private sector; and marketing of products.

My Department will shortly be publishing a report of the landfill practices review group which will include advice on the control, extraction and distribution of landfill gas as an energy source. We are continuing to support research and development into the recovery of energy from waste.

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department collates case study information on schemes in other countries which convert waste into energy.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department has acquired information from various sources on some of the schemes used for recovering energy from waste in other countries. The Department of Energy also has a certain amount of similar information. However, a more comprehensive collection of such data is held by the Harwell waste management information bureau which is partly funded by my Department.

Control of Mineral Working

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to publish his revised memorandum on the control of mineral working as outlined in circular 3/84.

Mr. Macfarlane: Representatives from the minerals industry and the local authority associations have agreed that to be of long-term use the revised edition of the memorandum needs to await both Parliamentary approval of regulations for the abatement of compensation as provided for in the Town and Country Planning (Minerals) Act 1981 and the making of certain minerals amendments to the Town and County Planning General Development Order 1977. The compensation regulations were laid before the House on 27 March 1985, and I hope that the GDO amendments can be introduced later in this Parliamentary Session. The new edition of the memorandum will be published as soon as possible thereafter.

Ethnic Minority Projects (Funding)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the projects which are being funded by inner city partnership money in respect of social and community facilities for Bangladeshi communities in England and Wales.

Sir George Young: In 1984-85 the urban programme is supporting the 18 social and community projects listed as follows which specifically address the needs of Bangladeshi communities in Partnership areas. Members of these communities will also benefit from more than 100 UP funded social and community projects, costing over £2·5 million, aimed more generally at Asian and Muslim communities in the Partnership areas.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the projects which are receiving partnership funding for ethnic minority communities in Liverpool at the most recent date.

Sir George Young: Projects of particular benefit to ethnic minority communities being funded through the Liverpool inner city partnership in 1984-85 are as follows.

Local Government (Staff)

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out in descending order for each London borough the number of local authority employees per 100 inhabitants allowing for the Inner London education authority and the Greater London council.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information is as follows.

Staff per hundred population
Inner London Boroughs (including GLC and ILEA)

Borough	Staff
Camden	6·17
Hackney	5·85
Lambeth	5·84
Islington	5·58

Coolscar Quarry, Wharfedale

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, in view of the fact that limestone quarrying operations have begun at Coolscar quarry in Wharfedale, without the necessary planning permission, he will take steps to secure the immediate cessation of those operations until after he has reached a decision on the planning application in relation to which the public inquiry reopens on 21 May.

Mr. Macfarlane: No. The question whether to initiate enforcement action is for North Yorkshire county council, as the mineral planning authority, to determine in the first instance.

Society of Engineers Incorporated

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has included the Society of Engineers Incorporated on the list of approved inspectors for checking and carrying out site supervision under the Housing and Building Control Bill; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The bodies which my right hon. Friend has in mind to designate for the purposes of approving inspectors under section 49 of the Building Act 1984 are as follows:

The Chartered Institute of Building
The Faculty of Architects and Surveyors
The Incorporated Association of Architects and Surveyors
The Institution of Building Control Officers
The Institution of Civil Engineers
The Institution of Structural Engineers
The Royal Institute of British Architects
The Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors

Improvement Policy

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why the consultation paper on improvement policy, whose publication was announced in paragraph 23 of Vol. II of the 1985 public expenditure White Paper, has still not been made available to the public or placed in the Library.

Sir George Young: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) on 18 February at column 333.

Empty Dwellings

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will arrange a meeting with Shelter to discuss the findings of his Department's report on local authority empty dwellings regarding the current shortfall of public sector dwellings for rent.

Sir George Young: The Department invited Shelter's comments on the empty dwellings report and on the draft circular to local authorities setting out ways in which better management can reduce numbers of empty dwellings. No response has so far been received.

Housing

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assumptions about future housing demand he makes in determining the level of provision for capital expenditure on housing; and on what factual information he bases those assumptions.

Sir George Young: The Government's decisions on the level of provision for capital expenditure on housing are based on a judgment of what can be afforded, having regard to household projections and information about the needs of individual local authorities, the views of the local authority associations and representatives of the voluntary housing movement, and wider economic considerations.

Home Ownership Scheme

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he intends to change the price limits that restrict the purchase of property under the home ownership scheme for tenants of charitable housing associations.

Mr. Gow: The price limits have been reviewed in the light of changes in house prices and the following limits will apply to all purchases completed after 1 April 1985:

Greater London—£45,000
South East—£40,000
Elsewhere in England and Wales—£30,000

The definition of the south east is wider than the former "home counties" zone and now includes the whole counties of:

Bedfordshire
Berkshire
Buckinghamshire
Essex
Hampshire
Hertfordshire
Isle of Wight
Kent
Oxfordshire
Surrey
East Sussex
West Sussex

The rules for the scheme have also been amended so that tenants may now buy a dwelling outright even if it costs more than the price limit provided that they pay all the excess from their own resources. I believe that these changes will help more people to buy homes that are suitable for their individual needs under the scheme.

Football

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many football matches the Minister for Sport has attended since taking office.

Mr. Macfarlane [pursuant to his reply, 25 March 1985, c. 12]: I list below all the football matches which I have attended since September 1981:

Season 1981-82
England v Hungary
Manchester City v Swansea City
Tottenham Hotspur v Liverpool
England v Northern Ireland
Millwall v Chester
Liverpool v Swansea City

Tottenham Hotspur v Ipswich Town
Liverpool v Manchester United England v Holland
England v France
Northern Ireland v Yugoslavia
Scotland v Brazil
England v West Germany

Season 1982-83
Bayern Munich v Tottenham Hotspur
Swansea City v Tottenham Hotspur
Ipswich Town v Tottenham Hotspur
West Bromwich Albion v Liverpool
Ipswich Town v Manchester United
Liverpool v Manchester United
West Ham United v Aston Villa
Sutton United v Bishops Stortford
England v West Germany

Season 1983-84
Holland v Spain
Arsenal v West Bromwich Albion
Brighton and Hove Albion v Everton
Queen's Park Rangers v Everton
West Ham United v Manchester United Ipswich Town v Arsenal
Fulham v Tottenham Hotspur
Everton v Gillingham

Season 1984-85
Everton v Liverpool
Wycombe Wanderers v Sutton United Norwich City v Sunderland

I shall be attending the Stoke City v Everton match on 20 April. In addition to those matches, I was also to have attended two matches which were cancelled due to bad weather.

I assume the hon. Member refers to association football matches, but since September 1981 I have also attended some 20 rugby football league and rugby football union matches at club and international level. If the hon. Member requires that additional detail I shall write to him.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Contempt of Court Act 1980

Mr. Hayes asked the Attorney-General when he proposes to bring section 13 of the Contempt of Court Act 1980 into force.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor is giving further consideration to the best arrangements for improving the provision of legal aid for contempt of court cases. He hopes to introduce these this year.

Mr. Alan Lowther

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Attorney-General if he will make a statement concerning the prosecution of Mr. Alan Lowther under section 2 of the Official Secrets Act.

The Attorney-General: Alan Lowther was a member of a working group within the Home Office tasked to assist members of the Metropolitan police fraud squad investigating alleged irregularities in contractual dealings between the Directorate of Industries and Farms and a supplier. He was alleged to have communicated to one of those whom he believed to be under investigation, and contrary to express instructions, parts of a report identifying transactions which were to be the subject of that investigation.

I considered that proceedings were appropriate and granted my consent. However, evidence given at the committal indicated that the information would have been of less assistance to the recipient than it first appeared to be. I therefore decided that it would not be in the public interest for the prosecution to proceed further. This was not a case which involved national security but a possible interference into a criminal investigation.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Student Demonstrators (Manchester)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the charges brought against those persons arrested while demonstrating against himself at Manchester university students' union this month, the date of appearance in court and the verdict and sentence, where applicable.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The chief constable of Greater Manchester informs me that the following charges have been brought in connection with the demonstration at Manchester university students union on 1 March:

Offence	Number
Section 5 of the Public Order Act 1936 (conduct conducive to a breach of the peace)	19
Obstruction of the police	6
Obstruction of the highway	6
Theft of a policeman's helmet	1
Common law breach of the peace	1
	33

None of these cases has yet been dealt with by the courts. One has been adjourned until June; the others are expected to be heard in April.

Children in Care

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to announce the new guidelines relating to safeguards for children in care.

Mr. Giles Shaw: For details of the review into disclosure of convictions in relation to those seeking positions of responsibility for children I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) on 27 March at column 247.

Life Sentence Prisoners

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners are currently serving life sentences.

Mr. Mellor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) on 28 March at column 276.

Fines

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many defendants appealed against the size of a fine imposed by courts during (a) 1981, (b) 1982, (c) 1983 and (d) 1984, respectively;

(2) what was the total number of appeals against all forms of sentence during (a) 1981, (b) 1982, (c) 1983 and (d) 1984, respectively;

(3) how many defendants who were fined during (a) 1981, (b) 1982, (c) 1983 and (d) 1984 eventually had all or part of that fine remitted.

Mr. Mellor: The information available on appeals against sentence is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, Supplementary Tabled Vol. 4". The total number of persons appealing against sentence and the number appealing against a fine is given in tables S4.12c and S4.13b of the issues for 1981 and 1982 and tables S4.8c and S4.9b of the issue for 1983; the number of persons whose fine was varied on appeal is given in tables S4.12d-e and S4.13d of the issues for 1981 and 1982 and tables S4.8d-e and S4.9d of the issue for 1983. Corresponding information for 1984 is not yet available.

Animal Experimentation

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current membership of the Home Office advisory committee on animal experimentation; and if he will list the reasons why each member was appointed.

Mr. Mellor: The current membership of the advisory committee is as follows:

Chairman:
Baroness Warnock of Weeke

Members:
Lord Adrian
Dr. M. Balls
Professor D. Blackman
J. Price
Dr. C. Coid
Professor A. Dayan
Professor G. Dunstan
T. Field-Fisher
Dr. J. Hampson
C. Hollands
Dr. S. Jennett
Lady Lloyd
Dr. B. Newbould
Sir William Paton
N. Snodgrass.

The membership reflects a wide range of disciples necessary for consideration of the scientific and ethical questions referred to the committee. But each member is appointed for the personal contribution he or she is expected to make to discussion, not as a representative of particular interests.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will permit the Home Office inspector who visited the research establishment of the Royal College of Surgeons at Downe, Kent, to give evidence at the forthcoming appeal of the Royal College of Surgeons against its recent conviction for cruelty; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: No inspector has been asked to give evidence. My right hon. and learned Friend would, of course, raise no objection if an inspector was asked.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if a Home Office inspector visited the research establishment of the Royal College of Surgeons at Downe, Kent, on 18 June; if any other official of his Department visited on the same date; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will list the visits his Department's inspectors have made to Buckston Bourne farm in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: In my reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Holland and Boston (Mr. Body) on 12 December 1984 at column 483, I listed the visits made by the inspector in the five years up to 16 May 1984. Between then and the end of 1984, inspections were carried out on 18 June, 30 August, 29 and 30 October and 17 December. The inspection of 18 June was carried out by the inspector alone; he inspected the experimental animals for which my right hon. and learned Friend has responsibility under the Cruelty to Animals Act 1876, not the breeding colony which is not currently subject to statutory controls.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if Home Office inspectors make it their policy to look at all incident reports relating to establishments they inspect; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: During an inspection, it is the usual practice of inspectors to inquire about the general health of experimental animals and any particular problems which may have arisen since their last visit. They may also ask to seen any relevant records relating to animal health and welfare. I see no need for them to examine every record in every case.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent changes there have been in the personnel in his Department's inspectorate relating to experiments on living animals; for what reasons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Four new inspectors were appointed between October 1983 and February 1984 to fill vacancies. There have been no changes since then.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the disciplinary code applying to staff of his Department's inspectorate relating to experiments on living animals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Members of the cruelty to animals inspectorate are subject to the same disciplinary procedures as other civil servants. These are set out in the Civil Service pay and conditions of service code, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy regarding the conditions in which social primates kept for animal experimentation should be kept in licensed establishments; what conditions he lays down regarding (a) cage size and (b) meeting their behavioural needs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: It is my right hon. and learned Friend's policy for all experimental animals to be kept under the best possible conditions consistent with the method of the experiment and the characteristics of the species. He requires them to be kept in cages large enough for them to be able to move freely and to see and associate with others of their species if it is practicable and appropriate. Primates, as highly intelligent, wild animals, pose special problems which licensees try to overcome and, particularly in the case of small primates, do overcome with skill and imagination.

The Royal Society is currently devising guidelines on animal accommodation, including that of primates. My right hon. and learned Friend hopes to be able to incorporate guidelines in a code of practice which he would be empowered to issue under the new legislation planned to replace the Cruelty to Animals Act 1876.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to prohibit individuals and bodies taking in or otherwise obtaining custody of unwanted and abandoned animals from disposing of them directly or indirectly for the purpose of vivisection; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The new legislation which is planned to replace the Cruelty to Animals Act 1876 will as a general rule, require animals used in laboratories to be purpose-bred and will prohibit the use of stray dogs and cats. We do not intend to debar the use of other unwanted animals —for instance, farm animals—in scientific procedures.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any member of his Department has had discussions with the Royal College of Surgeons about the implications of its conviction for cruelty involving a monkey, Rage; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Yes. The content of discussions between officials of the Department and licensees or responsible authorities under the Cruelty to Animals Act 1876 are confidential to the parties concerned. The Royal College of Surgeons has appealed against the conviction.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if Her Majesty's Government will seek powers to ensure that tests for eye irritancy are carried out using the non-animal alternatives recently developed rather than using conscious rabbits as at present; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: There is not yet any proven non-sentient alternative which can safely be used in place of a live animal. However, before any substance which may cause eye irritation is tested in one eye of a live animal, screening tests involving alternatives such as an isolated eye, or skin are normally carried out. Published guidelines, such as the DHSS guidelines for the testing of chemicals for toxicity, remind researchers of the desirability of in vitro tests to ensure that corneal irritants are not applied unnecessarily to animals' eyes. Active research into this area is being carried out in this country and abroad, with a view to identifying further alternatives to these tests.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list in the Official Report all those organisations which have made formal representations following the publication of the last White Paper on experimental procedures on living animals.

Mr. Mellor: The major organisations which have submitted comments on the White Paper are as follows:

Young Persons

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the current review procedures for young people sentenced to be detained at Her Majesty's pleasure under section 53 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933.

Mr. Mellor: The release of a person sentenced to be detained during Her Majesty's pleasure is subject to the provisions of section 61(1) of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, and my right hon. and learned Friend may authorise the release of such a person if recommended to do so by the Parole Board and after consultation with the Lord Chief Justice and, if available, the trial judge. The review procedures for such cases are the same as those for life sentence prisoners described in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates), on 30 November 1983 at columns 513-15.

Parole

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the procedure of fixing of target dates for parole after early consultation with the Lord Chief Justice is being applied to all life prisoners or only to those convicted of murder.

Mr. Mellor: The procedure applies to all life sentence prisoners.

Dogs (Wirral Park)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to approve the draft byelaws submitted by Wirral council giving park rangers greater power over dogs and dog owners using Wirral's park.

Mr. Mellor: Wirral council has submitted draft byelaws to regulate its pleasure grounds and open spaces which cover a wide range of matters. The Department wrote to the council on 28 March with a number of comments on its proposals and we shall consider when provisional approval for the byelaws can be granted once the council has replied to these points.

Victims of Crime (Compensation)

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what administrative arrangements are being made for the distribution of leaflets to all victims of crime, who have suffered injury, informing them of the compensation powers of the courts; and whether he has any plans to supplement these arrangements with publicity material to be displayed in such places as hospitals, surgeries and advice centres.

Mr. Mellor: The text of the proposed leaflet and the arrangements for distribution have yet to be settled, but we hope it will be possible for the police to hand copies to victims of crime. My right hon. and learned Friend has no present plans for further publicity material, but this will be considered.

Equal Opportunities Officer

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will now appoint a departmental equal opportunities officer with responsibility for co-ordinating the Civil Service policy of non-discrimination within his Department.

Mr. Brittan: Two heads of personnel management divisions (grade 5) have been designated as equal opportunity officers, responsible for advising on the full scale of equal opportunity matters as they concern both sex and racial discrimination. One officer is concerned with staff in the Prison Department and Prison Department establishments, and the other with staff in the rest of the Home Office.

Dogs

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what representations he has received on the subject of cropping dogs' ears; and if he has proposals to eliminate this practice;

(2) what is his policy with regard to tail docking of dogs; and whether such docking is necessary to prevent damage to the tails of the breeds which are presently docked.

Mr. Mellor: We have received no recent representations about ear-cropping or tail-docking. These operations may be performed only in accordance with the provisions of the Protection of Animals Act 1911 and the Protection of Animals (Anaesthetics) Act 1954, which require that all operations on animals be performed with due care and humanity and, if appropriate, under anaesthetic. In some cases docking of dogs is performed for therapeutic purposes.

The Council of Europe Ad Hoc Committee for the Protection of Animals is currently preparing a draft convention on the protection of pet animals. Among the draft articles is one to prohibit the performance of surgical procedures for the modification of external appearance or other non-curative purposes unless it is considered necessary by a veterinary surgeon. The United Kingdom has supported the inclusion of this Article.

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set up an investigation into the practice of using dogs with inherited defects to breed puppies which become blind.

Mr. Mellor: We have no present plans to do so.

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to the number of Sharpeis dogs, whether imported or not, which suffer from (a) chronic mange resulting in ulceration of the skin, (b) umbilical hernias and (c) thyroid deficiency symptoms, as a result of deliberate breeding of dogs with inherited defects.

Mr. Mellor: None.

Mr. Eric Alley

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the purpose of Mr. Eric Alley's recent visit to Wales.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Mr. Alley, the Home Office civil defence adviser, is visiting local authorities to discuss their civil defence planning and to advise them on its completion. His recent visits have included a number of Welsh authorities.

British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his reply of 26 March, how many lists of names of hon. Members were removed from the offices of the British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection on 20 March; and if copies were made and retained by the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that a single list was removed and that no copies of it were made.

Styal Prison (Member's Correspondence)

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when his noble friend the Minister of State will reply to letters from the hon. Member for Tatton, dated 13 February and 18 March, in which he requested urgent information about Styal prison.

Mr. Mellor: My noble Friend replied to the letters from my hon. Friend today.

Multicultural Advisers

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set out in the Offical Report, for each of the last five years, the expenditure by his Department under section 11 of the Local Government Act 166 with regard to multicultural advisers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: I regret that the information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. All posts supported under section 11 must meet the criteria set out in Home Office circular No. 97/1982, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Police (Pay)

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the starting level of pay for a graduate entering the police force.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The basic annual pay of all police officers in their first year of service is £8,442 for those who were aged 22 or over and £6,708 for those who were under 22 on joining the service.

"Death Stars"

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received advocating legislation to stop the sale of the kung fu weapon known as Death Stars.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 29th March 1985]: These devices have been drawn to my attention by two of my right hon. and hon. Friends and a county council. It is already an offence under the Prevention of Crime Act 1953 to have an offensive weapon in a public place without lawful authority or reasonable excuse; and the definition of "offensive weapon" is sufficiently wide to cover such things as kung fu "Death Stars". The Act provides for a penalty of up to two years imprisonment or an unlimited fine, or both. Controls on such articles are aimed at the point of possession and use rather than at the point of sale, because there are many items sold for legitimate purposes which can be used as, or converted into, weapons.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Famine Relief

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much of the total sum to date made available by Her Majesty's Government for famine relief measures for Africa has been paid by the contingency reserve in the Estimates for 1984-85; what sums have been made available from other sources; and what was the balance in the contingency reserve on 31 March.

Mr. Raison: I expect spending in 1984-85 on famine relief measures for Africa to be funded as follows:

	£ million	£ million
Contingency reserve allocations	17
Food aid national actions and European development fund allocations	27
Reallocations from slippage elsewhere in the aid programme	10
Total from within voted aid funds		54
United Kingdom share of allocations from EC budgetised aid (non-voted)		35
Cost to Ministry of Defence of RAF Hercules operation in Ethiopia*		6
		95

* The extra costs of mounting operation Bushel are currently estimated at up to £1·5 million per month. As an exceptional case, MoD agreed to bear the costs for the first three months of the deployment (to the beginning of February 1985). Since then the costs have been shared equally between MoD and ODA.

There were no funds remaining in the aid programme contingency reserve on 31 March 1985.

El Salvador

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 7 November 1984, Official Report, column 4, how much of the £100,000 made available to the Salvadorean Government for emergency civilian supplies under the United Kingdom's aid programme has been used; and if any additional civilian aid or military assistance has been offered.

Mr. Raison: There have been no disbursements from the grant of £100,000, pending a decision by the Government of El Salvador on their precise requirements. Apart from the military training already announced (Hansard, 7 November 1984, column 4), the only other British assistance offered has been £200,000 for relief supplies for displaced persons.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Council of Ministers (Majority Voting)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which provisions of the treaty of Rome and the United Kingdom treaty of Accession to the European Economic Community containing requirements about majority voting in the Council of Ministers are not at present operated in the Council.

Mr. Rifkind: Outside the agricultural and budgetary fields the Council's practice has been, in all but a few isolated instances, to proceed by consensus.

Bophuthatswana

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, pursuant to the answer of 20 March, Official Report, column 534, he will state what limitations there are upon the full autonomy of Bophuthatswana and upon its full freedom of action in respect of external relations.

Mr. Rifkind: It is our judgment, after taking all factors into account, including the circumstances of Bophuthatswana's creation, the agreements then concluded, its fractured territory and its relationship with South Africa, that Bophuthatswana does not meet our criteria for recognition as a independent state.

Namibia

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when representatives of the British Government last visited Namibia; whom they met; and what conclusions were reached from the visit.

Mr. Rifkind: Her Majesty's ambassador in South Africa visited Namibia on 9-13 March. He met, inter alia, leaders of the Namibian internal parties, the Administrator-General and representatives of the British business community. The visit enabled him to assess the latest political, economic and social developments in the territory.

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government will make representations condemning the South West Africa People's Organisation and its President Sam Nujoma for the placing and detonation of a bomb in Ondangwa post office, Northern Namibia, on 31 December 1984 which killed four civilians and for which the President of the South West Africa People's Organisation has claimed responsibility.

Mr. Rifkind: We condemn this incident, just as we condemn all acts of violence in Namibia, whether committed by SWAPO or by the South African security forces or others. SWAPO is well aware of our views. We continue to work for the implementation of the United Nations settlement plan which offers the only prospect of an end to the cycle of violence in Namibia.

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the demands of the internal parties of Namibia for the establishment of a written constitution agreed by all Namibian parties to protect minority tribes' rights prior to any United Nations supervised elections.

Mr. Rifkind: The United Nations plan for a Namibia settlement, which alone has been agreed by all the parties, provides for free and fair elections to a constituent assembly which will draw up a constitution for an independent Namibia. Under this constitution the fundamental rights of all Namibians after independence should be protected in accordance with the constitutional principles accepted by all the parties and set out in United Nations Document S/15287 of 12 July 1982. We continue to believe that the United Nations plan provides a basis for a settlement which would meet the legitimate interests of all Namibians.

EC (Ad Hoc Committees)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list in the Official Report the names and status of each of the representatives of Heads of Government of the European Economic Community who are members of each of the ad hoc committees established after the Fontainebleau meetings.

Mr. Rifkind: The members of the Ad Hoc Committee on Institutions (Dooge Committee) were listed in the answer given by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton on 13 March to the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor). Members of the "People's Europe" Committee are:

Belgium
Mr. Prosper Thuysbaert (Political Director, Ministry of Foreign Affairs)
Denmark
Mr. Mailand Christiansen (Danish MP)
France
Mr. Max Gallo (Member of the European Parliament)
Germany
Mr. Hans Neusel (former State Secretary)
Greece
Mr. Yiannis Kranidiotis (Political Adviser to Minister of EC Affairs)
Ireland
Mr. Eamon O'Tuathail (Assistant Secretary-General, Ministry of Foreign Affairs)
Italy
Mr. Pietro Adonnino (Lawyer and former Christian Democrat MEP) (Chairman)
Luxembourg
Mr. Albert Hansen (Secretary-General of Council of Government)
Netherlands
Mr. Edmund Wellenstein (Diplomat)
United Kingdom
Mr. David Williamson (Cabinet Office)
Commission
Mr. Carlo Ripa di Meana

Decade for Women (Nairobi Conference)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will ensure that the United Kingdom delegation at the Nairobi conference of the United Nations Decade for Women will include a female representative from the health population division of the Overseas Development Administration.

Mr. Renton: We have no plans to include a representative from the health and population division of the Overseas Development Administration in the United Kingdom delegation. However, I can assure the hon. Member that the United Kingdom delegation will be briefed on population issues likely to be raised at the conference.

Santo Domingo

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to close Her Majesty's embassy, Santo Domingo; and what type of accommodation he will make available in future for visits by the British ambassador.

Mr. Renton: Her Majesty's embassy in Santo Domingo officially closed on 23 March. We expect that during his periodic visits to Santo Domingo Her Majesty's ambassador will be accommodated in a hotel.

Amnesty International (Exhibition)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will arrange for an exhibition relating to Amnesty International to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Renton: No, but we have no objection to the holding of such an exhibition.

Equal Opportunities Officer

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will now appoint a departmental equal opportunities officer with responsibility for co-ordinating the Civil service policy of non-discrimination within his Department.

Mr. Renton: Equal opportunities officers, with responsibility for advising on the full scope of equal opportunity matters as they concern race and sex discrimination, were appointed in the FCO in 1984. There are three such officers: one for the diplomatic wing, one for the Overseas Development Administration and one for staff administered from Hanslope park.

Anglo-Irish Encounter Group

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the work of the Anglo-Irish Encounter Group in 1984.

Mr. Renton: As a result of the recommendation of the Anglo-Irish Joint Studies Group (Cmnd. 8414), Encounter was initiated in July 1983 by the United Kingdom and Republic of Ireland Governments as an independent non-governmental organisation. Its purpose is to organise periodic conferences and seminars, with a wide range of representation, on economic, social, cultural and other matters of common concern with a view to promoting mutual understanding, useful co-operation and good relations. It held two conferences in 1984.

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give the dates and locations of meetings of the Anglo-Irish Encounter Group since July 1983 and the subjects discussed.

Mr. Renton: Three Encounter conferences have been held since July 1983:

4 April 1984, London—
Theme: improving work prospects in Great Britain and Ireland.

27-28 November 1984, Dublin—
Theme: the promotion amongst the young of a greater respect for religious and cultural diversity.

26-27 March 1985, London—
Theme: Increasing the appreciation of our cultural heritage.

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the chairmen and officials currently working in a temporary capacity on (a) the steering committee and (b) the co-ordinating committee of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council; and if he will make a statement on the work of these two committees.

Mr. Renton: The steering committee and co-ordinating committee of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council are chaired by senior United Kingdom officials and their Republic of Ireland counterparts. Other officials attend meetings of these committees depending on the subjects under discussion. It is not our practice to reveal the names of the officials concerned. The committees have provided valuable opportunities for discussions on matters of mutual interest to both sides.

Pakistan

Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent protest he has made to the President of Pakistan about the abuse of human rights there and, in particular, about the case of Bashiran Begum.

Mr. Renton: We have not recently raised human rights issues with President Zia personally, but he can be in no doubt about the strength of our views concerning violations of human rights wherever they may occur. We have made our views clear to the Pakistan authorities on several occasions in recent months.

We are not familiar with the case of Bashiran Begum, but would welcome further information from the right hon. Lady.

Ambassadors

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Government's policy with regard to the summoning of ambassadors and in particular how this is applied with regard to (a) Israel and (b) South Africa.

Mr. Luce: Ambassadors and high commissioners are asked to call at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office whenever this is judged useful.

Non-Proliferation Treaty

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) Official Report, 13 March, column 166, whether the forthcoming review conference of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty in September was discussed during his recent visit to Washington; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: The non-proliferation treaty review conference was not discussed during the recent visit by my right hon. and learned Friend to Washington. However, we hold regular consultations with the United States Government about arms control matters, including the non-proliferation treaty. These talks have revealed a close identity of view about the treaty, and a common determination to support it and to strengthen the non-proliferation regime.

WALES

Labour Statistics

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list in the Official Report against each constituency in Wales the current level of unemployment.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: This information is available in the Library of the House.

Teachers (Pay)

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a progress report on the current position of negotiations with the teaching unions over pay of their members in Wales.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Negotiations on teachers' pay are conducted on an England and Wales basis. We are not involved in the negotiations as the responsibility for teachers' pay rests with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science. I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson) on 19 March, at column 777.

Financial Assistance and Job Creation

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list in the Official Report the amount of financial assistance which has been directed through the Welsh Office since 1979, and the number of jobs created since 1979 as a result of such financial assistance, in each constituency in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The main instruments by which my Department provides financial assistance towards job creation are regional selective assistance and, since November 1984, regional development grants under the new scheme.

Information in the form requested is not readily available and could only be provided at disproportionate cost. At present, statistics of regional selective assistance can be provided for all administrative areas in Wales but will not be available for all travel-to-work areas or for parliamentary constituencies until later this year.

Hospital Ward Closures

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many wards are unable to accept patients in each of the health authorities in Wales at the present time; what are the specific reasons for such wards being closed; and how long each individual closure has lasted.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: There are presently 19 wards closed in hospitals in the Principality, and these are listed together with the reasons and length of time each closure has lasted.

Ward and name of hospital	Reason for closure	Length of closure to date
Clwyd
North Wales hospital, Denbigh

Pupils (Statistics)

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has to the number of pupils, over the age of 11 plus, not being educated in comprehensive schools; bilingual and otherwise, in each of the local education authorities in Wales; and how many are in schools providing special education commensurate with the pupils' physical and mental state.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The total numbers of pupils aged 11 years and over as at 31 August 1983 in schools outside the comprehensive sector in Wales at January 1984 are as follows:

	Number of Pupils*
Clwyd	3,140
Dyfed	4,535
Gwent	1,660
Gwynedd	1,072
Mid Glamorgan	932
Powys	649
South Glamorgan	2,058
West Glamorgan	998

* Pupils aged 11 years and over at primary schools, secondary modern schools, secondary grammar schools, other non-comprehensive secondary schools, special schools and independent schools.

The total numbers of pupils, by age, receiving special education at primary and secondary schools, special schools or units and at independent and non-maintained schools is not collected centrally. Some details of pupils receiving special education are, however, available in "Statistics of Education in Wales" a copy of which is in the Library.

Rhoose Airport

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the representations that the Welsh Office has made at all levels to better the air traffic movements at Cardiff, Rhoose airport and to increase the availability of scheduled services using the airport on a domestic and international scale.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The Government's recent approval of a capital expenditure allocation for the lengthening of the runway is a clear demonstration of our commitment to the development of the airport. My Department and I take every opportunity to emphasise the importance of the airport for economic development and tourism in the Principality.

Gamma Cameras

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many district health authorities have accepted the offer of financial assistance to acquire Gamma cameras; and of these how many have so far received payments.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Our Department has not offered special financial assistance to acquire Gamma cameras. There are at present 17 cameras in use in Wales, of which eight were provided by central funding.

Milk Quotas

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what response he is making to recent representations from the dairy industry for greater milk quota mobility.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) on 14 March 1985 at column 264 by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

NCB Enterprises Ltd

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to visit the National Coal Board Enterprise Ltd. offices in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: National Coal Board Enterprises Ltd. operates through the existing National Coal Board South Wales area organisation in Cardiff. I have at present no plans to make a visit.

School Leavers

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of school leavers in Wales who have not had permanent jobs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: School leavers are classed as unemployed claimants who have never been in employment. At February 1985 the number in Wales was 20,180.

Enterprise Allowance

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many extra enterprise allowance schemes there will be consequent upon the Budget; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment announced on 12 November that he intended to increase the enterprise allowance scheme by 25 per cent. to make it possible for up to 1,250 people a week nationally to join the scheme. This expansion was confirmed in the recent Budget Statement.

In Wales provision has been made for about 78 places to be available per week for the year 1 April 1985 to 31 March 1986. This figure compares with a figure of about 58 places a week in the year up to 31 March 1985.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many extra youth training scheme places in Wales there will be consequent upon the Budget; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: This information is not yet available. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment has asked the Manpower Services Commission to consider and make recommendations about the detailed implementation of the youth training scheme expansion announced in the Budget and to report by the end of June.

Community Programme

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many extra community programme places there will be in Wales consequent upon the Budget; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Following the Budget Statement announcing that the community programme is to be expanded by 100,000 places, my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Employment has askedthe Manpower Services Commission to consider how these extra places should be allocated. No final decisions have yet been taken.

Inward Investment

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many visits abroad he has undertaken in 1984 and 1985 concerning the industrial development of Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: During 1984 I visited the far east (Japan, Korea) once and the United States of America once, to promote inward investment to Wales.

The economic climate for inward investment to Wales is better than ever but we face growing competition for internationally mobile projects. Over the last few years Wales has been very successful in attracting such projects from a diverse group of industries and countries, and I am determined to maintain this momentum in future.

"Better Schools"

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what part he proposes to take in consultations on the White Paper, "Better Schools", Cmnd. 9469; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: I am, of course, fully associated with the consultations being undertaken by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science and I or my representatives will attend these as appropriate. I have already invited the Welsh Joint Education Committee to discuss "Better Schools" at its next meeting on 29 April and I am also writing to other major organisations in Wales inviting them to the Welsh Office to discuss the Government's policies.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give for the month of January the breakdown of the unemployment figures in the Alyn and Deeside area for Shotton, Connah's Quay, Buckley and other townships.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: This information is not available. Data are currently being prepared on a ward basis and these figures will be available in the House of Commons Library in the usual way in due course.

Dairy Farmers

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what measures he will bring forward to alleviate the economic problems of the small dairy producer in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) on 28 March 1985 by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Technology Programme

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much of the funds for developing technology in the universites and polytechnics will be allocated to Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: A number of higher education institutions in Wales have submitted bids for support under the programme to increase the output of engineering and technology graduates. An announcement about which bids have been approved for the first phase of the programme to begin in 1985-86 will be made shortly. It is not yet known how many of the bids submitted by Welsh institutions will eventually be accepted.

Low Incomes

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the number of people in Wales earning less than 60 per cent. of the national average wage; and what this number is as a percentage of the working population in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The exact information requested is not available, but according to the new earnings survey for 1984, approximately 16·5 per cent. of full-time employees on adult rates in Wales were earning less than 60 per cent. of the Welsh figure for average earnings.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the number of people, whether single, married or as part of families, living on incomes of 60 per cent. of the national average or less; and what this number is as a percentage of the total population of Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information is not available in the form requested, but figures from the 1983 family expenditure survey show that approximately 34 per cent. of Welsh households have a gross normal weekly income of 60 per cent. or less of the Wales average.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will show the rise in earnings of people on 60 per cent., 80 per cent., 100 per cent. and 200 per cent. of the national average wage in Wales for each year since 1979 in constant, 1985, and unit terms, using 1979=100; and if he will compare the rise in average earnings in Wales for each year since 1979 to date with the equivalent figures for (a) England and (b) the United Kingdom.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information available is as follows:

Indices of average earnings (1979=100)

	Wales		England		Great Britain
	At current prices	At constant prices	At current prices	At constant prices	At current prices	At constant prices
1979	100	100	100	100	100	100
1980	121	100	123	101	123	101

* The 1979-83 figures are for men aged 21 and over and women aged 18 and over in full-time employment whose pay was not affected by absence. The 1984 figures are for full-time employees on adult rates whose pay was not affected by absence.

Indices for persons on 60 per cent., 80 per cent. and 200 per cent. of the average wage bill would be identical.

ENERGY

Miners (Dismissals)

6. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many miners have been dismissed by the National Coal Board in connection with the 1984-85 strike.

Mr. David Hunt: Questions of dismissal of NCB employees are matters for the National Coal Board.

Coal (Use)

16. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Energy what proposals he has to promote the increased use of coal in industry.

Mr. Peter Walker: Expanding the industrial use of coal depends above all on the coal industry showing industrial customers that it can offer secure and competitive supplies. My Department supports the board's efforts by providing grants to meet some of the capital costs of conversion from oil or gas to coal.

British National Oil Corporation

18. Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will make a further statement on the consequences of the abolition of the British National Oil Corporation.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I hope to introduce legislation to abolish BNOC and establish an agency to take on its residual functions at an early opportunity.

26. Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy what arrangements he envisages for payments of compensation to management and staff when the British National Oil Corporation is abolished.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Payment of compensation to management and staff is a matter for the corporation, which will doubtless have regard to the terms of contracts of employment and other relevant factors.

Coal Industry (Investment)

19. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy what was the total investment in 1974 prices in the coal industry in each financial year since 1974.

Mr. David Hunt: Total investment by the NCB for the financial year 1983-84 expressed in 1974 prices was £236 million. This was 63 per cent. higher in real terms than in 1974-75, despite the overtime ban in the coal industry, which reduced investment in 1983-84.

Total investment by the NCB in 1974 prices was as follows:

	*£ million
1974-75	145
1975-76	175
1976-77	190
1977-78	207

ENERGY

Nuclear Power

20. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Energy what plans he has for the further development of nuclear power.

Mr. Goodlad: The Government continue to attach importance to the safe and economic development of nuclear power.

22. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he next plans to meet the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board to discuss the future development of nuclear power.

Mr. Goodlad: My right hon. Friend regularly meets the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board to discuss matters of common interest.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will direct the Central Electricity Generating Board that nuclear power stations should be operated economically so as to minimise subsidies from the taxpayers.

Mr. Goodlad: The CEGB's nuclear power stations produce the cheapest electricity available to the grid. The question of subsidies does not arise.

Coal Industry (Manpower Levels)

21. Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has received from the National Coal Board regarding guidance given to area directors on manpower levels in the coal industry.

Mr. Peter Walker: I understand that the chairman of the National Coal Board is currently consulting his area directors about how best to rebuild the industry's prospects after the ravages of the strike.

Coal Industry

24. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many miners who had been dismissed during the mining dispute have now been reinstated following the official ending of the dispute; how many are still seeking reinstatement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Questions of dismissal and re-employment of NCB employees are matters for the National Coal Board.

28. Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the future of the coal mining industry.

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, in the light of the end of the coal strike, he will now initiate a meeting between himself, management and unions to discuss the industry's future; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: The first task has been to bring about a return to normal working in those pits where this is possible. I am pleased to say that good progress is being made to this end. I hope that, following this, there will be a return by the National Union of Mineworkers to full participation in the established processes of the industry so that both sides of the industry can constructively plan for future success in the industry.

I will certainly be available to discuss the results and the financing of any proposals that come out of these consultations.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he has any proposals to introduce legislation to replace the Opencast Coal Act 1958;

(2) if he has any proposals to reduce the limitation and restrictions on local mineral authorities (county councils) which have recently been charged with control of all such workings by circular 8/84;

(3) when he intends to introduce the legislation outlined in circular 3/84 which will remove district councils from the list of statutory objections to opencast coal mining applications.

Mr. David Hunt: These matters are under consideration. I cannot make any statement about legislation at present.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Energy what proposals he has to divorce the National Coal Board opencast executive from the National Coal Board; and if he has any plans to privatise all opencast workings.

Mr. David Hunt: I have no such proposals at present.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he intends to implement the Monopolies and Mergers Commission recommendation to free the private sector from all limitations and restrictions as to the size of site and quantity of coal and other associated materials it wishes to extract in opencast operations.

Mr. David Hunt: We are giving very careful consideration to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission recommendation to increase the statutory limit on individual opencast licences from 25,000 tons to 100,000 tonnes.

Miners (Early Retirement)

27. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many miners have taken early retirement since the ending of the miner's dispute; how many left during the dispute; and if he will express each figure as a percentage of the current total work force in the industry.

Mr. David Hunt: These are matters for the National Coal Board, and I will ask the chairman to write to my hon. Friend.

Ministerial Visit

29. Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement about the visit of the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt) to Morr Energy at West Charlton Down on Thursday 14 March.

Mr. David Hunt: During my visit to the south-west I was delighted to visit the Morr Energy premises at the request of my hon. Friend and the company and to view the company's energy efficiency products. I saw the company's development of heat pipe technology and congratulated it on its impressive application of heat recovery technology. I wish the company well.

Plutonium

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make it his policy to consult Parliament before authorising the use of plutonium as a fuel in nuclear power plants.

Mr. Goodlad: Plutonium is already in routine use in the prototype fast reactor at Dounreay and indeed a significant quantity of energy in all reactors derives from plutonium which is produced and consumed within the fuel during normal reactor operation.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy what has happened to the plutonium derived at United Kingdom reprocessing plants from spent nuclear fuel imported from overseas; and if any plutonium exported has been confined to countries which have signed the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Goodlad: Some of this material is stored by British Nuclear Fuels plc, some has been exported to its country of origin and some to other countries where there is a requirement for its use. All exports have been for civil use and to countries, with the exception of France, a nuclear weapons state, which are signatories of the non-proliferation treaty. Shipments to France are subject to Euratom safeguards.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the figures on plutonium production in the Central Electricity Generating Board reactors which were supplied to Euratom for the years 1978 to 1984 under the 1977 Tripartite Agreement.

Mr. Goodlad: The tripartite (UK/EURATOM/IAEA) safeguards agreement does not require CEGB plutonium production figures to be reported.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are the estimated costs per tonne of (a) reprocessing and (b) storing spent nuclear fuel.

Mr. Goodlad: British Nuclear Fuels plc provided the following information on the storage and reprocessing of oxide fuels in its evidence to the Sizewell inquiry (BNFL/P/1/Exhibit 26).

Cost estimates for a notional 600tU pa reprocessing plant and associated facilities and operations

Plant or Operational Item	Costs (March 1982 Money Values) Capital (£ million)*	Operating (£ million pa)
Storage pond (600tU module)	55	2
Fuel dismantler (AGR only)	115	2
Reprocessing plant (including buffer storage for HLW liquid)	860	30
Waste treatment facilities (including storage prior to disposal)	280	10
Waste Disposal
High level (HLW)	230	5
Intermediate level (ILW)	†40	†3
Low level (LLW)	—	†0·2

* Excludes decommissioning costs which are assumed at 40 per cent. of the initial capital expenditure (in constant money terms).

† Based on information supplied by NIREX.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy if it is the policy of his Department that the reprocessing of spent nuclear fuel is an indispensable part of nuclear power generation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I refer the hon. Member to the Prime Minister's answer to his question on 18 January 1985 at columns 235-236.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the current annual requirement of the United Kingdom nuclear power industry for reprocessing capacity; and what proportion this represents of total United Kingdom reprocessing capacity.

Mr. Goodlad: British Nuclear Fuels plc can reprocess up to 1,500 tonnes (uranium) per year of spent Magnox fuel. The United Kingdom generating boards' typical requirement for reprocessing this fuel is about 800 to 900 tonnes per year. AGR fuel is currently stored pending reprocessing in the THORP facility.

Nuclear Reprocessing Plants

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy if the United Kingdom has supplied any nuclear reprocessing plants to other countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: None has been supplied.

Coking Coal (Imports)

Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his latest estimate of the amount of coking coal imported into the United Kingdom; from where and at what average price; and what effect the dollar-sterling exchange rate has had upon the price.

Mr. David Hunt: In January 1985, the last month for which figures are available, nearly 700,000 tonnes of coking coal were imported into the United Kingdom, mainly from suppliers in the USA and Australia, at an average value of around £49 per tonne. The general strengthening of the US dollar against other currencies put downward pressure on dollar prices as well as increasing the sterling price for any given dollar price.

Diesel Fuel

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has as to the current average retail price of diesel fuel in the United Kingdom; and what information he has about any regional variations.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The most widespread retail price of diesel fuel on 25 March was 197·7p per gallon. I understand that there can be variations of about 5p per gallon on a regional basis.

Paraffin

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has as to the current average retail price of paraffin in the United Kingdom; and what information he has about any regional variations.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The market for paraffin is small and highly fragmented; I do not have the data to provide an average retail price.

Equal Opportunities Officer

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will now appoint a departmental equal opportunities officer with responsibility for co-ordinating the Civil Service policy of non-discrimination within his Department.

Mr. Peter Walker: An officer within the establishment and finance division has been designated equal opportunities officer with responsibility for advising on the full scope of equal opportunity matters as they concern race and sex discrimination.

Fast Breeder Reactors

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his answer of 11 March, Official Report, column 33, on fast breeder reactors, if he will set out the arrangements that have been made with Euratom and the International Atomic Energy Agency for the application of nuclear safeguards on all parts of the European collaborative project on fast breeder reactors.

Mr. Goodlad: All parties to the collaborative project on fast reactors are member states of the European Community and therefore the application of Euratom safeguards on those parts of the project in each state will be carried out in accordance with the provisions of the Euratom treaty.

Additionally, each participant in the project is a party to a safeguards agreement between Euratom, itself and the International Atomic Energy Agency, and safeguards will be applied to the project in each state in accordance with its agreement with the agency.

Cross-Channel Electricity Link

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Energy how the maximum amount of electricity which can be carried by the cross-Channel electricity link compares with the average and peak winter loads of the Central Electricity Generating Board.

Mr. Goodlad: When completed the maximum amount of electricity which could be carried by the cross-Channel link will be 2000 MW. This compares with an average winter peak load of 40,000 MW and a maximum peak load of 45,000 MW.

Gas Pipeline (Northern Ireland)

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Energy what recent consideration he has given to the possibility of supplying gas to Northern Ireland through a pipeline from the Morecambe bay gas field; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The British Gas Corporation, as licensee for the development, has proposed from the outset that the Morecambe field should be linked by pipeline to Great Britain; and so provided in its development plan approved in February 1982.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

British Standards

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on Government policy on the future use of British Standards, the kite mark, following the statement by Lord Cockfield regarding inter-state reciprocal acceptance of standards by European Community member states.

Mr. Butcher: The Government policy on the use of standards and certification for regulatory purposes, as set out in the White Paper, "Standards, Quality and International Competitiveness" (Cmnd. 8621), is that regulatory bodies should henceforth express technical requirements by reference to suitable British standards. The White Paper also reaffirmed the United Kingdom's commitment to harmonising standards within the European Community in support of the programme for the elimination of technical barriers to trade under article 100 of the Treaty of Rome. The Government therefore support fully current initiatives under which member states would adopt a new approach to technical harmonisation and standardisation along the lines proposed in the Commission's communication of 31 January 1985 to the European Parliament and to the Council (Cmnd. (85) 19 final).

Capital Goods Exports

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received on the Byatt report on the costs and risks of support for capital goods exports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: The Byatt report was a study by Government economists of the issues involved in supporting capital goods exports. Since it was prepared the situation has changed considerably owing to the changes in world interest rates and the new framework for the OECD concensus.

At least 17 written representations have been made to Ministers in this Department and the Treasury since a copy of the Byatt report was placed in the Library of the House in January last year. As well as some from a number of companies, representations have been received from the following organisations:

British Chemical Engineering Contractors Association
British Consultants Bureau
British Water Industries Group
CBI
Constructional Steelwork EDC
Export Group for the Construction Industries
London Chamber of Commerce and Industry
Overseas Projects Board
Process Plant and Heavy Electrical EDCs
Scottish Council for Development and Industry
TUC

Dee Corporation and Booker McConnell

Viscount Cranborne asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has now studied the report on the proposed merger of Dee Corporation plc and Booker McConnell plc by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission presented to Parliament in January 1985; and when he expects to make a decision.

Mr. Channon: The report concluded that the proposed merger would not be against the public interest. My right hon. Friend therefore has no powers to take any action in respect of that report.

Equal Opportunities Officer

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will now appoint a departmental equal opportunities officer with responsibility for co-ordinating the Civil Service policy of non-discrimination within his Department.

Mr. Butcher: My Department appointed an equal opportunities officer on 5 January 1984.

"The Wealth of Waste"

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to respond to the report of the Trade and Industry Committee entitled "The Wealth of Waste".

Mr. Trippier: The Government's response was sent to the chairman of the committee on 25 March.

Humberside (European Regional Development Fund)

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry by what criteria Humberside qualified for European regional development fund non-quota sums in December 1984; how much was allocated to Humberside from that source by his Department under the business improvement services scheme; and, of this, how much has been allocated to date specifying the areas in Humberside which have received funds giving the total amount each area received.

Mr. Trippier: The eligible areas and allocations, including assisted areas in Humberside, for the second round of ERDF non-quota measures to aid areas affected by the decline of the steel industry were based on criteria agreed by the European Commission and the United Kingdom Government—job losses and local dependency rates for the steel industry and local unemployment rates. Humberside was allocated £2·2 million under my Department's business improvement services scheme. To date 99 applications to the value of £950,217 have been received from small firms in Humberside. Detailed information for areas in Humberside is not available.

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether any further tranches of European regional development fund non-quota funds are to be made available to Humberside; what sums will be allocated to Glanford and Scunthorpe from that source by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Textile Industry (Investment)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what evidence he has of investment by Governments of other member countries of the EEC in their domestic textile industries under schemes which have not received the approval of the European Commission in each of the years since 1975.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consultation he has now had with representatives of the United Kingdom textile industry concerning the decision of the European Commission that the CLOFT scheme for investment in a new technology for small textile firms could not be implemented.

Mr. Trippier: Representatives of the industries covered by the proposed CLOFT scheme have been provided with the full text of the Commission's decision. Arrangements have been made for discussions to take place during the course of this month.

British Aerospace (Government Shareholding)

Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the orders made under section 7 of the British Aerospace Act 1980 since the coming into force of the Act.

Mr. Butcher: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made The British Aerospace Act 1980 (Government Shareholding) Order 1981—SI 622—on 15 April 1981.

Monopolies and Mergers Commission

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to make express provision, on the consideration of possible mergers by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, for it to take account of the effects of mergers on the future prospects of the firms concerned, of the implications for the United Kingdom investment programmes of firms taken over by overseas interests, and of the existing and past financial standing of the firm proposing the takeover.

Mr. Channon: Section 84 of the Fair Trading Act 1973 provides that in considering whether a merger may be expected to operate against the public interest, the Commission shall take into account all matters which appear to them to be relevant. My right hon. Friend has no plans for further legislation.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make it his policy that all overseas takeover bids for British firms opposed by the board of the company in question are referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Channon: My right hon. Friend takes into account all relevant factors in his consideration of mergers, but has announced that decisions on reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission will be made primarily on competitive grounds.

Companies (Statistics)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the total number of (a) registered companies, (b) new company incorporations and (c) dissolved companies removed from the register, for the calendar year 1984 in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Channon: For England, Wales and Scotland, the information is as follows:

		Number
(a)	Companies registered at end of 1984	1,000,803
(b)	New company incorporations during 1984	97,908
(c)	Disolved companies removed from the Register during 1984	53,516

Company registration in Northern Ireland is under separate Northern Ireland legislation, which is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Tootal Group

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received concerning the possible takeover of the Tootal Group by Entrad.

Mr. Channon: Representations regarding mergers are confidential.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will refer to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission the proposed takeover of the Tootal Group by Entrad.

Mr. Channon: My right hon. Friend will announce his decision as soon as practicable.

EC Regional Aid (France)

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to which areas of France are entitled to receive aid from EEC regional aid funds; what proportion of the French land mass this represents; what limitations are imposed on the total area by Community obligations; and what similar limitation is imposed on the United Kingdom.

Mr. Trippier: I am not aware of any data of this kind for France. Eligibility for aid from the European regional development fund is usually limited to aided areas established by member states in applying their systems to regional aid. No specifc geographical limits for regional aid are set by the European Community. The manner of the Commission's exercise of its powers under Articles 92 and 93 of the treaty, as they relate to regional policies, remains as set out in its communication to the Council on regional aid systems (Official Journal of the European Communities for 3 February 1979 No. C31/9); although part 2 of that communication does, of course, need amendment to take account of the Commission's recent decision to raise no objection to the Government's proposal to amend, and substantially increase, assisted area coverage in the United Kingdom.

Manufacturing Investment

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list, by region, the level of investment in manufacturing industry for the years 1979 to 1984, expressed in 1979 prices.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 29 March 1985]: Constant price statistics are not available for investment by region. Figures in the following table are at current prices and relate to investment by manufacturing industry (excluding leased assets) in the standard regions of the United Kingdom. Estimates for 1983 and 1984 are not yet available.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give a breakdown for each of the multi-fibre arrangement categories 1 to 123 of (a) the number of items and (b) the total value of items in each category which have been imported in each of the last five years for which figures are available from (i) European Economic Community countries and (ii) low-cost countries.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to the reply, 28 March 1985]: The information requested is set out in the following table:

TRANSPORT

Equal Opportunities Officer

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will now appoint a departmental equal opportunities officer with responsibility for co-ordinating the Civil Service policy of non-discrimination within his Department.

Mr. Ridley: Such an officer was designated for my Department in November 1984.

Sinclair C5

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, in view of legal actions against and injuries to drivers of the Sinclair C5, he will now introduce legislation to seek to ensure that injuries to third parties are covered by compulsory insurance.

Mr. Ridley: No.

Transport Policy

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Transport to what extent in formulating Her Majesty's Government's transport policy he takes employment needs and tourism potential of an area into account.

Mr. Ridley: The interests of the passenger are my prime consideration. Trains and buses should be free to go when and where their passengers want to go; and airports and airlines should be free to meet the demands of the passengers, whether in pursuit of tourism or employment.

ENVIRONMENT

Planning Appeals

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the average time taken for planning appeals to be dealt with for each of the last six years, whether by way of written representation or by a public inquiry; and whether or not the decision was made by an inspector or by himself.

Mr. Macfarlane: Median times for deciding planning appeals between 1979 and 1984 were as follows:

	Determined by Secretary of State		Determined by Inspectors
	Inquiries	Written Representations	Inquiries	Written Representations	Informal Hearings
1979	49	38	27	23	—
1980	44	37	27	26	—
1981	44	32	26	18	—
1982	46	33	27	17	—
1983	48	39	26	19	20
1984	53	42	28	22	25

Notes:
1. Median, and not average times are used in the Department's appeal statistics.
2. Times are in weeks.
3. Informal hearings were introduced in July 1983.

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans and proposals he has for speeding up the time taken to determine planning appeals.

Mr. Macfarlane: Appeals intake is now some 20 per cent. above 1983 levels. I nevertheless intend to cut processing times by appointing more planning inspectors and making the most effective use of them, accelerating procedures and speeding up the decision-making process.

SCOTLAND

Grudie-Tarradale Hydro-electric Scheme

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement detailing the reasons for his rejection of the proposed Grudie-Tarradale hydro-electric scheme.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The Secretary of State considers that the scheme cannot be accommodated within the board's capital expenditure programme over the next few years. In the circumstances, the board has announced that it has decided to withdraw the scheme from its immediate plans with the intention of resubmitting it later when there is a prospect of room being found for it within the investment programme authorised by the Government. The Secretary of State has accordingly taken no decision on the merits of the scheme and on the objections made to it.

The North of Scotland Hydro-Electric Board has made it clear that if and when the proposals are resubmitted it will observe the full procedural requirements, which will provide a renewed opportunity for any members of the public who wish to do so to make formal objections. In the circumstances, the Secretary of State proposes to take no further action on the objections which were made to the scheme as originally submitted.

Contraceptive Advice

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent advice he has given to Scottish general practitioners about contraceptive advice for girls aged under 16 years.

Mr. John MacKay: None.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Fishing Industry

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has made any representations about the implications for the Northern Ireland fishing industry arising from Spain's application for accession to the Treaty of Rome; to whom these representations were made; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson: No; the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland is fully involved, along with the other Fisheries Departments, in assessing the implications of Spanish accession for the fishing industry and in formulating advice for ministers participating in the European Community enlargement negotiations. Representatives of the Northern Ireland fishing industry are being kept informed of the progress of negotiations.

Community Enterprise Scheme

Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will consider extending from one year to two years the maximum period of employment for each individual employed under the community enterprise scheme.

Dr. Boyson: The action for community employment (ACE) scheme aims to assist the long-term unemployed regain their "employment" skills through a period of temporary employment. One year is regarded as a suitable time in which this may be achieved. Under existing arrangements, the Department of Economic Development may extend the period of employment of a key ACE worker on whom other ACE posts depend; but a general extension to two years would substantially reduce the number of people who could benefit from the scheme without enhancing the permanent employment prospects of ACE workers.

Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will consider, in the case of recognised charities which sponsor community enterprise schemes, funding such sponsors at 100 per cent.

Dr. Boyson: Since its inception in 1981, registered charities have been significant contributors to the action for community employment (ACE) scheme. In common with other ACE sponsors, they have in general accepted the principle of 90 per cent. funding.

These funding arrangments ensure a degree of commitment on the part of each sponsor and enable the maximum number of long-term unemployed to participate in the scheme in any one year. Accordingly, I have no plans to alter the funding arrangements.

Overseas Students (Fees)

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the present position in regard to university fees charged to overseas students, including those from the Republic of Eire in attendance at Queens and Ulster universities; and whether any changes are envisaged for the future.

Mr. Scott: The level of tuition fees in universities is a matter for the authorities of each institution. However, grant paid by the Department of Education for Northern Ireland to Queen's University and the University of Ulster is based on the assumptions that

(a) home students and students from other European Community countries (including the Republic of Ireland) will be charged fees at the level recommended to universities in Great Britain by the Secretary of State for Education and Science; and

(b) other overseas students will be charged fees which will at least cover the marginal costs attributable to them and which will vary from course to course.

The policy on overseas students' fees is reviewed annually by the Department of Education for Northern Ireland in the light of student enrolments.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will publish in the Official Report the number of long-term youth unemployed in each year since 1979 to the latest date;

(2) what assessment he has made of the impact of the Budget on reducing unemployment in the Province;

(3) what plans he has to reduce unemployment in the Province; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what is the level of unemployment in the Province at the latest date; and what were the figures for June 1979.

Dr. Boyson: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Firearms Repairers (Castlereagh)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons within Castlereagh borough are licensed to repair firearms.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Contracts

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many contracts advertised during the 1983-84 financial years, were cancelled after tenders were received; and if he will list them;

(2) how many contracts advertised during the present financial year were cancelled after tenders had been received; and if he will list them.

Dr. Boyson [pursuant to his reply, 25 March 1985, c. 34]: The information is as follows:

Financial Year 1983-84

Six contracts were cancelled. They were:

1. Repairs and alterations to loading/unloading bay at Larne harbour.
2. Part internal redecoration, Crown buildings, Coleraine.
3. Temporary building at Ballynafeigh Royal Ulster Constabulary station.
4. Alterations to kitchen, Limavady Royal Ulster Constabulary station.
5. Laying of carpet, Churchill house, Belfast.

6. Supply of black plastic bags for use in all Government Departments.

Financial Year 1984-85 (to date)

Three contracts were cancelled. They were:

1. Landscaping of phase III, Poleglass.
2. Mastic asphalt patching.
3. Computer numerically controlled turning centre for use in a Government training centre.

Orlit Houses

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current position regarding the repair and upkeep of Orlit houses currently in Housing Executive ownership.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 25 March 1985, c. 34]: I am informed by the chairman of the Housing Executive that assessments of the structural condition of Orlit dwellings have now been completed. The minimum life expectancy is estimated at five to 10 years while the majority of Orlits have a life expectancy of 10 to 15 or 15 to 30 years. Proposals for replacements or improvement as appropriate are being drawn up by the Housing Executive in consultations with tenants and public representatives. In the meantime a response maintenance service is being provided for all the Housing Executive's groups of Orlit properties.

Strabane (Housing)

Rev. William McCrea asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Southern Irish army soldiers are living in Northern Ireland Housing Executive houses in the Strabane area.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 25 March 1985, c. 35]: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. The chairman has indicated that precise information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Ancillary Workers (Bursaries)

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he takes to ensure that bursaries available for the training of social workers, radiographers, occupational therapists, chiropodists and dental students, from funds provided by his Department, are taken up; and if he will take steps to ensure that there is no shortfall in the intake of students for these courses next year.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985, c. 301]: Social work and dental students receive mandatory awards for degree courses from the five education and library boards in Northern Ireland. Bursaries for students undertaking diploma courses in radiography, occupational therapy, chiropody and social work are awarded by the Department of Health and Social Services to ensure that the supply of suitably qualified persons matches the demand of the health and personal social services in Northern Ireland.

St. Patrick's Day Parades (Control)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which foreign countries made representations about the use of the Public Order Act 1891 to control parades on Saint Patrick's Day 1985; what response he has made to such representations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I have been asked to reply.

The Irish Government made representations about the control of a St. Patrick's Day parade in Portadown. Her Majesty's embassy in Dublin has explained that the control of parades is primarily a matter for the operational judgment of the Royal Ulster Constabulary.

EMPLOYMENT

Factories Inspectorate (Case Load)

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the ratio of staff to live case load in the Factories Inspectorate for each of the last five years; and what it is now.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Factory Inspectorate does not operate on a case load basis. The inspectorate's current programme is described in paragraphs 141-152 of the Health and Safety Commission's Plan of Work 1985-1986. A copy is in the Library.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give, from the survey of youth training scheme leavers reported to the last meeting of the youth training board, the number and proportion of mode A managing agents, mode B1 sponsors, and mode B2 sponsors who subcontract no, some and all work experience placements to other employers and providers.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Information based on the Manpower Services Commission's 1984 survey of youth training scheme providers is as follows.

	Mode A		Mode B1		Mode B2
	Per cent.	Number of schemes*	Per cent.	Number of schemes*	Per cent.	Number of schemes*

* Results from the 1984 providers survey applied to the count of schemes obtained from the October 1983 census of schemes.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give, from the survey of youth training scheme providers reported to the last meeting of the Manpower Services Commission's youth training board, the number and proportion of mode A, mode B1, and mode B2 schemes that accept (a) all applicants, (b) more than three quarters if all applicants, (c) more than half of all applicants and (d) more than a quarter of all applicants, respectively.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information is not available in the precise form requested. Information based on the Manpower Services Commission's 1984 survey of youth training scheme providers is as follows:

Percentage of applicants accepted	Mode A		Mode B1		Mode B2
	Per cent.	Number of schemes*	Per cent.	Number of schemes*	Per cent.	Number of schemes*

* Results from the 1984 providers survey, applied to the count of schemes obtained from the October 1983 census of schemes.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment on what factors he bases his estimation that once the second year of training announced in the Budget in respect of youth training scheme is operational all school leavers under the age of 18 years will have access to a job, training or further education.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 29 March 1985]: Our aim, once the extended youth training scheme is fully in operation, is to be able to offer places on it to all 16- and 17-year olds who are not in either education or a job.

School Leavers

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has as to how many people leaving school in the year 1983-84 obtained jobs within six months of leaving school; and how many obtained jobs after spending some time on a youth training course.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Comprehensive information of the type requested is being gathered in the special studies I referred to in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) on 18 February, at columns 347-8. Information is also being obtained from surveys of young people leaving the youth training scheme, but results so far available from these surveys relate principally to young people who left school before the year 1983-84.

Youth Training

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people who have been on youth training or youth opportunity schemes have found work after training in each of the last five years in the Greater London area; and what percentage this represents of those who have been on such schemes.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Valid information on the destination of leavers is not available at regional level for young people who took part in the youth opportunities programme. It is intended that by about June 1985 regional information will be available on a regular basis for youth training scheme leavers.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will take steps to encourage young people of Asian and West Indian origin to apply for places on mode A youth training schemes.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission actively pursues an equal opportunities policy and encourages the participation of all eligible youngsters in mode A schemes wherever possible.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many, and what percentage, of young people on youth training schemes, mode A, in the years for which records are available were of (a) West Indian and (b) Asian origin.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The available information is as follows.

Ethnic group	Number of entrants	Percentage of total entrants
1. September 1983 to March 1984:
Afro-Caribbean	4,663	2·04
Asian	2,742	1·20
2. April 1984 to February 1985:
Afro-Caribbean	4,611	1·66
Asian	3,410	1·22

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the average annual cost of a youth training scheme training place, modes A and B.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The latest estimated cost for 1984-85 of a full year entrant on the youth training scheme is:-

Mode A	2,050
Mode B1	3,800
Mode B2	2,300
Weighted average	2,400

These figures exclude the cost of unfilled places, vacated places, travel costs, lodging allowances, etc.

Average Wage

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the average wage for full-time (a) males and (b) females in the east midlands; and what are the comparable figures (i) nationally and (ii) in the south-east.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The latest information relates to full-time employees on adult rates working a full week in April 1984. Figures of average gross weekly earnings for such employees in each region of Great Britain, and in Great Britain as a whole, are published for males in table 110 and for females in table 113 of new earnings survey 1984, part E. A copy is in the Library.

Low-paid Workers

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of low-paid workers receiving less than £100 per week in the east midlands in 1983 were women.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The new earnings survey for April 1983 indicated that for those adult full-time employees whose gross weekly earings for a full week were less than £100, about two-thirds were women.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of female manual employees in the east midlands earned less than £100 per week at the latest available date.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The latest information relates to full-time adult female manual employees working a full week in April 1984 and is published in table 111 of new earnings survey 1984, Part E. A copy is in the Library.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of (a) male and (b) female workers earned less than £100 per week in the east midlands in the following industries at the latest available date: (i) textiles, (ii) clothing and (iii) hotel and catering.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is not available.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many jobs have been lost in (a) the metal manufacturing, (b) the engineering, (c) the textile and (d) the mining industries in Derbyshire since May 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information about job gains and job losses is not available from the Department's statistics.

Net changes in employment can be given but, for areas smaller than regions, only for those dates when censuses of employment are taken. The latest available information for the county of Derbyshire is from the June 1978 and the following September 1981 census of employment and is as follows:

Orders of the Standard Industrial Classification 1968		Net changes in the numbers of employees in employment June 1978 to September 1981 (thousands)
VI	Metal manufacture	−3·0
VII	Mechanical engineering	+2·1
VIII	Instrument engineering	−0·7
IX	Electrical engineering	−1·3
XIII	Textiles	−7·7
II$_0$	Mining and quarrying	+1·2

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people are currently registered as unemployed, expressed as a percentage of the total of those estimated to be employed and self-employed.

Mr. Alan Clark: In February 1985 there were 3,323,700 claimants unemployed in the United Kingdom. The published unemployment rate of 13.7 per cent. expresses this figure as a percentage of the estimated number of employees in employment (21,158,500) plus the unemployed (3,029,700) in June 1984. The self-employed (2,494,000 at the same date) are not included in the denominator for the reasons given in my reply to my hon. Friend of 14 January at column 334.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give, for each quarter since 1979, an index of output per person in the labour force, namely, employed and unemployed, for the whole economy, for manufacturing industries and for non-manufacturing industries.

Mr. Alan Clark: Quarterly estimates of output per person in the working population—that is employees in employment, self employed, HM forces and unemployed—for the United Kingdom are shown as index values with 1980 as 100.

	Q3	104·7

Separate indices are not available for manufacturing and non-manufacturing industries as the numbers unemployed are not classified by industry.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the rise in unemployment in the west midlands from April 1983 to the latest available date.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following information is in the library. Unemployment in the west midlands fell by 9,900, seasonally adjusted, between April 1983 and February 1985. However the provisions of the 1983 Budget meant an estimated 17,100 men no longer had to sign on, to receive supplementary benefit or national insurance credits after April 1983.

Community Programme

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the weekly cost to the Manpower Services Commission of each place on the community programme; what is the breakdown between payments to staff and participants; and what proposals there are to increase such payments.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The 1985 Public Expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9428) estimates the gross cost to the Department of Employment in the previous year of a participant in the community programme as some £4,290 per year. The administrative costs of a place on the programme to the Manpower Services Commission are estimated at some £76 on the same basis. There are no current proposals to increase the average wage limit applying on the community programme although most programme participants will benefit financially from the changes in employees' National insurance contributions and personal tax allowances announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget.

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of the participants in the community programme nationally and in west Yorkshire are of (a) Asian origin, (b) west Indian origin and (c) white.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Community programme entrants are not classified by ethnic origin, but sample surveys taken at six monthly intervals indicate that between 4 per cent. and 9 per cent. of programme participants are from ethnic minorities.

Equal Opportunities Officer

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will now appoint a departmental equal opportunities officer with responsibility for co-ordinating the Civil Service policy of non-discrimination within his Department.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Officers within the personnel divisions of all parts of the Department of Employment group have been designated as equal opportunity officers. They have responsibility for advising on the full scope of equal opportunity matters concerning race and sex discrimination.

Wages Councils

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the estimated costs for operating the wages councils and associated activities for 1985-86.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The estimated cost of administrating wages councils, including the cost of the wages inspectorate, for the 1985-86 financial year is around £4·3 million.

Professional and Executive Register

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he now intends to take steps to turn the job finding activities of the Professional and Executive Register over to the private sector.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Youth Training and Community Programme

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment what new specific vocational opportunities he intends to introduce into the youth training scheme; and what initiatives he plans to promote, to extend the involvement of the private sector and charities in the community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 29 March 1985]: We have asked the Manpower Services Commission to make detailed recommendations for an extended youth training scheme, including its design and content, after consultations with interested parties. We have also invited the commission to investigate immediately ways in which the community programme may be developed in relation to the private sector and charities and we are awaiting their response. £10 million may be available for experiments in this area.

Youth Unemployment

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether discussions have taken place below his Department and the Manpower Services Commission over financial responsibility for unemployed 16 and 17-year-olds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 29 March 1985] No such discussions have taken place.

SOCIAL SERVICES

EC (Health Services)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action his Department has taken or plans to take to increase co-operation in research, joint facilities and harmonisation of systems between health services in European Community member states; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The Department plays a significant part in the third concerted action programme of medical and public health research (1982-1986) under which the community provides funds for the co-ordination of research funded from national sources. The programme which comprises thirty three projects, one of which is entirely devoted to health services research, is supervised by four Standing Committees. The United Kingdom assists in the preparation of protocols for these activities and takes a major part in the consideration of all health service research projects.

Increased harmonisation of the health systems of member states of the Community is not one of our objectives. However, last November my right hon. and learned Friend met with our colleagues from the other member states in Brussels for an informal exchange of views and information on a number of health matters, including the control of health care costs, and action against drug misuse, smoking and communicable diseases. Another such meeting is scheduled to take place in Venice in May.

Leukaemia (Severnside)

Mr. Marland asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any evidence of any direct link between outbreaks of leukaemia on Severnside and the nuclear power stations on the banks of the Severn estuary.

Mr. John Patten: We have no such evidence.

Home Helps

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has as to the charges to individuals made by each local authority social services department in England for their home help services.

Mr. John Patten: Very few representations directly related to charges have been received by the Department over the last three months. These have been referred to the local authority providing the service, whose responsibility it is to set the charge and to reduce or waive it if the circumstances of the person concerned require this.

Mr. and Mrs. Z. Ahmed (Member's Correspondence)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to give an answer to the hon. Member for Stretford to his letter of 29 January in connection with Mr. and Mrs. Z Ahmed of 48 Brantingham road, Manchester.

Mr. Whitney: I wrote to the hon. Member on 29 March.

Retirement Age

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the cost of reducing the retirement age for men to 64 years.

Mr. Whitney: The latest available estimates of the cost of reducing pension age are contained in the third report from the Social Services Committee on the "Age of Retirement" (HC 26: 1982). These estimates indicate that the cost of reducing the pension age for men to 64 would be £400 million at 1981-82 benefit levels.

Queen Elizabeth Medical Centre, Birmingham

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will give the number of patients, in each of the last three years, who have been admitted to Queen Elizabeth medical centre in Birmingham for open heart surgery, and who have subsequently had their operation postponed and have been discharged because of lack of intensive care facilities; and what, in each of the last three years, was (a) the shortest, (b) the longest and (c) the average time, expressed in hours, between their discharge and the originaly scheduled time of their operation;

(2) if he will give the number of (a) National Health Service and (b) private beds that have been available in the intensive care unit at the Queen Elizabeth medical centre in Birmingham for open heart surgery patients for each of the last five years; whether he is satisfied with intensive care facilities at the centre; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We do not collect this sort of detailed local information centrally. The provision of intensive care facilities is a matter for the health authority concerned. I understand, however, that work on a development at the Queen Elizabeth hospital which will include 20 intensive therapy beds is planned to start in 1986.

In Vitro Fertilisations

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many in vitro fertilisations have been carried out in each of the past three years; and how many, in each year, were carried out by the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not hold this information centrally. The following National Health Service hospitals have confirmed that they have in vitro fertilisation programmes:

The Hammersmith Hospital, London
Chelsea Hospital for Women, London
Royal Free Hospital, London
St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London
King's College Hospital, London
St. Mary's Central, Manchester
Southmead Hospital, Bristol
Bristol Royal Infirmary
Birmingham Maternity Hospital
Jessop Hospital for Women, Sheffield

Miners (Unemployment Benefit)

Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many people who voluntary resigned from the employment of the National Coal Board during the course of the 1984-85 miners' strike were subsequently refused unemployment benefit; and if he will list the numbers involved by region;

(2) how many people who voluntarily resigned from the employment of the National Coal Board during the course of the 1984-85 miners' strike are still being refused unemployment benefit; and if he will list the numbers involved by region.

Mr. Newton: This information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will explain the basis on which claimants who resigned from the employment of the National Coal Board during the course of the 1984-85 miners' strike are still being refused unemployment benefit.

Mr. Newton: A person who loses his employment as a result of a stoppage of work due to a trade dispute at his place of employment is disqualified for receiving unemployment benefit unless he can show that he is not participating in or directly interested in the dispute. Such disqualification continues for as long as the stoppage of work continues, unless he finds genuine work elsewhere in his normal occupation or becomes regularly engaged in some other occupation.

A miner subject to disqualification before he resigned, therefore, remains disqualified for receiving unemployment benefit until the stoppage of work ends. It is for the independent adjudicating authorities to decide whether the stoppage has ended in the light of the caselaw and of the situation at each individual place of employment.

Community Hospital, Peterlee

Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the progress being made on the provision of a community hospital in Peterlee.

Mr. John Patten: The decision as to which hospital development, should be included in the regional capital programme is a matter for the Northern regional health authority in the light of its service priorities and the resources available.

Industrial Diseases (Regulations)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to introduce regulations and an amended death certificate in respect of the Industrial Diseases (Notification) Act.

Mr. John Patten: It is planned to introduce the new certificate of cause of death on 1 June 1985.

Children (Supervision Code)

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has any proposals for legislation or a code of conduct concerning the minimum age at which a child can be left unsupervised.

Mr. John Patten: No. Wilful neglect of a child aged under 16 by a person aged 16 or over with responsibility for the child is already an offence in certain circumstances (section 1 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933). Under the Children and Young Persons Act 1969 there is a duty on local authorities to investigate reports that children are at risk—such as young children being left alone.

Resettlement Units

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what agreements have been reached in the Camberwell replacement scheme to provide alternative, suitable accommodation for the varying needs of the resettlement unit residents, with particular reference to the provision of emergency access hostels.

Mr. Whitney: Up to 27 March 1984 the Department has agreed revenue funding for 20 voluntary organisations to provide 659 bedspaces under the Camberwell replacement scheme. This provision offers varying levels and models of care which can be broadly categorised as 135 bedspaces for residents requiring high care and 524 bedspaces for residents requiring low to medium care.

We consider that both the London boroughs and voluntary organisations have a role to play on the provision of direct access beds and discussions are taking place towards that end. In addition, 80 direct access beds will be provided in the other London resettlement units.

Food (Irradiation)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about the implications for consumers of the process of irradiating food adopted by some food producers.

Mr. John Patten: In the United Kingdom, regulations prohibit the production, importation and sale of irradiated foods for human consumption, except for patients requiring sterile diets. The advisory committee on irradiated and novel foods is currently preparing a report for Health and Agriculture Ministers on the safety and wholesomeness of irradiated foods, and we expect to publish it in due course.

Miss Briscoe

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to be in a position to reply to correspondence from the hon. Member for Berwick upon Tweed dated 7 November 1984 about Miss Briscoe.

Mr. Newton: I regret the delay and I have now replied to the hon. Member.

Prescription Charges (Exemptions)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about his Department's leaflet P11 and the calculations for low income exemption from prescription charges; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Since 1 January this year we have received two letters from hon. and right hon. Members concerning the leaflet P11 and the calculation required for low income exemption from prescription charges, and none from the public. We believe the present arrangements are satisfactory.

Departmental Office, Glasgow

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects that his Department's new Maryhill office at Gairbraid avenue will be fully operational; and what arrangements he has on hand for the disposal of the former planned site at Tamshill street.

Mr. Whitney: The new Glasgow (Maryhill) ILO is expected to be ready for operations by the end of 1985. The site at Tamshill street is being disposed of by the Property Services Agency.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will consider extending the current automatic exemption from dental and optical charges for those aged under 19 years but still in full-time education to include automatic exemption from prescription charges.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have no plans to extend automatic exemption from prescription charges to young people aged 16 to 19 still in full-time education.

Above the age of 16 young people move to the general system of exemption. Young people aged 16 or over are therefore able to apply in their own right for exemption from prescription charges on low income grounds whether or not they are in full-time education and irrespective of their parents' circumstances. Many young people qualify for free prescriptions in this way.

Neonatal Units

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what instructions he has given to health authorities on sub-regional provision of neonatal intensive care, in the light of the third report of the maternity services advisory committee;

(2) whether he has instructed health authorities to regard as minimum standards the ratios for midwifery and nursing staffing of neonatal units recommended in paragraph 8.7 of the third report of the maternity services advisory committee.

Mr. John Patten: We have welcomed the maternity services advisory committee's third report and have asked health authorities to decide, in the light of its advice, what action can and should be taken at regional and district levels to improve the provision of maternity and neonatal services, including provision for neonatal intensive care. We expect authorities to take the committee's advice into account when planning, monitoring and reviewing services and staffing levels.

Mrs. Doris Woodhead

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will now review the case of Mrs. Doris Woodhead in the light of Commissioner Goodman's decision of 16 October 1984 (Case No. 49(7)), so that she receives increments on her pension and thereafter at the levels of interest in force at the time; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when Mrs. Doris Woodhead of 25 Saunders way, West Charlton, Kingsbridge, Devon, will receive payment of the award made by Commissioner Goodman on 16 October 1984 at the Croydon and district local tribunal (Case No. 49(7)); what is the reason for the delay; if interest will be paid on the sum outstanding; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: A payment for the appropriate amount will be sent to Mrs. Woodhead on Monday 1 April and I will be writing to my hon. Friend shortly.

Bradford District Health Authority

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the change in real terms for the Bradford district health authority between 1978 and 1983 in the (a) number of inpatient cases treated by hospitals, (b) number of day cases treated by hospitals, (c) number of outpatient attendances dealt with by hospitals, (d) spending on health services and (e) number of doctors and nurses.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Dental Charges

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much was collected in 1984-85 in National Health Service dental charges for crowns, for dentures and for other treatment, listed separately, for England; and how much is expected to be collected under the same headings in 1985-86.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply when the 1985-86 figures become available.

Committee on Gynaecological Cytology

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether, in formulating its recommendations in 1981 and subsequently, the committee on gynaecological cytology was advised or instructed that it should not require more resources to be deployed.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The committee on gynaecological cytology is composed of independent experts who have always been free to make whatever recommendations they believe appropriate.

Children at Risk

Mr. Dickens asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether, in the light of the evidence presented in the case of the death of Jasmine Beckford, he is satisfied with the training and standards of those employed by local authorities to undertake the supervision of cases involving children at risk; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: This case demonstrates the difficulties social work staff face and emphasises the need for good training and the development of skills in supervision. The Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work (CCETSW) keeps the scope and content of social work training programmes under review. In addition there are opportunities for qualified staff to attend post qualifying courses approved by CCETSW on child care to promote the development of child care knowledge and skill. There are also training opportunities provided locally and by organisations such as the National Children's Bureau and the British Association for the Study and Prevention of Child Abuse and Neglect.

Single Payments (Furniture)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now make available to the House the report of the Social Security Policy Inspectorate on the single payments for furniture.

Mr. Newton: We have today arranged for copies of the report to be available for hon. Members in the Vote Office and also for copies to be placed in the Library.

Because the rules on single payments for furniture, in particular those relating to the availability and suitability of alternative furnished accommodation, had proved difficult to operate, the Social Security Policy Inspectorate was asked to study the criteria for making such payments to unemployed claimants. It was asked in particular to report on the circumstances in which claims were being paid and refused; how the adjudication authorities were interpreting the provisions; what effect the decisions had on claimants and to what extent awards of large single payments were or were not apparently justified.

The inspectors found that the staff had difficulty in operating and explaining the provisions, in particular in establishing the reasons for the move and whether claimants should be expected to remain in their previous accommodation; since the fieldwork was carried out the chief adjudication officer has, following a decision of a tribunal of social security commissioners, issued revised guidance to local adjudication officers which has helped to resolve the most difficult areas of interpretation.

The report concludes that it is difficult to establish and apply fair and consistent tests to decide who should receive payments for essential furniture on moving into unfurnished accommodation. Of particular note, the inspectors found that large single payments for furniture tend to go to young single people and people previously living with parents or other relatives; 60 per cent. of the payments were made to claimants who, in the inspectors' view, could reasonably have been expected to remain in their existing accommodation; most of them who received a payment would have still taken the tenancy even if payment had been refused; in only two cases did the inspectors consider that the single payment had not been properly spent.

Publication of this report should assist the Social Security Advisory Committee in its consideration of the Supplementary Benefit (Single Payments) Regulations 1984. The Government will consider the rules governing single payments for furniture further in the light of the committee's report but does not intend to make changes before publication of the Government's proposals for the future of the supplementary benefit scheme although some changes may be needed before a full-scale overhaul of the scheme is implemented.

We have sent copies of the report to the Social Security Advisory Committee. In view of the widespread interest in this matter, we have decided to publish the report and copies are available to the public (price £3.20) from the Department's leaflets unit at Canons Park.

Tranquillisers

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list those bodies funded by his Department which are engaged in combating the side effects of tranquillisers, indicating the extent of such funding; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 27 March 1985, c. 255-6]: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 11 February at columns 77-8.

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will establish training courses for general practitioners on the problems of the long-term use of tranquillisers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 27 March 1985, c. 255-6]: Doctors have many sources of information on the uses of tranquillisers including drug data sheets, the British National Formulary and the Open University course topics in drug therapy, which was funded by this Department. Programmes of continuing education for general medical practitioners are administered and provided by regional postgraduate deans from allocations made by the Department. The content of those courses is for the professional and educational bodies concerned and doctors themselves to determine.

Claimants (Residential Care)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action his Department has taken to ensure that benefit paid to claimants resident in old persons' homes is used for the purposes for which it is granted; and if he will make a statement on his Department's actions in ensuring the protection of the financial interests of such claimants.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 29 March 1985]: A person — usually a relative or friend — can be appointed to deal with a person's benefit when that person cannot deal with his or her own affairs. But where a claimant lives in an old persons' home and a relative or friend cannot be appointed, a responsible person at the home is asked to act. Such appointment may be revoked whenever benefit is not administered in a satisfactory manner.

The Residential Care Homes Regulations, 1984, require the person registered to run such a home to keep a record of all money or other valuables deposited for safekeeping by residents showing when the deposit was made and when any sum or other valuable was returned to a resident or used at his request on his behalf, and the purpose for which it is used.

Mentally Ill Patients, Salford

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, pursuant to the answer of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten) on 12 March concerning mentally ill patients in Salford, he will make a statement on the representations made to him by the Salford city council and the Salford health authority; what assessment he made of the problems they drew to his attention and with particular reference to Prestwich hospital, and on the response he made.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to the reply, 19 March 1985, c. 452]: We are not aware of any direct representations from either body. The hon. Member has told me of his concern about Prestwich hospital and health services in Salford generally. I have today written to him.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Standing Order No. 2

31. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal what is his policy regarding the use of the provisions of Standing Order No. 2.

Mr. Biffen: I have no proposals to use this Standing Order for the re-introduction of morning sittings.

Departmental Legislation

Mr. Galley asked the Lord Privy Seal how many Acts of Parliament have been promoted and how many statutory instruments made by Departments, for which he answers, or predecessor Departments covering his areas of responsibility, in each of the last 20 years.

Mr. Biffen: Her Majesty's Stationery Office publishes annually "Lists of Statutory Instruments" and "Tables and Indices to Public and General Acts and General Synod Measures". Both of these are currently up to date to the end of 1983.

Given the change to the machinery of government over the last 20 years, apportionment of the Acts or statutory instruments to the areas of present ministerial responsibility could be done only at disproportionate cost.

Refreshment Department

Dr. Marek asked the Lord Privy Seal how much European Economic Community intervention butter was bought by the House of Commons Refreshment Department in each of the last four months; and what percentage this represents of the total amount of butter bought.

Mr. Biffen: European Economic Community intervention butter was not bought by the House of Commons Refreshment Department until 10 January, as the Department's suppliers were unable to obtain it before that date. Figures for purchases of intervention butter since 10 January are as follows:

	lb's	Per cent. of total bought
10 January—31 January	660	90
1 February—28 February	1,300	90
1 March—25 March	1,000	87

The remaining butter (overall average 11 per cent.) was purchased as butter pats (foil wrapped); European Economic Community intervention butter is not available in this form.

Commission Staff (Overtime)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, how many people employed by the Commission are eligible for overtime; how many actually worked overtime in the most recent week for which figures are available; and how many additional staff would be required if there was no overtime worked.

Mr. Beith: I will write to the hon. Gentleman.

CIVIL SERVICE

Work Transfer

35. Mr. Soley asked the Minister for the Civil Service what discussions he has had with local authorities concerning the transfer of work from the Civil Service to local authorities.

Mr. Hayhoe: None.

Data Processing

Mr. Warren asked the Minister for the Civil Service why Government-sponsored and approved training courses in computer technology are not acceptable qualifications for entry into data processing jobs in the Civil Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: No formal qualifications are needed for entry to the grade of data processor, which carries out the day-to-day operation of computers in the Civil Service. Promotion from this grade is possible via the clerical officer or senior data processor grades to the grade of Executive Officer, responsible for most of the programming and systems analysis work. An officer so promoted may, subject to passing a programming aptitude test and to the availability of vacancies, be assigned to these duties.

To enter directly the grade of executive officer, however, a candidate must meet the minimum academic requirement of five GCE passes, including two at advanced level, or offer an equivalent or higher qualification. Successive reviews of automatic data processing in the Civil Service have concluded that computer programming and systems analysis should continue to be undertaken by executive grades in the administration group, and that such staff should be capable of performing a range of executive duties much broader than specialised computer work. Furthermore, the executive officer grade is the main source from which the more senior and intellectually demanding management posts of the future will be filled. It is important, therefore, that the direct entry standards applied to those who wish to work with computers should be the same as those applied to executive officers generally.

ENERGY

Cross-Channel Electricity Link

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will place in the Library the protocol agreement signed by the Central Electricity Generating Board and Electricité de France in 1981 regarding the cross-Channel electricity link.

Mr. Goodlad: No. The protocol is a commercial agreement between the electricity utilities of this country and France.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Fuel (VAT)

37. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the implications for energy policy of the reasoned opinion of the EEC Commission on the levying of value added tax on fuel including gas and electricity.

Mr. Hayhoe: At present the reasoned opinion has no implications for energy policy. The Commission has alleged that, when supplied to businesses, the United Kingdom's zero rating of fuel and power is contrary to the provisions of the sixth VAT directive. As I told my hon. Friend on 22 November 1984 at column 270, the Government has rejected the Commission's view, and the Commission must now decide in the light of our response whether to put the matter to the European Court.

Tips (Taxation)

Mr. Merchant asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the Inland Revenue practice in relation to the tax treatment of tips and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: In law, tips are part of an employee's taxable income in the same way as his other earnings. In some businesses tips can form a substantial part of an employee's take-home pay. Unfortunately not all employees return details of the tips they receive. In these circumstances inspectors of taxes may have to make an estimate of the tips earned on the basis of the facts available to ensure that the correct amount of tax is paid. Any employee who disagrees with the estimate may, however, appeal in the usual way. If agreement on the correct figure cannot be reached, the matter may be considered at an informal meeting before the independent general commissioners.

Before making an estimate for tips, inspectors of taxes are, however, instructed to establish first who is and who is not in a position to receive them. Wherever possible, they are asked to negotiate agreed figures with the employees concerned, or with their representatives. In the case of postmen's tips, some tax offices did not follow all the instructions of the Inland Revenue's head office. The Inland Revenue apologises for this and has reminded the offices concerned of the need to establish the facts with local post office management and staff.

In the many instances where correct procedures have been followed, however, substantial amounts of tips have subsequently been returned. A recent exercise over a period of about a year was conducted by tax offices in one of the 14 tax regions in relation to the hotel and catering industry. In a review of employees at 500 or so establishments, amounts averaging from £750 to £1,500 per annum per employee depending on the size of the establishment were agreed upon once the facts had been established, yielding additional revenue for one year alone of some £650,000. The negotiations leading to these agreements involved discussions wth individual employees in many cases; or with their representatives where large numbers were employed at a particular establishment. The lowest average agreed tips per full-time employee at any one of the establishments involved was £750 per annum; and some individuals at the larger, well-known establishments agreed they received tips of up to £7,500 per annum.

Such investigations are carried out by the Inland Revenue as part of its duties to counter evasion wherever it may occur.

Manufacturing (Production and Employment)

Mr. Pike asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the effect of his Budget on production and employment prospects in the manufacturing industries.

Mr. Peter Rees: The forecast published in the FSBR, which takes account of the measures announced in the Budget, envisages growth of 2·5 per cent. in manufacturing output in 1985. Employment in manufacturing will benefit from the Government's supply side policies, including the measures announced in the Budget.

Energy Industries (Financing Limits)

Mr. Rowlands asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate has has now made of the external financing limits of the National Coal Board and the electricity industries of England and Wales for 1985-86 and 1986-87 in arriving at the planning totals announced in the Budget.

Mr. Peter Rees: It is too soon to forecast the external financing requirements of the National Coal Board and the electricity supply industry in 1985-86 and 1986-87, but the figures are under review. Any net increase over existing provision included in Cmnd. 9428 for 1985-86 would be a charge to the reserve of £5 billion which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced in his Budget Statement. The 1986-87 figures will be considered during the 1985 Public Expenditure Survey.

Departmental Achievements

Mr. Pawsey asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list his Department's principal achievements since 1979.

Mr. Peter Rees: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor described the Government's economic achievements since 1979 in answer to a similar question in May 1984, at column 437.

The Government have maintained the policies, set out in the medium term financial strategy, aimed at reducing inflation and creating the conditions for continued growth in output and employment. Inflation in 1984 was around 5 per cent. for the second successive year, the first time this has happened since the late 1960s. Output grew by a further 2·5 per cent. to reach a record level, despite the impact of the coal strike.

The Budget contained proposals to improve the supply performance of the economy and so promote output and employment. These included further real increases in income tax thresholds, a restructuring of the national insurance contributions paid by employers, employees and the self-employed, and a further expansion of the Government's employment and training measures. There was also further progress on tax reform.

We have continued to return public sector enterprises to the private sector, with the successful privatisation of Enterprise Oil and British Telecom, creating over 1 million new shareholders, and furthering the Government's policies for the spread of wealth and ownership.

The United Kingdom is about to enter the fifth year of continuous growth. After some temporary rise up to the middle of the year, inflation is forecast to fall back to 5 per cent. by the year end. Output is forecast to rise by a further 3·5 per cent., in 1985.

Exchange Rate

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing, for each month since the United Kingdom joined the European monetary system, what effect the change in the exchange rate for the pound sterling had on the value of the European currency unit against other currencies and in terms of its value with the pound sterling.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The table give exchange rates for the United States dollar and sterling against the ecu as standardly defined, and against the ecu minus its sterling currency component, monthly* from March 1979:

Notes:

* All figures are end-month, except for March 1985, where the figures refer to 27 March.

† $/ECU (excluding £) = ($/ECU) − ($/£ × amount of £ in ECU basket). Prior to the change in the ECU's definition on 17 September 1984, the currency amount of sterling in the ECU was £0·0885; since then it has been £0·0878.

‡ £/ECU (excluding £) = (£/$) × ($/ECU (excluding £)).

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the effect on output and employment of each one percentage change in the real exchange rate between sterling and the deutschmark.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Reliable quantitative estimates are not available. The effect will depend on the reason for the change in the exchange rate, on what is happening to other exchange rates, and on assumptions about other developments in the economy.

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

Mr. Sims asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the components of the public sector borrowing requirement; and what criteria he uses in determining what should qualify for inclusion within the public sector borrowing requirement.

Mr. Peter Rees: The components are net borrowing by central Government, local authorities and public corporations. The essential criterion is that the borrowing be by a public sector body. For further details, see articles in the August 1980 and February 1984 issues of Economic Trends.

Charities (VAT)

Sir Peter Emery asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take steps to arrange for information on the total amount of value added tax paid by charitable organisations to be collected.

Mr. Hayhoe: As most of the value added tax paid by charities arises on their purchases of taxable goods and services, information about the total amount of tax borne by charities is not available from existing official records and could only be collected at disproportionate cost which I do not consider justified. The collection of such information would also place a heavy and undesirable administrative burden on the charities themselves.

Equal Opportunities Officer

Mr. Janner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will now appoint a departmental equal opportunities officer with responsibility for co-ordinating the Civil Service policy of non-discrimination within his Department.

Mr. Hayhoe: In the Treasury an officer within the personnel division has been designated as equal opportunity officer with responsibility for advising on the full scope of equal opportunity matters as they concern race and sex discrimination.

Departmental Legislation

Mr. Galley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many Acts of Parliament have been promoted and how many statutory instruments made by his Department, or predecessor Departments covering his areas of responsibility, in each of the last 20 years.

Mr. Hayhoe: Her Majesty's Stationery Office publishes annually "Lists of Statutory Instruments"' and "Tables and Indices to Public and General Acts and General Synod Measures". Both of these are currently up to date to the end of 1983.

Given the changes to the machinery of government over the last 20 years, apportionment of the Acts or statutory instruments to the areas of present ministerial responsibility could be done only at disproportionate cost.

Civil Service (Graduates)

Mr. Fisher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the starting level of pay for a graduate entering the Civil Service as an (a) administrative trainee and (b) executive officer.

Mr. Hayhoe: Executive officers enter the first three points of the scale shown below according to age:

Age 18	4,728
Age 19	5,234
Age 20 and over	6,017
	6,596
	7,142
	7,701
	8,492

Administration trainees normally enter at the minimum of the scale following, but on the recommendation of the selection board those with relevant experience or qualifications above the minimum required may enter at any higher point on the scale.

Administration trainee:
£6,596
£7,142
£7,701
£8,492

Company Cars

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what was was the revenue raised by the taxation as a benefit of company cars in each of the past 10 years; and if he will estimate the likely yield for 1985-86;

(2) if he will consider raising the threshold to £10,000 for the taxation of company cars; and if he will estimate the ensuing change in annual revenue.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985]: Estimates of the yield accruing each year since 1977-78 (when the scale charges were introduced as the basis of taxation) from taxing the benefit of company cars available for private use are shown as follows. I regret that information for earlier years is not readily available.

	£ million
1977-78	60
1978-79	65
1979-80	70
1980-81	85
1981-82	115
1982-83	*140
1983-84	*†275
1984-85	†‡330
1985-86	†‡385

* Revised
† Includes yield from taxation of car fuel benefit
‡ Provisional

I have noted my hon. Friend's suggestion for an increase to £10,000 in the earnings threshold, below which this benefit is not taxed on employees. Such an increase, applied to car and car fuel benefit would cost about £40 million in a full year at 1985-86 levels.

Revaluation

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer on how many occasions during the last 20 years a revaluation has taken place; and on how many occasions the results of a revaluation have been implemented.

Mr. Peter Rees [pursuant to his reply, 25 March 1985, c. 101.]: All general revaluations (both domestic and non-domestic in the United Kingdom in the last 20 years have been implemented from their respective operative dates, which have been:

In England and Wales—1 April 1973.
In Northern Ireland—1 April 1976.
In Scotland—Whitsunday 1966, Whitsunday 1971, 1 April 1978.

Youth Training

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what basis he has concluded that the difference between net costs and gross costs in the introduction of the second year of youth training is £60 million in 1986-87 and £150 million in 1987-88.

Mr. Peter Rees [pursuant to his reply, 25 March 1985, c. 101.]: The Budget Statement explained that the additional expenditure on the youth training scheme will be partly offset by savings in social security payments and by the ending of the young workers scheme. The difference between net and gross costs for 1986-87 implicit in the statement was £80 million.

Tax Exemption

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people in Scotland will now be exempt from tax as a result of his Budget Statement.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 25 March 1985, c. 100]: Of the 800,000 people who would have paid tax in 1985-86 if personal allowances had not been raised in the Budget about 75,000 live in Scotland.

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Fatchett asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list regional gross domestic product per head, expressed as a percentage of the United Kingdom average for each year since 1978.

Mr. Peter Rees [pursuant to his reply, 29 March 1985]: Estimates were published, for each year from 1974 to 1983, in table 1 (page 89) of the appendix to the article "Regional Accounts 1983" in the November 1984 issue of Economic Trends (No. 373).

Inland Revenue Staff (Vacancies)

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many vacancies exist in the Inland Revenue by region and by grade at present and for each month over the past two years.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985]: There are nearly 1,200 Inland Revenue offices throughout the United Kingdom. Vacancies occur in these offices for a variety of reasons as people retire, resign, are promoted or are transferred. Most of these vacancies are filled on a local or regional basis and so detailed information about individual vacancies is not collated centrally and could not be obtained without incurring disproportionate cost. Staff in post as at 1 March 1985 totalled 69,589 out of an overall complement of 69,724.

Development Land Tax Office, Middlesbrough

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the grades of the 80 staff in the Middlesbrough development land tax office whose jobs will be lost as a result of the tax being abolished.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985]: The grades of staff at present in the development land tax office at Middlesbrough are as follows:

Senior principal, principal, senior executive officer, higher executive officer, executive officer, clerical officer, clerical assistant, personal secretary, senior superintendent, typist, telephonist.

Valuation Offices (Development Land Tax)

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer at which valuation offices fewer staff will be needed as a result of the abolition of development land tax; and by how many at each.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985]: The abolition of development land tax will reduce the work load nationally in the valuation office network by the equivalent of 120 units of work. But DLT forms only a small part of the work load of the valuation office. The ultimate effect of the abolition on individual valuation offices will depend on any other increases and reductions within the total work load of the valuation office.

Civil Service (Development Land Tax)

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give an undertaking that there will be no Civil Service redundancies arising from the abolition of development land tax.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985]: Every effort will be made to avoid compulsory redundancies. The intention is to offer the staff in the DLT office vacancies in other Government offices. Vacancies for the clerical staff will be sought in offices within daily travelling distance. Posts for the more senior staff may only be available in other parts of the country.

DEFENCE

Falkland Islands

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the expected frequency of civil commercial flights excluding those chartered by his Department to the Falklands; and how many have been approved.

Mr. Renton: I have been asked to reply.

I understand that there are no current applications to operate such flights to the Falklands. I would also refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on 30 January at column 202.

Castor Programme

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he anticipates making an announcement about the Castor programme.

Mr. Butler: My predecessor said in his reply to the hon. Member on 22 May 1984 at column 430 that a decision on Castor would be announced during 1985. That remains the position.

Mooring Buoys, Loch Linnhe

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the function of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation mooring buoys in Loch Linnhe, near Ballachulish.

Mr. Stanley: There are no NATO mooring buoys in Loch Linnhe. The five buoys located there, which the Royal Maritime Auxiliary Service maintains, are owned by the Department of Transport.

Territorial Army

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of Territorial Army units in Scotland is assigned to (a) a home defence rôle, (b) reinforcement of the British Army of the Rhine and (c) other North Atlantic Treaty Organisation reinforcement forces; and if he will provide a list of the units in each category.

Mr. Lee: It is not our practice to give details of plans for wartime operational deployments.

Royal Observer Corps Communications Centre, Connel

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the replacement of cable communications by satellites will lead to the closure of the Royal Observer Corps communications centre at Connel, or of any similar installations in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lee: No.

Mr. Peter Levene

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he was aware of the dispute between his Department and United Scientific Instruments regarding the purchase of cannon pods for Phantom fighter aircraft when he appointed Mr. Peter Levene as his personal adviser.

Mr. Butler: No.

United Scientific Instruments

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of the purchase price in respect of the purchase by his Department of cannon pods for Phantom fighter aircraft has now been paid to United Scientific Instruments.

Mr. Butler: About 95 per cent.

Trident

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many indirect jobs he expects the Trident procurement programme to provide throughout the whole of the programme in the United Kingdom;

(2) how many direct jobs he expects the Trident procurement programme to provide throughout the whole of the programme in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Butler: The British Trident programme is expected to create, on average, approximately 9,000 job opportunities directly and 7,000 indirectly throughout the period of procurement. The number of job opportunities will run at about 17,000 direct and 13,000 indirect during the peak years.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the reply of 26 March, Official Report, column 202, to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), (1) where he envisages that the extra 17,000 jobs that he expects from the Trident programme during its peak years will be created; and in which constituencies and firms;

(2) where he envisages that the extra 13,000 indirect jobs that he expects from the Trident programme during its peak years will be created; and in which constituencies and firms.

Mr. Butler: Estimates of the British job opportunities which Trident might generate are derived from generalised statistical data. It is not possible to break these estimates down in terms of geographical area, firms or constituencies.

Private Companies (Contracts and Tenders)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make public the contract terms and tenders by which sales and work done for his Department by private companies are awarded.

Mr. Butler: The principal contract conditions used in Government contracts for the supply of equipment or services, and specified in the invitation to tender, are drawn from "GC Stores/1 — Standard Conditions of Government Contracts for Stores Purchases" (published by HMSO) and are supplemented by additional conditions appropriate to the particular purchase.

Lightning Aircraft Sales

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what help has been given by his Department to British Aerospace for the sale of Lightning aircraft to Austria; and whether the contract has been awarded to British Aerospace.

Mr. Butler: The Ministry of Defence has given British Aerospace all the assistance normally provided to British companies in their efforts to sell equipment overseas. In addition, considerable help has been given to the Company by the British Embassy in Vienna.

I understand that the contract has not yet been awarded but that the Austrian National Defence Council has recommended the purchase of Draken aircraft from Sweden. I further understand that this decision has yet to be ratified by the Austrian Cabinet.

RAF Basic Trainer

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make public the negotiation, tenders and contracts for the various interested parties leading to the awarding to Shorts, Belfast of the contract for the Jet Provost replacement.

Mr. Butler: No. It is not the practice to release such information, which is commercially confidential.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the final price offered by British Aerospace for the Jet Provost replacement trainer was less than that offered by Shorts, Belfast.

Mr. Butler: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) at column 1001 following my right hon. Friend's statement on 21 March.

Major Christopher Scott

Mrs Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether Major Christopher Scott is employed by his Department or is receiving payments other than the normal pension.

Mr. Lee: There is only one Major C Scott, who is on the officer's retired list and who is in receipt of the normal retired pay appropriate to his rank and length of service. He is not employed by the Ministry of Defence and is not in receipt of any other emoluments from the Ministry of Defence.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the expected frequency of flights to the Falklands chartered by his Department from British Airways and other airlines.

Mr. Stanley: As I said to the hon. Member in my written answer on 26 March at columns 187-8 we currently expect two or three flights a week to Mount Pleasant airport. The extent to which these flights will be made by RAF or by chartered aircraft has still to be determined. In addition we currently expect some two flights a week to Port Stanley airport by RAF Hercules.

Armed Services (Pay)

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the starting level of pay for a graduate entering each of the armed services.

Mr. Lee: The starting pay for graduates entering the armed forces as officers can range from £6,986 to £20,174 per annum. The actual rate which is paid will depend on the officer's specialisation and whether or not he has any relevant postgraduate experience to offer in addition to his degree qualifications. Most graduates enter in the rank of second lieutenant or equivalent, depending on the Service. These ranks attract the minimum rate of pay. At the other extreme, experienced doctors and dentists can receive the maximum figure on entry as a major or equivalent. It is not practical to list the various permutations between these extremes.

The same criteria apply in general to female graduates but their rates of pay are slightly lower since they receive X-factor of 7½ per cent. compared with 10 per cent. for males.

WALES

Community Nursing Services

Mr. Hubbard-Miles asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he is satisfied with the existing provision of community nursing services in Wales; and whether he has any plans to consider their future role and development.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The community nursing profession (which include midwives, health visitors, community psychiatric, district and school nurses) help to provide a wide range of services in health care outside hospitals in Wales. The dedication and competence of nurses working in the community is of a very high order and I believe that the overall standards of the services they provide are properly well regarded.

In recognition of their contribution to health care it is important that from time to time attention should be given to the future development of existing community nursing services and to their roles and functions. It is some years since community nursing provision was considered in a substantial way and in the interim there have been a number of developments affecting service delivery and practice. I have therefore decided to establish a review of community nursing services in Wales. Its terms of reference will be to:

(a) examine changes in the pattern of demand for community nursing services;
(b) identify the future functions of the community nursing services;
(c) suggest priorities for future developments in order to meet service needs;
(d) offer recommendations on the future professional role and the relationships of community nurses;
(e) outline the implications of such developments, especially with regard to education and training.

The review will be an independent one: the accent will be upon providing those working in and responsible for managing community nursing services with the guidance they need to ensure that skills and manpower are deployed to secure the best forms of care from the resources made available. I shall ask that its work will be completed within a two-year period. It will need to work in the closest co-operation with all those professional and other groups that have an interest in sustaining and developing effective service delivery in community nursing. Mrs. Noreen Edwards, the chairman of Gwynedd health authority, has accepted my invitation to chair the review, which will number about eight to 10 people. I shall announce a full list of members for the review team once arrangements for appointments, including consultation with interested bodies, have been completed.

Pneumoconiosis Research Unit (Closure)

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales what measures he proposes to take to safeguard the health services provided by the Medical Research Council's pneumoconiosis research unit following its closure later in the current year.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Our officials have recently completed negotiations with the South Glamorgan health authority and I am pleased to announce that my right hon. Friend has agreed to provide funds to ensure the continued operation of all impatient and outpatient health services following the unit's closure on the Llandough hospital site.

ENVIRONMENT

Owner-Occupation

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to introduce further measures aimed at increasing owner-occupation; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: We will continue with our successful policies to enable as many people as possible to own their own homes. Since 1979, the number of owner-occupiers in Great Britain has increased by more than 1½ million. Local authorities, new towns and housing associations have sold 800,000 dwellings, including nearly 750,000 to sitting tenants. The right-to-buy provisions of the 1980 Housing Act were extended by the 1984 Housing and Building Control Act and we are keeping the working of the Acts under review. On taxation, the increases we have made in the amount eligible for mortgage interest tax relief and the stamp duty limits mean that the majority of first-time buyers continue to obtain tax relief on the full amount of the mortgage and now pay no stamp duty on the purchase of their first home. We have published for consultation proposals to strengthen building societies' powers. We are considering the proposals of the Farrand committee on conveyancing and other ways of making home purchase easier and cheaper; the Administration of Justice Bill will end the solicitors' conveyancing monopoly by providing for licensed conveyancers to provide these services, so increasing competition without loss of protection for consumers.

Housing (Bradford)

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the percentage increase in house improvements in Bradford for 1984 or the latest year for which figures are available.

Sir George Young: The total of grant-aided renovations of housing associations' and private owners' dwellings in the first nine months, was 22 per cent. lower in 1984 than in 1983. The authority has not yet made any return of renovations of its own housing during 1984.

Planning Approvals

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is considering implementing a statutory timetable for dealing with planning approvals and in particular those appeals dealt with by written representations.

Mr. Macfarlane: I have no proposals at present for introducing a statutory timetable for dealing with planning appeals, but I am concerned to improve processing times by administrative action.

Enforcement Notice Appeals

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has reviewed the effect on appeals of his power to impose a timetable in respect of enforcement notice appeals.

Mr. Macfarlane: My right hon. Friend is satisfied, from the experience gained since January 1982 of exercising his discretionary powers in section 88(6) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, that both parties to enforcement notice appeals now co-operate more readily in the appeals process because they recognise that failure to do so may result in dismissal of an appeal or quashing of an enforcement notice. My right hon. Friend's discretionary powers have only been used on 26 occasions in processing more than 12,000 enforcement appeals since January 1982, which appears to confirm the value of these powers as an effective sanction in the special circumstances of enforcement appeals.

Housing Improvement

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment on what date he intends to publish the 1983 distribution of grant inquiry.

Sir George Young: We hope to publish a summary of the conclusions of the 1983 distribution of grant inquiry as part of the forthcoming consultation document on private sector housing improvement policy. The full DGI results will be published in due course.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will indicate, for each of the years 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, the percentage distribution of renovation grants awarded in England by socio-economic group as used for census purposes.

Sir George Young: The only available information about the socio-economic group of recipients was collected as part of the distribution of grant inquiry. The results of this sample survey will be published in due course.

Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the report, prepared for his Department by the School for Advanced Urban Studies, on agency services for housing improvement and repair.

Mr. Gow: The report "Review of Home Improvement Agencies" is being published today by the Department of the Environment. Copies are being placed in the Library. The report is the result of a research project carried out for the Department by Bristol university's school for advanced urban studies. We are considering the report's conclusions as part of the review of housing improvement policy which is at present under way.

Unsatisfactory Housing

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of each socio-economic group was living in unsatisfactory housing in each of the years 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, and 1984.

Sir George Young: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Youth Training (Lambeth)

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will disregard for rate penalty purposes expenditure undertaken by Lambeth borough council providing support and materials for mode B youth training schemes in Lambeth.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him on 15 March, at column 306.

Departmental Legislation

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many Acts of Parliament have been promoted and how many statutory instruments made by his Department, or predecessor Departments covering his areas of responsibility, in each of the last 20 years.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Her Majesty Stationery Office publishes annually "Lists of Statutory Instruments" and "Tables and Indices to Public and General Acts and General Synod Measures". Both of these are currently up to date to the end of 1983.

Given the changes to the machinery of Government over the last 20 years, apportionment of the Acts of Statutory Instruments to the areas of present ministerial responsibility, if practicable, could be done only at disproportionate cost.

Football Hooliganism

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received concerning football hooliganism and how it should be controlled; and if he will list them.

Mr. Macfarlane: Since the publication last August of my Department's consultation document — "Football Spectator Violence: Report of an Official Working Group" —I have met 17 representative organisations to discuss measures for dealing with the problem; of these the following organisations have also submitted written comments:

The Football Association
The Football League
The Football Trust
The Football Grounds Improvement Trust
The Magistrates' Association
The Association of Chief Police Officers
The Superintendents' Association
The Police Federation
The Association of County Councils
The Association of Metropolitan Authorities
The Association of District Councils
The Scottish Football Association
The Scottish Football League
The Professional Footballers' Association
The Football League Executive Staffs' Association

I have also received a large number of letters from other organisations and individuals, many of these having written following the recent serious incidents of violence.

Derelict Land Grant

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much has been spent by his Department on derelict land grant in each of the last five years; and if he will break this down by region.

Mr. Macfarlane: Details of expenditure on derelict land reclamation in the five years 1979-80 to 1983-84 the last year for which information is available, are as follows:

Local Authority Sector

Note: Figures show outturn expenditure

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many acres of land have been restored to constructive use in each of the last five years through derelict land grant; if he will specify the use in each case; and if he can estimate (a) the annual rate increase created thereby and (b) the number of jobs resulting from the restoration.

Mr. Macfarlane: In these years approval was given for the reclamation and recycling of over 20,000 acres of derelict land, for a wide number of uses, as follows:

Acres

End use	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84
Public open space	2,430	2,364	2,006	1,885	1,699
Agriculture	902	496	1,067	548	447
Residential	52	35	32	227	267
Industry and commerce	136	329	185	879	2,203
Mixed or other development	165	101	158	919	684
Totals	3,685	3,325	3,448	4,458	5,300

Information about the annual rate increases and employment created by this programme is not available, but the Government have increasingly given priority to those projects that will lead to the regeneration of derelict land for development by the private sector, particularly in urban areas.

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much private investment has been generated in each of the last five years as a result of the use of derelict land grant.

Mr. Macfarlane: Information is available only for category A schemes. Since its introduction in 1982-83, projects totalling some £68 million have been approved, with associated early private investment of over £480 million, a ratio of 1:7. Details are as follows:

£ million

	Approved costs	Private sector investment
1982-83	9	32
1983-84	26	200
1984-85	18	138
1985-86	15	110
Total	68	480

In addition, category B and non-local authority projects are increasingly leading to private sector development on the reclaimed land.

Property Services Agency

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many Property Services Agency staff are employed at United States military facilities in the United Kingdom.

Sir George Young: At 1 March 1985, 638 PSA non-industrial staff and 898 PSA industrial staff were employed on work for the United States forces. Of those, 401 non-industrial staff and all the industrial staff worked at United States military facilities.

Scotland v. England Football Match

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if the Minister with responsibility for sport will publish his correspondence with the English Football Association over the transfer of the forthcoming Scotland v. England football match from London to Glasgow.

Mr. Macfarlane: I first wrote to the Football Association on 10 January expressing the concern of the Government and the transport authorities about the timing of the England v. Scotland football match on bank holiday Saturday 25 May. I asked whether it would be feasible to change the date of the match.

I wrote again on 22 March. My letter also dealt with other matters. The relevant paragraph read:

"I must also make a further formal request to you to change the date of the England v. Scotland match currently scheduled for Bank Holiday Saturday 25 May. The Government is extremely concerned that the current timing of this fixture increases the risk of disorder and this is something which the Prime Minister is also likely to raise with you."

Departmental Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the total cost of ministerial hospitality in his Department in the years 1983-84 and 1984-85 to date.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985, c. 332]: The total cost of Environment Ministers hospitality during 1983-84 was £5,756 and in 1984-85 £11,758. Expenditure for 1983-84 was abnormally low because of a long interruption of ministerial programmes of engagements caused by the general election, and expenditure for 1984-85 was increased by expenditure incurred in hosting the meeting of the Environment Ministers of the summit countries.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which grades of civil servants in his Department are allowed to have official supplies of alcohol in their offices; how much has been spent by his Department in each year since 1979-1980 on such items.

Mr. Macfarlane [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985, c. 332]: The figures given for expenditure on drinks cabinets of DOE officials were inaccurate in two respects. These should have read £160 for 1982-83 and £297 for 1983-84.

Ancient Monuments

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the Central Electricity Generating Board has been involved in, or conducted any research into the effects of SO_2 and NO_x emissions on ancient monuments other than that mentioned in his reply to the hon. Member, 19 March, Official Report, column 422.

Mr. Goodlad: I have been asked to reply.

I am advised that, prior to the formation of CEGB, questions on the effect on St. Paul's cathedral of chimney emissions of SO_2 and NO_x were raised when Bankside power station in Southwark was proposed in the mid-1940s. Partly as a result of this concern, Bankside was equipped with a flue gas desulphurisation system. In the early 1970s the cathedral authorities were still concerned about possible effects from Bankside power station and CEGB co-operated in a study which showed that the station was not the major source of pollution at the cathedral. A similar study took place in Peterborough in 1960 where the CEGB, in co-operation with the cathedral authorities, made a study which showed that sources other than the power station—including the cathedral's own heating system—were the mot significant contributors to the pollution.

As part of a long continuing study of the effects of air pollution on current materials of structural importance (including metals, concrete and paint systems) the CEGB included specimens of stone of the type widely used in ancient monuments in a two-year exposure programme that is now nearing completion. This aspect of the study was carried out in consultation with the Building Research Establishment and the Department of Environment. Further studies on stone are under consideration.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Famine Relief

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a further progress report upon famine relief in Ethiopia and the Sudan with special reference to the British and European Economic Community contributions, respectively.

Mr. Raison: In Ethiopia and the Sudan millions of people are still at risk. Food and other relief supplies are getting through but distribution and other problems remain. The lates FAO calculations are that in each case pledges of food aid to Ethiopia and the Sudan for 1985 total more than 1 million tonnes, but about 300,000 tonnes for each is still needed. The European Community and its member states are committed to deliver at least 170,000 tonnes of grain to each country during 1985, In addition, the Community is providing cash grants amounting to about £25 million for Ethiopia and £11·6 million for Sudan, mainly for food purchases. This year Britain is providing 10,000 tonnes of wheat to Ethiopia and 50,000 tonnes to Sudan as part of our national contribution to the Community total.

PRIME MINISTER

Cable Systems (Report)

Q60. Mr. Gale asked the Prime Minister if she has now had the opportunity to study the report on the reassessment of cable systems, prepared by the Information Technology Advisory Panel; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I received the Information Technology Advisory Panel's report "Cable Systems: A Re-assessment" last month.

I am considering the report with colleagues and will report as soon as possible.

National Health Service (Accounts)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Prime Minister what action she intends to take to ensure that losses, theft and fraud in the National Health Service are duly recorded and properly accounted for in the National Health Service accounts for 1984-85.

The Prime Minister: I am aware of my hon. Friend's interest in this matter, and I entirely agree that there should be a full and proper account for the use of public money and property. I understand that changes have been introduced, with effect from 1 April 1984 in the form of the NHS accounts with the intention of ensuring that all identified losses, including discrepancies and unexplained issues of equipment and property, are recorded in the accounts.

Pay (Teachers and Policemen)

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Prime Minister if she will publish in the Official Report the average pay of (a) a teacher, and (b) a policeman, at the age of 25 years in January 1980 and in January 1985.

The Prime Minister: It is estimated that the average earnings (including allowances) of full-time teachers aged 25 in maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools in England and Wales were about £4,500 in January 1980 and £7,250 in January 1985. Information on average earnings by age is not available for police officers, but a constable with five years' service would have been on a basic salary of £5,334 in January 1980 and £9,234 in January 1985.

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Prime Minister what, in real terms have been the average pay increases of (a) policemen and (b) teachers, since May 1979.

The Prime Minister: The cumulative increase arising from annual pay settlements between May 1979 and April 1984 amounted to 69·9 per cent. for school teachers and 86·4 per cent. for police officers. Over the period April 1979 to April 1984 average gross earnings, as measured by the New Earnings Survey, have risen by 84 per cent. for teachers and for 105 per cent. for policemen. Between May 1979 and April 1984 the retail prices index rose by 62 per cent. and the tax and price index by 60·2 per cent. since April 1984 police officers have had a settlement of 5·1 per cent. from September 1984. Teachers have been offered an increase of 4 per cent. from 1 April 1985.

Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Prime Minister if she will list the Departments which have been represented at meetings of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council or its committees since November 1981; and if she will list the dates and locations of such meetings and the sections of the relevant Departments from which those officials came.

The Prime Minister: Cmnd. 9094 and my reply to the hon. Member's question on 1 April, at columns 413-4, give information on ministerial meetings held within the framework of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council. The Departments most involved in the many meetings that have taken place at official level under the auspices of the Council have been the Cabinet Office, the Northern Ireland Office, and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Nuclear Testing

Mr. Hoyle asked the Prime Minister if, in the light of the evidence arising from the Australian Royal Commission into nuclear tests, she will seek to institute a Royal Commission fully to investigate all aspects, other than weapon design, of the events relating to and including the series of tests carried out between 3 October 1952 and 23 September 1958.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing to add to the statements made by my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement in reply to a question from the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on 22 November 1984, at column 225, and in the debate on 19 December 1984, at column 397.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will explain the nature of the triggering device to which she referred in her answer of 19 March, Official Report, columns 779-80, and of any contamination it was expected to produce.

The Prime Minister: I would like to stress once again that these matters were considered and the Wick site rejected over 30 years ago.

The device to which I referred in my answer of 19 March, at columns 779-80, is known as an initiator.

Its purpose was to produce neutrons to initiate the chain reaction which generates a nuclear explosion. Since only the initiator was being tested and it contained no fissile material there could never have been a nuclear explosion. The only source of contamination from the initiator was beryllium and radioactive polonium. The experiment was designed so as to avoid any environmental hazard, but was not proceeded with in the UK because the site was judged to be unsuitable and because conditions in Australia offered a greater certainty of achieving this.

Scotland-England Football Match

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on her discussions with the English Football Association over the transfer of the forthcoming Scotland-England football match from London to Glasgow.

The Prime Minister: There have been no such discussions. My hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for Sport, wrote to the Football Association asking it to reconsider the timing of the match.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Prime Minister what arrangements will be made for compensating football supporters for the hotel and travel deposits and costs already incurred prior to the transfer at the request of Her Majesty's Government of the forthcoming Scotland-England football match from London to Glasgow.

The Prime Minister: None.

Engagements

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 2 April.

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 2 April.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to attend a dinner given by Her Majesty the Queen.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Badgers

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether, pending the conclusions of Professor Dunnet's review team, the official slaughter of badgers has ceased.

Mrs. Fenner: No. Any reconsideration of my Department's policy for dealing with badgers infected with bovine tuberculosis in areas where they constitute a threat to cattle must await the conclusions of Professor Dunnet's review team.

Dogs

Mr. Maclean asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any proposals to seek powers to prevent the entry of dogs into the United Kingdom on grounds of cruelty in addition to disease.

Mrs. Fenner: No.

Mr. Maclean asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list his powers to control the import of Sharpeis dogs which suffer from inherited defects.

Mrs. Fenner: We have no power to prevent the import of dogs other than for the purpose of controlling the spread of animal disease.

Sheepmeat

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food further to his answer of 15 March, Official Report, column 318-19, concerning the prices and consumption of sheepmeat, whether he will give figures for the price paid to farmers on a dressed carcase of other meat weight basis together with corresponding figures for 1970.

Mr. MacGregor: The prices paid to farmers on a dressed carcase basis were given in answer to the question on 15 March. The corresponding figure for 1970 was £373 per tonne in the United Kingdom.

Live Animals (Export)

Mr. Hunter asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is Her Majesty's Government's interpretation of a reasonable time with regard to 4*(d)* of directive 77/489/EEC relating to the export of live animals.

Mrs. Fenner: Part 4*(d)* of the Annex to Directive 77/489/EEC reads as follows:—

"During transport animals shall be offered water and appropriate food at suitable intervals. Animals shall not be left more than 24 hours without being fed and watered. This period may, however, be extended if the journey to the destination where the animals are unloaded can be completed within a reasonable period."

The requirement reflects international veterinary opinion. It is intended to ensure that animals are not caused suffering either by unduly lengthy deprivation of food and water or by the disruption of being unloaded in circumstances where it would be better for their welfare if they were taken straight on to their destination.

Our implementing legislation requires all food animals to be offered appropriate food and water during their statutory pre-export rest period in approved premises near the port of export. After export it is for those authorities in the member states of transit or destination, and ultimately for the courts in the countries, to determine whether the directive's feeding and watering requirements have been met in a given case. They will need to consider the needs of the species concerned, the climatic conditions and the transport conditions of the consignment concerned.

Mr. Hunter asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has studied the complaint submitted to the European Commission by the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals about the workings of current regulations controlling the export of live animals; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) on 21 March 1985 at column 572.

Uneconomic Farms

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans the Government have to bring forward proposals to facilitate the closing down of uneconomic farms.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many additional teachers would be required in maintained schools in England and Wales to ensure that no classes have more than 30 pupils.

Mr. Dunn: In January 1984 average class sizes in England were 25·0 pupils for primary schools and 20·9 pupils for secondary schools; at the same time 20 per cent. of primary classes and 8 per cent. of secondary classes contained more than 30 pupils. Corresponding figures for Wales are not available. It is not possible to estimate with any confidence how many additional teachers would be required to eliminate classes with more than 30 pupils as this would depend crucially on the extent to which local education authorities and headteachers gave priority to reductions in class sizes over other calls on the time of teachers. Whilst my right hon. Friend recognises that there are still some classes which are too large to permit adequate attention to the needs of individuals, he believes that in general the fall in class sizes has reached a point where more non-contact time for teachers who currently have little, and more flexible teaching arrangements, should have priority over further decreases in the size of regular teaching groups.

School Books and Equipment (Expenditure)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the trend since 1979 in expenditure in real terms on books and equipment per pupil in maintained schools.

Mr. Dunn: The trend in real terms in the average expenditure per pupil in maintained primary and secondary schools on books and equipment is as follows:

	£	Index
1979-80	28·9	*100
1980-81	27·3	94
1981-82	27·8	96
1982-83	29·9	103
1983-84	31·0	107

* 100=the base.

The expenditure in real terms has been calculated using the deflator for gross domestic product at market prices.

Departmental Legislation

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many Acts of Parliament have been promoted and how many statutory instruments made by his Department, or predecessor Departments covering his areas of responsibility, in each of the last 20 years.

Sir Keith Joseph: The information requested is given in the table.

Number of:

Year	(i) Acts of Parliament	(ii) Statutory Instruments
1965	2	21
1966	—	19
1967	1	13
1968	2	21
1969	—	23
1970	2	25
1971	1	26
1972	2	20
1973	2	26
1974	1	30
1975	1	43
1976	3	23
1977	—	25
1978	1	27
1979	2	22
1980	1	31
1981	1	35
1982	—	30
1983	2	31
1984	1	26

Skilled Graduates

Mr. Alexander asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is satisfied with the communication links between British universities and industry in order to ensure that the universities provide enough graduates with the skills required by industry.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Government have encouraged and has provided support for the establishment of closer links between industry and all levels of education. However, there remains scope for both sides to make such links a more effective channel for information on industry's manpower requirements.

In recent years the Government has taken a number of initiatives to increase graduate places in shortage areas.

Speech and Language Problems

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many children are attending special classes, units or schools because of speech and language problems; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The statutory categorisation of pupils according to their major handicaps ceased with the implementation of the Education Act 1981. It is not therefore possible to answer the question in this form.

Teachers (Superannuation Fund)

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government regarding the investment of the capital sum of the teachers' superannuation fund;

(2) what is the annual rate of return and the cash surplus on the teachers' superannuation fund for each of the last three years for which figures are available; and what steps are taken to optimise the investment;

(3) who is responsible for the investment policy of the teachers' superannuation fund; if he will list them; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what use is made of surpluses arising on the teachers' superannuation fund; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: There is no teachers superannuation fund and consequently no capital sum is invested. Under the Superannuation Act 1972 teachers' and employers' superannuation contributions are paid into the Consolidated Fund and benefits are paid out of moneys voted by Parliament. An account is maintained of receipts and payments under the Teachers Superannuation Regulations 1976 (as amended) or under previous provisions. Under the regulations the balance in the account and any excess of receipts over payments in any accounting period are deemed to have been invested in Government securities and interest added accordingly to the account. These notional investments are selected by my right hon. Friend after consultation with the Government Actuary.

I have arranged for copies of the three most recently available teachers superannuation accounts to be placed in the Library.

Pupil-Teacher Ratio

Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many teachers local education authorities in England employed in January; and what is his estimate of the pupil to teacher ratio.

Sir Keith Joseph: In January 1985 local education authorities in England employed the full-time equivalent of 405,300 teachers for service in nursery, primary and secondary schools. On the basis of estimated pupil numbers I would expect the overall ratio of pupils to teachers to lie between 17·7:1 and 17·8:1; this represents a continuation of the improvements achieved in recent years.

EMPLOYMENT

Young Persons (Holloway)

12. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the numbers of 16 to 24-year-olds in the Holloway employment area who have been unemployed for more than one year.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 10 January 1985, the number of claimants in the Holloway jobcentre area under 25 years of age who had been unemployed for over one year was 1,241.

Health and Safety Commission (Plan of Work)

13. Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received from the trade unions regarding the proposals contained in the Health and Safety Commission plan of work for 1985-86.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: None.

35. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to meet the chairman of the Health and Safety Commission to discuss the commission's plan of work 1985-86 and onwards.

45. Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he next expects to meet the chairman of the Health and Safety Commission to discuss its plan of work for the next two years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend has approved the plan of work as a broad statement of the Health and Safety Commission's intentions for 1985-86. We meet the chairman from time to time to discuss many aspects of the commission's current and future work.

38. Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has received the Health and Safety Commission's plan of work 1985-86 and onwards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend has approved the commission's plan of work as a broad statement of the Commission's intentions for 1985-86. I am aware of the ideas put forward by the commission in the plan for the development of the Health and Safety Executive's work beyond that period. I hope that these will stimulate debate.

Skillcentres

14. Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Employment what further representations he has received on the proposed closure of skillcentres.

36. Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Employment what recent representations he has received on the proposed closure of skillcentres.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend and I have received around 260 letters on the subject since the proposals for the reorganisation of the skillcentre network were announced on 28 November. We have also met eight delegations.

65. Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what consultations he has had with the Manpower Services Commission since January on the future of skillcentres.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Following careful consideration of the Commission's views which were detailed in the chairman's letter of 24 January, my right hon. Friend wrote to the chairman on 21 February asking the Commission to implement the skillcentre training agency's operating plans for 1985-86 and 1986-87. At its meeting on 28 February the Commission noted my right hon. Friend's request that no skillcentre closure should take place until alternative provision had been identified, and the chairman wrote again on 7 March to explain how this request would be met.

Factory Inspectors

15. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received about the number of factory inspectors in post.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) earlier today.

58. Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many factory inspectors are currently in post; and how many were in post in May 1979.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: At 1 March 1985 there were 823 factory inspectors in post. The figure for 1 May was 953.

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the number of factory inspectors in post in the west midlands area of the Health and Safety Executive and those in training in each of the last five years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The numbers are as follows:

Numbers of inspectors in post

	General factory inspectors	Specialist inspectors	Total
March 1981	44(7)	19(0)	63(7)
March 1982	39(3)	20(0)	59(3)
March 1983	38(0)	17(0)	55(0)
March 1984	35(0)	16(0)	51(0)
March 1985	32(2)	16(0)	48(2)

Specialist inspectors of the Midlands Field Consultative Group are based in the west midlands area but also operate in the east midlands, the marches and the north midlands areas.

The numbers in training are given in brackets.

GCHQ

16. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will refer the latest industrial problems at the Hawklaw and Cheltenham Government communications headquarters to the International Labour Organisation.

Mr. Tom King: I know of no such industrial problems at GCHQ or Hawklaw.

Wages Councils

17. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will now make a statement on the future of wages councils.

24. Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he expects to make a statement on the future of wages councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend published a consultative paper on wages councils on 21 March. This invites comments by 31 May. Decisions will be taken when responses to the document have been considered.

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will assess the likely impact of the abolition of wages councils on the levels of unemployment.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: As we make clear in the consultative paper on wages councils published on 21 March, concern about the effect of the councils on jobs is the most important single factor in our consideration of their future. As part of this consideration we are studying all available research on this subject. The major relevant studies are listed in my reply to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) on 21 February 1985, at column 516.

Budget (Job Creation)

18. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Employment what effect he expects the Budget to have on the total number of unemployed.

21. Mr. Prescott asked the Secretary of State for Employment what effect the Budget measures will have on the levels of unemployment in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King: The Budget contains a wide-ranging set of measures to help generate employment and tackle unemployment. These include the expansion of the youth training scheme and the community programme, as well as substantial reform of the structure of national insurance contributions and raising the tax thresholds. These will help create the conditions for substantial numbers of new jobs without risking higher inflation. By 1986-87 our employment and training measures together will be providing help for 1 million people.

Labour Statistics

19. Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current number of people unemployed.

Mr. Alan Clark: On the 14 February 1985, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,324,000.

22. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current number of people under 25 years of age unemployed; and what was the corresponding total for May 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 10 January 1985, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom under 25 years of age was 1,286,000. The corresponding figure for April 1979 relating to registrants at jobcentres and careers offices was 451,000. A figure for May 1979 is not available.

23. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement about the total of unemployment in Suffolk.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government are committed to maintaining their economic policies which are directed at holding down inflation and public borrowing, while encouraging greater enterprise, flexibility and competitiveness in industry and the labour market. This is the only way to generate lasting jobs in Suffolk and elsewhere. In the meantime we are continuing to help the unemployed through our special employment and training measures. For example, the youth training scheme and the community programme, both of which are to be expanded, are currently helping over 3,700 people in Suffolk.

32. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the present numbers of people who have been unemployed for more than one year; and what was the comparable figure for May 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following table gives the number of claimants in the United Kingdom who have been unemployed for over one year in January 1985, and the figure for registered unemployed in April 1979 (not available for May). It also gives the figures on both bases for October 1982.

The comparison is affected by the change in the basis of the unemployment count in October 1982, and by the 1983 Budget provisions which mean that some men, mainly aged 60 years and over, no longer need to sign on in order to receive supplementary benefit or national insurance credits. The information is also available in the Library.

Unemployed for over one year—United Kingdom

	Numbers
Registered unemployed
April 1979	366,711
October 1982	1,169,558
Unemployed claimants
October 1982	989,306
January 1985	1,316,017

34. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the current numbers of people who have been unemployed for over one year.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 10 January 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by duration is available, a total of 1,316,017 claimants had been unemployed for over one year in the United Kingdom.

39. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the rate of unemployment at the latest available date in the travel-to-work area of which Amble forms part.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 14 February 1985, the rate of unemployment in the Alnwick and Amble travel-to-work area was 18 per cent.

43. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current number of unemployed persons.

44. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the latest figures for unemployment; and if he will make a statement.

57. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the latest number of unemployed people in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 14 February 1985, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,323,676.

61. Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people are currently unemployed over the age of 40, 45 and 50 years, respectively.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 10 January 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by age is available, there were 1,011,536 unemployed claimants aged over 40 years in the United Kingdom. Of these 795,298 were aged over 45 years and 588,378 aged over 50.

67. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number of people unemployed; and what were the corresponding figures for March 1984 and May 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 14 February 1985, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,323,676. The corresponding number in March 1984 was 3,142,775 and in May 1979 was estimated to have been 1,218,900. The comparison is affected by the Budget provisions which mean that some men, mainly aged 60 and over, no longer need sign on in order to receive supplementary benefit or national insurance credits. The estimated effect of these measures, which accumulated between April and August 1983, is 161,800.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the employment rates for each region of the United Kingdom from 1980 to date; and if he will express such figures as a percentage of the national average.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The following tables give the available information.

Table 1 gives, regionally and for the dates specified, the civilian employed labour force (employees in employment plus the self-employed) expressed as a percentage of the civilian working population (civilian employed labour force plus the unemployed). Her Majesty's Forces, which are normally included in both the employed labour force and working population figures, are not analysed regionally.

Table 2 gives each of the regional figures in table 1 as a percentage of the United Kingdom figure.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list, for each of the six categories of employment with the lowest average wages and the six with the highest, as defined in the New Earnings Survey, their average rates of unemployment in each year since 1979 to the latest available date.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I regret that information is not available on unemployment rates for the detailed categories of employment distinguished in the analyses of average earnings in the reports of the "New Earnings Survey".

Youth Training

20. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many small and medium sized companies are currently involved in providing work experience places for the youth training scheme; and what is the percentage of recruitment into full-time employment from such placements.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information is not available in the precise form requested. Some 82,000 establishments with under 25 employees and a further 16,000 establishments with between 25-99 employees participate in the youth training scheme.

Latest results from the regular follow-up survey of leavers show that 68 per cent. of young people who left employer-led schemes last July went into full-time employment, over half with the employer who ran the scheme or provided work-based experience for it.

This compares with a figure of 38 per cent. who left mode B schemes.

27. Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of the 330,000 participants in the youth training scheme he expects to find on-going full-time employment as a result of their participation; and on what evidence he bases his estimate.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission conducts regular monthly surveys of young people who leave the youth training scheme. Questionnaires are sent to a 15 per cent. sample of leavers some three months after they have left the scheme. The most recent results relate to young people who left the scheme in July 1984 and show that over 60 per cent. went into full-time employment and around two thirds went into work or other full-time education or training.

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many and what percentage of school leavers have been on youth training or youth opportunity schemes for each of the last five years for which records are available; whether he will break these figures down into the following areas: (a) west midlands, (b) east midlands, (c) Scotland, (d) Northern Ireland, (e) north, (f) north-west, (g) Yorkshire and Humberside, (h) East Anglia, (i) south-east, (j) Wales and (k) south-west; and of these, how many trainees were (i) offered jobs with sponsors, (ii) found work, (iii) registered for employment and (iv) found places on other schemes on completion of their periods of training.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 26 March 1985, c. 37-38]: Information in the precise form requested is not available. Table 1 shows for Great Britain the number and percentage of 16 to 18-year-olds on the youth opportunities programme-youth training scheme in the January of each year from 1980 to 1984.

Table 2 shows, as far as information is available, the destinations of leavers from the schemes.

Sunderland

25. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have been unemployed for more than 156 weeks in the borough of Sunderland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 10 January 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by duration is available, a total of 5,914 claimants had been unemployed for over 156 weeks in the area covered by the Sunderland, Washington and Houghton-le-Spring jobcentres which closely corresponds to the borough of Sunderland.

Aerospace and Allied Industries

26. Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will make a statement concerning future employment prospects in the aerospace and allied industries.

Mr. Alan Clark: Orders for both civil and military aircraft are increasing and there is long-term potential worldwide for expansion. Employment prospects in the aerospace industry in this country will depend on the ability of our companies to compete in national and international markets, and on further collaboration with companies in other countries such as that between Short Brothers of Belfast and Embraer of Brazil. This partnership has just been awarded the contract for the RAF trainer aircraft—a project which could result in over 1,100 jobs, more than half of them in Northern Ireland.

Job Release Scheme

28. Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the future of the job release scheme.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my reply to the hon. Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Woodall) earlier today.

Craft and Industrial Premises

29. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what steps have been taken to ensure that all craft and industrial premises are registered with the Factory Inspectorate.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In the factory inspectorate's annual work programme 3 per cent. of inspectors' time is used to find unregistered factories. In the year 1985-86 their target is to inspect 20,000 such premises.

In those areas where inspectors anticipate a large turnover of factory occupiers and the setting up of new premises, they undertake local initiatives in order to seek out and to inspect them.

Many first-time employers are ignorant of the legal requirement under the Factories Act to register their premises and the Health and Safety Executive, together with the CBI small firms unit, is preparing a leaflet to give publicity to this duty.

Whenever possible, information about premises is exchanged between the factory inspectorate and local authorities.

Community Programme

30. Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the continuation of the community programme in the Highlands and Islands.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) on 25 March at column 38.

37. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many places the Manpower Services Commission will provide on community programmes during 1985-86.

54. Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the future structure of the community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer the hon. Member and my hon. Friend to my right hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) earlier today.

51. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will make a statement on the current progress of the community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer to my right hon. Friend's remarks about the community programme at column 1024 during the debate on Budget resolutions and the economic situation on 21 March.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment why staff on the community programme are employed on short-term contracts.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Participation on the community programme helps to improve the employment prospects of people who have been unemployed for some time. A maximum period of twelve months is considered the most effective use of available resources although managers, supervisors and key workers may be kept on for longer if suitable unemployed replacement workers are not available.

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he can provide, following the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget statement, figures for the estimated increases in the number of places available under the community programme in the Manpower Services Commission Highland area board region;

(2) what the estimated net effect of the changes announced in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget statement with regard to the community programme will be on the current projected decreases in the number of places available within the Manpower Services Commission Highland area board region.

Mr. Peter Morrison: We are expanding the community programme by 100,000 places to a new national target of 230,000 places. This enables extra provision in all areas, including those which had previously expected reductions by October 1986. My right hon. Friend has asked the Manpower Services Commission for its views as soon as possible on the allocation of available places.

Visual Display Units

31. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Employment what steps his Department is taking to investigate the hazards to people working on unprotected visual display units.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to her on 25 March at column 98.

Job Sharing Scheme

33. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people took advantage of the job sharing scheme in 1984.

Mr. Alan Clark: There were 289 successful applications under the job splitting scheme in 1984, creating 578 part-time jobs.

Businesses (Employee Involvement)

40. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the initiative the Government are taking to encourage employee involvement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Government believe that genuine employee involvement can be introduced in each organisation only on a voluntary basis by management in conjunction with the employees and their representatives. In this way the arrangements made can truly reflect their particular needs and circumstances. There is ample evidence of the growh of such voluntary arrangements. The Government take every opportunity to encourage it further.

Health and Safety Commission (Plan of Work)

41. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received about the Health and Safety Commission's report, "Plan of Work 1985-86 and Onwards."

Mr. Peter Bottomley: None. The report was published on 12 March.

Young Persons (Twickenham)

42. Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of young people in Twickenham are employed.

Mr. Alan Clark: The most recent information available for the Twickenham parliamentary constituency is from the 1981 census of population, as follows:

Age Group	Persons employed as percentage of all residents in the age group
16-19 years	46 per cent.
20-24 years	74 per cent.
16-24 years	61 per cent.

Young Persons (Health and Safety)

46. Mr. Michael Martin asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to remove young people from the protection of existing health and safety and race relations legislation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Government have no plans to remove young people from the protection of existing health and safety and race relations legislation. However, I have asked the Health and Safety Commission to review the value in present day conditions of the notification to the careers service of young people working in factories. I await their advice.

Businesses (Employee Involvement)

47. Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to encourage employers to involve employees in the running of their companies.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Government are firmly committed to the principle of employers informing and consulting employees about matters which affect them. We take every suitable opportunity to encourage the voluntary adoption and development of arrangements appropriate to individual companies' circumstances. The establishment of genuine employee involvement arrangements does not affect management's responsibility for making business and organisational decisions.

Young Persons (St. Helens)

48. Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Employment what he intends to do about the level of youth unemployment in St. Helens.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Our economic policies are designed to provide the conditions under which industry and commerce in St. Helens and elsewhere can create sustainable jobs for young people and others. We are ensuring through our expansion of the youth training scheme and other measures that young people have constructive and worthwhile opportunities to help equip themselves for employment.

European Commission (Job Creation)

49. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the European Commission's proposals to reduce unemployment within the member states through increased spending on infrastructure.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The most promising aspect of the programme of the commission for employment in member states is the commission's intention to take determined action in 1985 on the creation of a genuine internal market.

Job Creation

50. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Employment in what ways local authorities can contribute to his Department's efforts to alleviate unemployment and to create jobs.

Mr. Alan Clark: Local authorities play a significant role in several of this Department's employment and training measures and their contribution to the success of these schemes is appreciated. More generally, by judicious use of their powers local authorities can help to encourage economic activity appropriate to their areas, and thus help to generate employment opportunities.

Unemployment Level

52. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the current level of unemployment.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 14 February 1985, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,324,000 which represents an unemployment rate of 13·7 per cent.

Unemployed Over 50s

53. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide the latest available total of those over the age of 50 years who are registered as unemployed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 10 January 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by age is available, the number of unemployed claimants over the age of 50 years in the United Kingdom was 588,378.

Trades Union Congress

55. Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he plans to meet the general secretary of the Trades Union Congress to discuss the effects of the Budget statement of 19 March on job opportunities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend is always ready to meet the general secretary of the Trades Union Congress to discuss matters of common interest.

As far as the effect of the Budget statement on job opportunities is concerned, I refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Members for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) and Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) earlier today.

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

56. Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people in the Yorkshire and Humberside region are currently on the enterprise allowance scheme.

Mr. Alan Clark: On the 14 March 1985, 3,717 people were receiving the enterprise allowance in the Yorkshire and Humberside region.

Young Persons (Merseyside)

59. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to combat youth unemployment on Merseyside.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Our economic policies are designed to provide the conditions under which industry and commerce on Merseyside and elsewhere can create sustainable jobs for young people and others. We are ensuring through our expansion of the youth training scheme and other measures that young people have constructive and worthwhile opportunities to help equip themselves for employment.

Youth Training Scheme

60. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has for extending and developing the youth training scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: From April 1986 the youth training scheme is to be extended so that it provides 2 years' training for 16-year-old school leavers and 1 years' training for 17-year-old leavers, and leading to recognised vocational qualifications. This will be a further major step forward in improving young people's employability and job prospects.

Young Persons (Training)

62. Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the Government's policy on the training of the young; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: We aim through training to prepare young people for the world of work, to make them more employable, and to help provide a work force capable of meeting industry's needs.

The key element in this policy, the youth training scheme, has given the chance of a year's broad-based foundation to some 700,000 young people since 1983, and some 60 per cent. of trainees have found a job afterwards. Now we shall build on that achievement, offering from April 1986 two years' training to 16-year-old school leavers and one year to 17-year-old leavers. The extended scheme will provide training in specific occupational skills, with a recognised qualification at the end. It should also prove a significant step in the reform and modernisation of skill training in Britain.

Unemployment (Demographic Factors)

63. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Employment what recent studies his Department has made about the effect of changing demographic factors in the composition of the potential labour force on the level of unemployment.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Department's estimates and projections of the labour force, taking account of changing demographic and other factors, are published from time to time: most recently in Employment Gazette in February and August 1984. The size and composition of the labour force are among the many influences on the level of unemployment: my Department has made no recent study of these specific influences.

Young Persons (Rother Valley)

64. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Employment what he intends to do about the level of youth unemployment in the Rother Valley.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Our economic policies are designed to provide the conditions under which industry and commerce in the Rother Valley and elsewhere can create sustainable jobs for young people and others. We are ensuring through our expansion of the youth training scheme and other measures that young people have constructive and worthwhile opportunities for employment.

Industrial Training

66. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total expenditure on industrial training in 1983-84 and 1984-85; and what proportion of this was accounted for by the public sector.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Comprehensive and detailed information about expenditure on training and vocational education especially by employers, is not available. A tentative estimate for 1982-83 (the latest available) indicates that total expenditure was of the order of £6 billion, just over half of which was met by the public sector. I should emphasise however that this figure should be regarded as no more than a guide to orders of magnitude.

Low Pay

68. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment what recent representations he has received concerning low pay.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have received some letters from hon. Members and others, including one from the hon. Member himself.

Departmental Legislation

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many Acts of Parliament have been promoted and how many statutory instruments made by his Department, or predecessor Departments covering his areas of responsibility, in each of the last 20 years.

Mr. Alan Clark: The figures requested are as follows:

Dates	Statutory instruments	Acts of Parliament
1966	46	1
1967	49	—
1968	131	1

Closed Shop

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has as to how many companies have now held or are due to hold ballots relating to a closed shop situation as a result of recent legislation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Press reports indicate that so far some 80 closed shop ballots have been held, mostly covering very small groups of employees. This means that the great majority of the 4 million or so employees covered by closed shops are now free to decide for themselves whether they wish to remain union members. I welcome this restoration of freedom of choice. In addition a number of major employers have ended their closed shops or given a commitment that no-one will be dismissed for non-union membership. Of course, the Employment Act 1982 imposes no specific obligation on employers to hold secret ballots on the continuation of closed shop agreements. If no ballot is held, the effect is exactly the same as if a ballot is held and the required majority is not achieved, and dismissal for non-membership of a trade union if automatically unfair.

Earnings

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will produce a table showing the average gross weekly earnings for full-time male employees for each region of the United Kingdom from 1980 to date; and if he will express such figures as a percentage of the national average.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Details of the average gross weekly earnings of full-time adult male employees working a full week in each region of Great Britain and for Great Britain as a whole (in relation to which each region can be expressed as a percentage) are published in Table 110 of the reports of the "New Earnings Survey" for 1980 to 1984 inclusive. Copies are in the Library.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list, for each of the six categories of employment with the lowest average wages and the six with the highest, as defined in the "New Earnings Survey," the rate, expressed in percentage terms, at which those wages increased, year-on-year, for each year since 1979 to date; and what has been their total increase in that period.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Information on the level of average weekly earnings and on annual changes for male and female employees in various categories such as negotiating group, occupation, industry, age, region and so on is published in the reports of the annual "New Earnings Survey". Copies of these reports for the years 1979 to 1984 inclusive are in the Library.

Professional and Executive Register

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he now intends to take steps to turn the job-finding activities of the professional and executive register over to the private sector.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 1 April 1985]: There are no plans for the moment to change the basis of operation of the service, but its future is being kept under review.

SCOTLAND

Curricular Development (Teachers' Boycott)

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements he will make in the light of the teachers' boycott of curricular development in relation to the interests of pupils who are following standard grade courses introduced in August 1984.

Mr. Younger: I have decided, following advice from the Scottish Examination Board and the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, that ordinary grade examinations in English, mathematics and arithmetic should be available as an option in 1986 for pupils whom it is not realistic to expect to be assessed on the basis of standard grade. In making this decision, I have also consulted the Headteachers' Association of Scotland and representatives of the independent schools sector in Scotland. Only through making this alternative available as an emergency arrangement for those who need it can fair opportunities for national certification in 1986 in these key subjects be offered to pupils who are being affected by the teachers' boycott of the curricular development work required for standard grade and of the associated assessment procedures.

The standard grade courses and assessments in English, mathematics, science and social and vocational skills will continue. Where there will be a choice, I would expect schools to decide in the interests of their pupils which form of examination to present them for. I would, however, expect all schools where satisfactory progress has been made in developing the new courses to offer standard grade and not to offer the option of ordinary grade. The Government remain fully committed to the development and full implementation of standard grade courses, which will lead to more effective and relevant teaching for pupils of all abilities. Standard grade has been recognised by the universities for their general entrance requirements and is supported by the employers' organisations. Moreover, from 1986 awards given on the Scottish Certificate of Education will show both standard grade and ordinary grade awards on the basis of the same numerical scale one to seven.

I firmly believe that it will be in pupils' best interests to continue with standard grade wherever possible. The new teaching methods involved will leave young people, including those going on to university, with as good a grasp of the subject matter as O-grades and a much greater ability to tackle complex problems and to apply what they have learnt. The Scottish Examination Board, in consultation with the Consultative Committee on the Curriculum and the Government, is pressing ahead with the preparation of higher and post higher courses which will follow on from the appropriate standard grade courses and in doing so is taking full account of the views of the Scottish Universities Council on Entrance on the core elements which the universities require to be covered in the syllabus. Highers in their present form will however be retained for those pupils whose schools find it necessary to revert to O-grade.

I recognise that this decision will not resolve all the difficulties arising from the teachers' boycott. Schools which decide to opt for ordinary grade will have to make a rapid transition; but I believe that there is sufficient common ground between the courses to make this practicable in the time available. I am afraid, however, that no alternative can be provided for pupils studying science or social and vocational skills at standard grade because these subjects have no ordinary grade equivalent. Nor is an alternative available for pupils for whom ordinary grade courses are not suitable. I would expect schools to continue to teach these pupils at standard grade as best they can. I also call upon teachers to return to the central task of curriculum development before further damage is inflicted on their pupils.

Cancer Screening

Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is satisfied with cancer screening facilities in Scotland; and how many computer-based call and recall schemes exist in Scotland, by area health authority.

Mr. John MacKay: The guidance issued to health boards in 1978 on the cervical cytology screening service is still valid and does not call for any changes. However, in view of recent public concern the Scottish Home and Health Department has asked health boards for detailed information on the service in each area, including the extent to which patient records are held on computer and the manner in which patients are recalled for screening.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total acreage of forest estates which have been sold by the Forestry Commission over the last 12 months; and what is the estimated value of these estates.

Mr. John MacKay: Forestry land sales by the Forestry Commission in the 12 months to 21 March 1985—the latest date for which figures are available—amounted to 19,200 hectares at a total sale price of £17 million.

Art Galleries (Maintenance Costs)

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the respective costs of maintenance of the buildings occupied by the National Gallery of Scotland, the Scottish National Gallery of Modern Art, the Scottish National Portrait Gallery and the Royal Scottish Academy.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Output Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the increase in output per head in non-manufacturing since the second quarter of 1983; how this compares with manufacturing; and what is the reason for any difference.

Mr. Peter Rees: Between the second quarter of 1983 and the third quarter of 1984 output per head increased by 7½ per cent. in manufacturing industries and remained constant in non-manufacturing industries. Distortions to non-manufacturing productivity in 1984 because of the coal strike make strict comparison of these figures difficult. Recorded productivity outside manufacturing tends to change more slowly, partly because of the way output is measured in some of the activities concerned.

Take-away Food

Mr. McTaggart asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received from the Hot Take-away Action Group about the level of value added tax on hot take-away food; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Barney Hayhoe: A number of hon. and right hon. Members have recently forwarded to Treasury Ministers a letter from the Hot Take-Away Action Group which includes the suggestion that the rate of VAT on hot take-away food should be reduced.

Budget (Job Creation)

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the tax changes announced in the Budget are expected to affect the number of women in part-time employment.

Mr. Peter Rees: The measures announced in the Budget will improve job prospects generally, including part-time employment of women.

Money Supply

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing the figures for each constituent part of sterling M3 for each year since 1978.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Official Report is not a statistical abstract. The information requested can be found in table 11·2 of Financial Statistics.

Public Sector Pension Funds (Investment Policy)

Mr. Steen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government regarding investment policy on public sector pension funds and the level of return on capital invested.

Mr. Hayhoe: Of the main public services only the local government superannuation scheme is funded. Government policy is to allow fund managers freedom to make their own decisions subject to certain limitations to safeguard the interests of prudent investment. Not more than 10 per cent. of the fund can be in unlisted securities, not more than 5 per cent. can be invested in any one concern, not more than 10 per cent. can be deposited with any one bank, and not more than 10 per cent. may be lent. The administrators are also required to take account of the need for diversification of investment, to have regard to the suitability of any investment proposals, and must seek expert financial advice at reasonable intervals.

The median rate of return for local government superannuation scheme funds in England and Wales for a time-weighted five-year period from 1979 to 1984 is 18·6 per cent.

In the nationalised industries, pension funds are the responsibility of the industry and pension fund trustees, and the Government have no responsibility for their operation.

Domestic Credit

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report figures showing his estimate of the expansion of domestic credit in each of the years 1982 to 1984.

Mr. Ian Stewart: As I have indicated to the hon. Member, figures on domestic credit expansion can be derived from tables 6·1 and 11·5 of Financial Statistics.

Norway (Double Taxation Convention)

Mr. Forman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether agreement has yet been reached on a new comprehensive double taxation convention with the Government of Norway; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: The Inland Revenue has concluded negotiations with officials of the Norwegian Ministry of Finance and the text of a revised comprehensive convention has been approved by the respective Governments. I hope it will be possible to arrange for the convention to be signed at an early date, to be followed by publication of the text as a schedule to a draft Order in Council. However, under the rules in Norway which apply to the availability of certain Government documents, the text of the draft convention will be made available in Norway before it has been signed by the Governments of the United Kingdom and Norway. In these particular circumstances I have authorised the Inland Revenue also to make available now the text of the draft convention, and I am arranging for copies of the document and the relevant Inland Revenue press release to be placed in the Library of the House.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will publish a table comparable to chart 1.5 of Cmnd. 9428 showing percentage change in programmes between 1978-79 and 1987-88 but separating out the programmes for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland;

(2) by how much the public expenditure planning total has risen or is planned to rise (a) as a whole, (b) in Scotland and (c) in the defence programme from 1978-79 to 1987-88.

Mr. Peter Rees [pursuant to his replies, 21 March 1985, c. 604]: Detailed information on spending by programme in 1978-79 is not readily available on the same basis as the information for 1979-80 to 1987-88 published in Cmnd. 9428. The table gives the information requested for the period 1979-80 to 1987-88, showing the change in cash and percentage terms.

The hon. Member should note that the "territorial" analysis of public expenditure is based on a wider range of expenditure in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. The latest figures, which relate to 1983-84, were published recently in the Official Report on 22 February, at columns 608-618.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Buses

Mr. Bidwell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received from the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders about effects of the Transport Bill 1985 upon the production of heavy duty buses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders has written to my Department expressing its view that the Transport Bill threatens the continued existence of a competitive bus manufacturing base in the United Kingdom. I do not share this pessimism.

Industrial Assistance

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the value of assistance provided from all sources for which he has responsibility to British industry since 1979.

Mr. Butcher: Between 1 April 1979 and 31 March 1985 the total forecast net expenditure of the Department of Trade and Industry and the Export Credits Guarantee Department is approximately £17·6 billion at 1984-85 prices. £16·6 billion of this may be broadly described as direct or indirect assistance to industry, with the remaining £1·0 billion providing for regulatory activities, consumer protection and administrative expenses.

EC (Spanish Accession)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has made any assessment of the anticipated loss in United Kingdom trade with Latin American countries following Spanish accession to the European Economic Community.

Mr. Channon: It is not possible to quantify the effect which Spanish accession will have on our trade with Latin America, but I see no reason to assume that the effect would be harmful. Indeed, I look forward to the possibility of British and Spanish companies co-operating in the Latin American market.

Latin America

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish a table showing for each year since 1970 (a) the percentage of exports from Latin American countries purchased by members of the European Economic Community and (b) the percentage of exports from EEC countries purchased by Latin American states; and if he will list the main products involved in each case.

Mr. Channon: The figures are in the table. Latin America's main exports to the European Community are oil, coffee, animal feedstuffs, metal ores, fruit and non-ferrous metals. The Community's main exports to Latin America are industrial machinery, road vehicles and other transport equipment, electrical machinery, organic chemicals and iron and steel.

Manufactured Goods

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the reasons for the differences between the figures given in his answer of 25 March, Official Report, columns 20 and 21, about the United Kingdom's share of the Common Market's imports of manufactured goods and those given in the answer of 29 November 1983, Official Report, column 447; and to what extent the figures have been affected by changes in the method of compiling the trade statistics.

Mr. Channon: In the earlier reply the value of imports of manufactures by the countres of the European Community included imports by the United Kingdom. In the later reply, in accordance with a revised method of compiling table E4 in the annual supplement to the "Monthly Review of External Trade Statistics", and as noted there, the value of imports by the United Kingdom has been excluded from the European Community total before calculation of the share taken by the United Kingdom.

Tourism

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to further the development of the United Kingdom tourism and leisure industry.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My right hon. Friend the Minister without Portfolio is to chair a group of Government Ministers, including, of course, myself, and officials which will be looking at ways to encourage the faster growth of the tourism and leisure industries in the United Kingdom. The group will concentrate on the statutory or other obstacles which stand in the way of developing employment and enterprise in the industries, and my right hon. Friend will be pleased to hear from people who have views which they think the group should take into account. The group is expected to complete its work by the end of July.

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, pursuant to the answer of 25 March, he will list the current obstacles to the further success of tourism in Great Britain.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 29 March 1985, c. 382]: A number of suggestions were made during the tourism review about what the Government might do to remove certain obstacles to the development and growth of the tourism industry. These suggestions were referred to in the paper placed in the Vote Office on 22 November 1983 at the time of my tourism review statement and they included such topics as Sunday trading; licensing laws; and the impression given to overseas visitors at our major sea and air ports. All these topics involve policy considerations which go wider than tourism, and all are presently under consideration in a number of Government Departments. It was also suggested that much could be done to improve the level of tourism signposting in this country, and two experiments are now being conducted in Kent and Nottingham to assess the scope for better tourism signposting.

Weighing Machines

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has made a comparison of the accommodation and overhead costs he charges for type approval of weighing machines with the accommodation and comparable overheads of a private industrial company doing business in central London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985, c. 312]: No. The National Weights and Measures Laboratory provides a unique and wide-ranging service and to the best of our knowledge its accommodation requirements housing the required testing facilities and its overhead costs do not have a parallel in private industry.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Williams and Glyns Bank v. Boland and Brown

Mr. Dubs asked the Attorney-General what are the increased costs per year estimated to have been caused by the decision in Williams and Glyns Bank v. Boland and Brown; and on what basis those costs have been estimated.

The Attorney-General: In 1981 the Law Society estimated that the cost of additional inquiries arising out of the decision in Williams and Glyn's Bank v. Boland and Brown [1981] AC 487 was £10 in a straightforward case. On the basis of 675,000 new building society advances in the year ending 31 December 1980 the society suggested that the increased costs per year to the house owning public was £6,750,000.

Property Services Agency

Mr. Strang asked the Attorney-General if the Director of Public Prosecution's fraud investigation group has yet begun its investigation of the Property Services Agency.

The Attorney-General: Investigations are directed at areas of conduct or specific transactions alleged to have involved the commission of criminal offences rather than the overall activities of an organisation. The police have in hand a number of such investigations which relate to employees in different sections of the Property Services Agency and in seven cases are being advised by the Director of Public Prosecutions.

TRANSPORT

Road Schemes

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all road construction contracts which his Department intends to award in 1985-86, showing in each case the total value of the contract and the expenditure likely to be incurred in that year.

Mrs. Chalker: The information requested is as follows:

This list shows that out of a total of 33 new main contracts, which we expect to let, 27 will incur expenditure in 1985-86. The composition of the list may change depending on the progress of the remaining statutory procedures affecting these schemes. There are a number of other schemes which could be started in 1985-86 depending on completion of statutory procedures and the availability of funds.

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport how the trunk road construction budget is allocated between new starts and schemes started in previous years for 1985-86 and each of the five preceding years, showing for each year the number of schemes started in that year.

Mrs. Chalker: The information requested is as follows:

£ million cash

Pilotage

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has received any proposals from Trinity House or any other quarter to alter the limits of the Ipswich pilotage district.

Mr. David Mitchell: On 26 March, Trinity House, as pilotage authority for the London district, applied to the Secretary of State for an order under section 9 of the Pilotage Act 1983 amending the limits of the London district at the mouth of the River Orwell. I shall consider whether to grant approval to advertise this order in the normal way.

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether it is his intention to approve pilotage orders amending existing district limits in advance of new pilotage legislation.

Mr. David Mitchell: I shall consider such orders in the light of all the circumstances.

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether it is his intention to publish, in advance of any pilotage legislation, terms of compensation payable to those pilots who may be displaced.

Mr. David Mitchell: The consultative document on marine pilotage, published in December 1984, proposes the transfer of pilotage responsibilities to harbour authorities, with a statutory compensation scheme for those pilots for whom there is no place in the new regime. It is our intention that at least the broad terms of this scheme should have been made known by the time the proposed legislation is introduced.

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation to restrict the limits of pilotage districts which are not cost-effective.

Mr. David Mitchell: The legislation envisaged in the consultative document is intended to improve the cost-effectiveness of pilotage services by making them the responsibility of harbour authorities. It will be for harbout authorities to determine the areas within which the interests of safety require the provision of pilotage services, subject to the need to obtain the approval of Parliament if they wish to extend compulsory pilotage outside harbour authority boundaries.

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether his Department keeps statistical records of the relative and comparable cost-effectiveness of different pilotage districts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The annual returns prepared by pilotage authorities contain basic statistical information. These are laid before Parliament. However, comparison of the relative cost-effectiveness of districts would also require other information, including the length of Acts of Pilotage and the physical circumstances of the district which is not shown in the returns.

Mr. Thornton asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy, when bringing forward legislation relating to marine pilotage, to maintain the present pension entitlements and expectations of British marine pilots; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I am currently considering the responses which have been made to the consultative document on marine pilotage issued last December, and have noted the concern expressed by many pilots about their pension position.

British Rail (Punctuality)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if there are any arrangements for independent auditing of British Rail's punctuality data; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: British Rail provides the area transport users' consultative committees on a regular basis with punctuality data as one of a number of performance indicators covering quality of service aspects. These enable regular monitoring of BR's performance by an independent body.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to the answer of 27 March, he will arrange for British Rail's punctuality statistics to be deposited periodically in the Library.

Mr. David Mitchell: Information on British Rail's punctuality performance is contained in the annual reports of the British Railways Board and the Central Transport Consultative Committee, which are laid before the Houses and copies placed in the Library.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of British Rail, he will ask him to display punctuality data on trains at all terminating stations.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand from British Rail that information on train punctuality is already displayed on a regular basis at selected terminating stations. I will, however, be glad to draw my hon. Friend's point to the attention of the chairman.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps British Rail takes to monitor punctuality performance by trains at intermediate stations.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand that the timings of trains at intermediate stations do not form part of the statistics on punctuality drawn up by British Rail. However, I also understand that British Rail continuously monitors the waiting times of trains at such stations in order to assess the effects on punctuality.

European Road Safety Year

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to contribute to the 1986 European Road Safety Year.

Mrs. Chalker: Plans for action at Community level are still under discussion between member states. We are currently considering what our own contribution should be.

Steering Wheels

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, to reduce the incidence of serious face injuries to belted passengers, he will introduce legislation to alter the design of steering wheels and columns.

Mrs. Chalker: Research is being carried out by the Transport and Road Research Laboratory into this subject. This may lead to changes being proposed to the relevant international standards; such changes would have to be agreed before legislation could be considered.

Windscreen Wipers and Bumper Heights

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will introduce legislation to make it madatory for windscreen wipers to be recessed;

(2) what information he has regarding the relationship between bumper heights on cars and injury causation.

Mrs. Chalker: The relationship between pedestrian injuries and the whole of the frontal area of cars is the subject of extensive research in Europe and America. The latest research findings are to be presented at a major international conference in July, and I expect this to give guidance on a number of measures for pedestrian protection, including the design of front bumpers and windscreen wipers.

M4 Motorway

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many miles of the M4 motorway are lit; in which county areas the lit sections are; and what further plans he has to light sections of the M4 motorway.

Mrs. Chalker: Lighting on the M4 motorway in England is as tabulated:

County	Approximate length of lighting (miles)
GLC	11·8
Berkshire	10·0
Avon	3·7
Gloucestershire	1·1
Total	26·6

Lighting on the M4 motorway in Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

The further provision of lighting on the M4 motorway will be reviewed after consideration of the recommendations concerning motorway lighting in the House of Commons Transport Committee's report on road safety.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the cost of lighting the stretches of the M4 so far unlit.

Mrs. Chalker: The estimated cost of lighting the unlit sections of the M4 in England is approximately £7 million at 1982-83 prices.

Lighting on the M4 motorway in Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Windscreens

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now introduce legislation to make it mandatory for vehicle manufacturers to fit laminated windscreens.

Mrs. Chalker: No. Such an extra cost to the consumer cannot be justified by any potential increase in road safety.

Mersey Tunnels (Tolls)

Mr. Porter asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will order a public inquiry into the proposed increase in toll charges at the Mersey tunnels.

Mr. Ridley: Representative objectors having a right to a public inquiry under section 92 of the County of Merseyside Act 1980 have asked for one. Arrangements for an inquiry are therefore being set in hand.

Severn Bridge

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now publish the report following the public inquiry held in Bristol in July 1984 regarding his proposal to increase tolls on the Severn bridge.

Mrs. Chalker: The outcome of the inquiry will be announced shortly.

Departmental Legislation

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many Acts of Parliament have been promoted and how many statutory instruments made by his Department, or predecessor Departments covering his areas of responsibility, in each of the last 20 years.

Mr. Ridley: Her Majesty's Stationery Office publishes annually "Lists of Statutory Instruments" and "Tables and Indices to Public and General Acts and General Synod Measures". Both of these are currently up to date to the end of 1983.

Given the changes to the machinery of government over the last 20 years, apportionment of the Acts or statutory instruments to the areas of present ministerial responsibility could be done only at disproportionate cost.

European Air Routes (Deregulation)

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he intends to take action to deregulate scheduled European air routes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: We are already pressing hard to liberalise air transport in Europe both within the European Community and with non-EEC countries. In the last nine months we have negotiated liberal agreements with the Netherlands and the Federal Republic of Germany, and have just secured one with Luxembourg. We shall be making every effort to achieve further liberalisation through both bilateral and multilateral agreements.

Air Travel (Competition)

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action he is taking to encourage greater competition in air travel; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: Greater competition in air travel should benefit the consumer in terms of better service and lower fares, and help airlines to improve efficiency. We are making a major effort to negotiate new, more liberal agreements with our European partners in order to introduce greater competition on a fair basis. We are also pressing the European Community to apply the competition rules of the treaty of Rome to air transport. Domestically the Civil Aviation Authority has proposed effectively to deregulate fares and to liberalise entry on to many routes.

Civil Aviation Policy

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration he has given to the paper entitled "Civil Aviation Policy: The Promised White Paper", a copy of which has been sent to him by the North of England Regional Consortium; what reply he is making; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I have read the paper with interest and a reply has been sent to the consortium assuring it that I will bear its views in mind in formulating my proposals on airports policy.

Road Maintenance Condition Survey

Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has received the report of the 1984 national road maintenance condition survey; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The report of the 1984 national road maintenance condition survey is published today. I have placed a copy in the Library of the House.

This report — which does not cover motorways — shows that while there has been some deterioration in recent years, the general condition of roads in England and Wales remains very similar to that when the survey began in 1977.

Nevertheless, the survey points to a deteriorating trend since 1980, both on trunk roads and on local authorities' roads. This reinforces the need for systematic identification of problem areas and careful planning of maintenance works. The deterioration in trunk road condition reflects the priority we have had to give in recent years to maintenance of the motorway network which carries large volumes of heavy goods vehicles and is vital to the economy of the nation.

The standing committee on highway maintenance has established the NRMCS as an objective basis for discussion of road condition and maintenance expenditure. I commend the report of the 1984 survey to all who have an interest in roads.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Lebanon (British Subjects)

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what advice his Department is currently issuing to British subjects who intend to travel to the Lebannon.

Mr. Renton: Travellers are currently being advised that, unless they have a compelling reason, they should defer their visit for the time being. Anyone who decides to travel does so at his own risk and should ensure that he is being met and looked after on arrival.

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has about the number of British subjects still in the Lebanon; and what advice he has issued to them on the desirability of their remaining there.

Mr. Renton: There are about 1,500 British citizens registered with Her Majesty's embassy in Beirut at present, nearly one third of whom are also Lebanese nationals. On 15 March, Her Majesty's ambassador issued the following warning:

"A second British subject has been kidnapped in West Beirut. British subjects there must therefore be considered at risk. They are advised not to remain unless they have a compelling reason."

British citizens in east Beirut and elsewhere in the country have not been advised to leave. They remain at their own risk.

Anglo-Irish Economic Steering Group

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish a list of all the meetings of the Anglo-Irish economic steering group, its members, and the Departments and sections from which United Kingdom officials have been seconded to it; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The last meeting of the AIESG took place in March 1980; since then its role has been taken over by the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council (AIIC). As with the AIIC committees, officials attended the meetings of the AIESG from various Departments depending on the subjects under discussion. It is not our practice to reveal the names of those concerned.

Falkland Islands (Oil Exploration)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what Her Majesty's Government's response has been to the representations about Falklands oil exploration which have been circulated to all members of the United Nations.

Mr. Renton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 31 January at column 274.

Bangladesh

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many consular staff were employed in Bangladesh in June 1979; and what are the figures at the latest available date.

Mr. Renton: The information is as follows:

June 1979
Consular and immigration staff:
20 United Kingdom-based, 26 locally engaged
December 1984
Consular and immigration staff:
20 United Kingdom-based, 36 locally engaged

In addition, in both years, there were temporary relief staff to help cover leave absences.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to speed up the issue of entry certificates in Bangladesh; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Following my visit to Dhaka in January, I have reviewed the situation and we are committed to provide temporary staff reinforcement to make up for leave absences to ensure that th effective strength of the immigration section is 15 ECOs. Overlaps are being arranged in order that new staff will be fully operative before taking over their predecessors' jobs. Other measures are being considered.

Entry Certificates

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the waiting list for the issue of entry certificates from the high commission in Dhaka, Bangladesh and other consular offices, at the latest available date.

Mr. Renton: The waiting times are published quarterly in the Home Office bulletin "Control of Immigration: Statistics," a copy of which is available in the Library of the House. At the end of 1984, waiting time to first interview for applicants in the non-priority queue in Dhaka was 23 months; in New Delhi 12 months; in Bombay six months; and in Islamabad 10¾ months. Applicants placed in priority queues were interviewed in six months or less in Bangladesh and in two months in India and Pakistan.

The numbers in the settlement queues in each case were Dhaka 12,972; New Delhi 1,394; Bombay 1,048; Islamabad 6,749; and Karachi 231.

El Salvador

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make representations to the Government of El Salvador regarding the murder of Archbishop Romero; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The Salvadorean Government are well aware of our concern to see those guilty of political assassinations, including the deplorable murder of Archbishop Romero, and of other crimes, brought to justice.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has now decided to send observers to the elections in El Salvador.

Mr. Renton: Her Majesty's ambassador to El Salvador and a member of his staff were designated to observe the elections held on 31 March in the normal course of their functions. This was announced by a Foreign and Commonwealth Office spokesman on 22 March.

Human Rights (Iran)

Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what current initiatives he is promoting through international forums to seek to improve the level of human rights in Iran.

Mr. Rifkind: We remain concerned at reports of violations of human rights in Iran. We have again co-sponsored a resolution on Iran at this year's session of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in Geneva. The resolution, which was adopted on 13 March, urged the Iranian Government, as a state party to the international covenant on civil and political rights, to respect and ensure to all its citizens the rights recognised in that covenant. It also extended the mandate of the special representative appointed by the commission to investigate the human rights situation in Iran, and instructed him to make an interim report to the United Nations General Assembly in the autumn and a full report to next year's session of the Commission on Human Rights.

Iran-Iraq War

Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent action Her Majesty's Government have taken through international forums to seek to bring about a settlement of the conflict between Iran and Iraq.

Mr. Rifkind: We have supported all the relevant Security Council resolutions and the efforts of the United Nations Secretary-General aimed at ending this tragic conflict. We supported the Secretary-General's appeal of 26 March, calling for both sides to stop attacks on civilian areas and merchant shipping, for an end to the threat to civil aviation and condemning the use of chemical weapons. In addition, we have participated in demarches with our Community partners in both Tehran and Baghdad calling on both sides to respond to United Nations appeals.

Iran (National Council of Resistance)

Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Ministers or officials in his Department have recently met representatives of the National Council of Resistance in Iran; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: Neither Ministers nor officials in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office have had any meetings recently with representatives of the National Council of Resistance of Iran.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Youth Training Schemes

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the projects by name and indicate the number of trainees in each youth training programme and the action for community employment scheme, together with the amount of public money advanced annually to each scheme operating in Newtownabbey borough which is funded by the Department of Economic Development.

Dr. Boyson: The following organisations are sponsoring projects in Newtownabbey borough:

Roman Catholic Schools (Qualifications)

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what evidence is available to him regarding recent changes in the curriculum of Roman Catholic maintained and voluntary grammar schools to seek to enable more students to achieve technical skills and scientific qualifications required by employers in the engineering industry in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: General inspection reports indicate that in the curriculum of most schools including maintained and voluntary grammar schools increasing emphasis is being placed on the need to equip pupils for life and work in a technologically orientated society. This trend should be given further momentum by our review of and development programme for the curriculum for 11 to 16-year-olds launched in September 1984.

Departmental Legislation

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Acts of Parliament have been promoted and how many statutory instruments made by his Department, or predecessor Departments covering his areas of responsibility, in each of the last 20 years.

Dr. Boyson: Her Majesty's Stationery Office publishes annually "Lists of Statutory Instruments" and "Tables and Indices to Public and General Acts and General Synod Measures". Both of these are currently up to date to the end of 1983.

Given the changes to the machinery of Government over the last 20 years, apportionment of the Acts or Statutory Instruments to the areas of present ministerial responsibility could only be done at disproportionate cost.

Unemployment Level

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the level of unemployment in the Province at the latest date; and what were the figures for June 1979.

Dr. Boyson [pursuant to his reply, 1 April 1985]: The information is as follows:

	June 1979	February 1985
Number of unemployed claimants	59,600	122,957
Unemployed claimants as a percentage of all employees	10·3	21·2

Firearms (Licensed Repairers)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons within Castlereagh borough are licensed to repair firearms.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 1 April 1985]: Two.

ENERGY

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the policy of the National Coal Board, in the light of the recent strike in the industry, regarding the making of payments due to workers in the same financial year as the period for which the payments are due.

Mr. David Hunt: This is a matter for the National Coal Board.

Superphenix Reactor

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will set out the safeguard arrangements which will cover the nuclear material in the blanket of the Superphenix fast breeder reactor;

(2) whether the French Government have made a declaration to Euratom under articles 77 and 84 of the Euratom treaty, as to the status of the Superphenix reactor with regard to civil or military use of the products.

Mr. Goodlad: I understand that the operator of the plant (NERSA) has declared to the Commission that the purpose of Superphenix is to generate electricity, and that the materials used in the reactor are entirely subject to Euratom supervision.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Palace of Westminster (Staff)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal how many people work in the Palace of Westminster; and if he will break this figure down into categories including secretaries and research assistants to Members of both Houses.

Mr. Biffen: The information requested is as follows:

	Number
Staff and Officers of
(i) House of Commons' Departments	931
(ii) House of Lords' Departments	315
Members' Private Staff:
House of Commons
(i) Secretaries	587
(ii) Research Assistants	459
House of Lords
(i) Secretaries	48
(ii) Research Assistants	34
Staff employed by Associated Agencies in the Palace of Westminster:	705

The figures include temporary staff.

These figures do not include Civil Servants who spend a proportion of their time working in the palace or journalists accredited to the Press Galleries.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Parole

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prisoners were released on parole during 1984 following the exercise of the powers contained in section 33 of the Criminal Justice Act 1982;

(2) how many prisoners who were eligible for parole were refused parole in 1984 following the exercise of the powers contained in section 33 of the Criminal Justice Act 1982;

(3) how many parolees released under section 33 of the Criminal Justice Act 1982 had their licence revoked during 1984;

(4) following the exercise of his powers contained in section 33 of the Criminal Justice Act 1982, how many applications for the revocation of a parole licence were turned down by the Parole Board during 1984.

Mr. Mellor: The information available, which is provisional, relates to those serving sentences of less than 19½ months who became eligible for parole under section 33 of the Criminal Justice Act 1982 and who were dealt with during 1984. About 5,120 were released on parole and 1,550 were refused parole. By the end of 1984 about 100 of those released had come to adverse notice while on parole licence of whom about 55 had their licence revoked. In the remaining 45 cases the Parole Board advised that it was not necessary to revoke the licence; about 30 received written warnings and for about 15 no further action was taken. Corresponding information about those serving sentences of 19½ months or more who were affected by the exercise of these powers could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Remanded Persons

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many males and females were remanded in custody prior to trial in 1984.

Mr. Mellor: Information on the number of untried males and females received into Prison Department establishments is published annually in "Prison Statistics, England and Wales" (Table 2.3 of the latest volume for 1983, Cmnd. 9363). Provisional information about untried males received in 1984 will be published shortly in a Home Office Statistical Bulletin (Issue No. 8/85) on "The Prison Population 1984". Information on the number of persons remanded in custody on committal for trial for indictable offences is published annually in "Criminal Statistics 1983" (Table 8.7 of the latest volume for 1983, Cmnd. 9349). Separate figures for males and females could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average length of time spent on remand in custody for (a) London and (b) the rest of England and Wales, during 1984.

Mr. Mellor: Information is not available centrally on the average time spent on remand in different establishments. The available information about the average time spent in custody by all untried and by all convicted unsentenced prisoners is published annually in "Prison Statistics England and Wales" (Table 2*(g)* of the latest issue for 1983, Cmnd. 9363). Provisional estimates for males in 1984 will be published shortly in a Home Office Statistical Bulletin (Issue No. 8/85) on "The Prison Population in 1984".

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, on the latest date available, how many prisoners who had been remanded in custody had been waiting for their trials to commence between zero to three months, three to six months, six to nine months, nine to 12 months, 12 to 18 months and over 18 months.

Mr. Mellor: The latest readily available information relates to all untried prisoners and is given in the following table:

Estimated population of untried prisoners in Prison Department establishments in England and Wales on 31 January 1985: by length of time since initial remand in custody*

Length of time since initial remand in custody†	Estimated number‡
Up to 3 months	5,530
Over 3 up to 6 months	1,560
over 6 up to 9 months	480
Over 9 up to 12 months	180
Over 12 up to 18 months	140
Over 18 months	5
Total	7,890

*Based on records held centrally which are approximate; detailed checking of individual cases would involve disproportionate cost.

†Including any time which may have been spent on bail after the initial remand in custody.

‡Rounded estimates; the components do not add to the total because they have been rounded independently.

Life Sentence Prisoners

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total number of life sentence prisoners in each of the five special categories which were created in October 1983.

Mr. Mellor: On 31 December 1984, 21 terrorist murderers were serving life sentence in Prison Department establishments in England and Wales. For information on the other categories I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) on 12 February at column 96.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of life sentence prisoners who have currently served (a) in excess of 15 years, (b) between 15 and 16 years, (c) between 16 and 17 years, (d) between 17 and 18 years, (c) 18 and 19 years, (f) 19 and 20 years, and (g) in excess of 20 years.

Mr. Mellor: The latest readily available information is given in the following table:

Population of life sentence prisoners† in Prison Department establishments in England and Wales on 31 January 1985 whose initial reception under sentence was over 15 years by time since initial reception under sentence‡

*Estimated number

	Over 15 up to 16 years	Over 16 up to 17 years	Over 17 up to 18 years	Over 18 up to 19 years	Over 19 up to 20 years	Over 20 years	Total
All life sentence prisoners	30	20	15	20	15	35	135
Of whom prisoners recalled after having been released on licence	5	5	5	5	10	20	50

Notes:

* The figures are those recorded centrally and are approximate; detailed checking of individual cases would involve disproportionate cost. The figures are rounded and components do not always add to the totals because they have been rounded independently.

† Including persons detained under s. 53, Children and Young Persons Act 1933 and those serving custody for life.

‡ Includes time spent on licence by prisoners recalled after having been released on licence.

Prisoners (Statistics)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total number of prisoners currently serving more than five years for offences of violence and drug trafficking.

Mr. Mellor: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Immigration

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the ratio of staff in his Department to applicants for (i) British citizenship, (ii) indefinite leave to remain and (iii) temporary leave to enter; and what it has been for the last five years for which records are available.

Mr. Waddington: The information available in respect of applicants for British citizenship is as follows:

	Ratio	Applications	Staff in post (30 June) in Nationality Division
1980	292:1	50,492	173
1981	383:1	70,092	183
1982	368:1	69,956	190
1983	317:1	80,457	254
1984	163:1	42,702	261½

The other information requested is not available since staff are not assigned exclusively to work on applications for indefinite leave to remain, or temporary leave to enter.

Prisoners (Deaths)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people in 1984 died (a) in prison and (b) in hospital having been moved there from prison; and if he will indicate in each case the prison and the cause of death.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is as follows:

Establishment	Cause of death
1. Brixton	Suicide: asphyxia by hanging
2. Leeds	Open verdict: acute onchronic bronchitis, toxic myocarditis, coronary atheroma
3. Leeds	Natural causes: cardiac failure, coronary arterial sclerosis

A34 (Traffic Incident)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Thames valley police and make a statement on an incident on 22 March on the A34 three miles south of Newbury when the police broke the window of a parked car;

(2) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Thames valley police and make a statement on an incident on 22 March on the A34 at the Swan roundabout near Newbury when a minibus was pushed off the road by police officers and rolled on to its side in the ditch;

(3) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Thames valley police and make a statement on an incident on 22 March when a woman was injured outside Newbury police station in an incident involving members of his force.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The chief constable of Thames valley informs me that at 2.30 am on 22 March two cars were found blocking the road on the A34 three miles south of Newbury. One of the cars was moved by its owner, but the other had to be removed by police to clear the road. In the course of this a car window was broken. Shortly afterwards, at the Swan roundabout on the A34, a car and a minibus were found blocking both exits from the roundabout. Despite appeals for the owners to come forward no one did so, and the police therefore moved the minibus off the road. Two people were arrested and issued with summonses for obstruction of the highway. Two complaints under section 49 of the Police Act 1964 have been made about the police action.

The chief constable informs me that he is not aware of an incident outside Newbury police station that day in which a woman was injured.

Detained Persons

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why watches are taken away from people taken into custody.

Mr. Mellor: The general position is that a person arrested by the police may keep personal property unless the police consider that it may be used to cause harm to himself or others, to effect an escape or is needed as evidence. A person committed to prison custody may bring or purchase a watch, subject to the Governor's discretion to refuse permission if the retention of the watch is considered undesirable in the prisoner's own interests or in the interests of good order or security. If the hon. Member has a particular case in mind, perhaps he would write to me.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will ensure that reading material is available in prisons for anyone who requests it who has been taken into custody.

Mr. Mellor: In accordance with rule 30 of the Prison Rules 1964, reading material is available in prisons through their libraries for all persons received into custody who request it.

Prisons (Dental Clinics)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many days in 1984 dental clinics were cancelled due to shortage of staff; and what was the total number of clinics cancelled at Pentonville, Winton Green, Liverpool, Leeds, Manchester and Holloway prisons, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: The incidence of dental clinic cancellations is not recorded centrally and could only be obtained for all prisons at disproportionate cost. As regards Pentonville, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to his question on 17 January at column 177. The number of days on which dental clinics were cancelled in 1984 at the other establishments mentioned was, according to information which has been specially obtained, as follows:

	No. of days on which clinics cancelled	No. of clinics cancelled
Birmingham	3	3
Liverpool	6	9
Leeds	1	1
Manchester	4	7
Holloway	2	4

Most, but not necessarily all, of these cancellations were due to staff shortages.

Police and Fire Services (West Midlands)

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the answer of 31 January to the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Futchett), Official Report, column 339, if he has had any discussions with the district councils within the west midlands which had indicated their interest in direct involvement with the police and fire services.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend saw leaders of the Conservative groups of four district councils in the west midlands (Birmingham, Dudley, Solihull, and Walsall) on 15 November 1984.

Victims of Crime

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what reactions Ministers in his Department received to Her Majesty's Government's recent White Paper on victims of crime at the conference organised by the Association of County Councils and the National Association of Victim Support Schemes; what representations he has had on the White Paper so far; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: At the conference the decision to increase substantially the level of grant given to the NAVSS was warmly welcomed, but concern was expressed that the Home Office was not yet making grants to individual local schemes. My right hon. and learned Friend has, as yet, received no representations relating to the White Paper which contained the Government's response to the First Report (Session 1984-85) of the Select Committee on Home Affairs.

The proposals referred to in the White Paper are being pursued. In particular, he will be giving careful and sympathetic consideration in the coming months to the matter of financial aid for victims support at local and regional level.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Her Majesty's Government propose to make additional funds available to the National Association for Victim Support Schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Yes. In 1984-85 the Government grant was £58,500, but in 1985-86 a grant of up to £120,000 will be paid. The increase is mainly to enable additional staff to be appointed and the higher costs of larger premises to be met. No grant whatsoever was paid to the victim support movement before the Government were elected in 1979.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to how many local victim support schemes are claimed to be at risk because of current pressure on local authority expenditure.

Mr. Mellor: I have no specific information on this point.

National Security

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is Her Majesty's Government's definition of the term national security.

Mr. Brittan: This term has been in general use for many years in a variety of contexts and is generally understood to refer to the safeguarding of the state and the community against threats to their survival or well-being. I am not aware that any previous Administration has thought it appropriate to adopt a specific definition of the term.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will describe what information relating to offences committed by miners during the miners' dispute was passed from Metropolitan police sources to the National Coal Board.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that the Metropolitan police have passed no such information to the National Coal Board.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in the course of the miners' dispute, the National Coal Board requested or obtained any information from any police force relating to striking miners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: I have been asked to reply. This is a matter for the National Coal Board.

Personal Data

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will describe the procedures he has established to ensure that personal data exempt from the Data Protection Act via section 27 are relevant and not excessive in relation to the purposes for which the personal data are collected.

Mr. David Waddington: The Data Protection Act imposes no requirement upon the Secretary of State to establish procedures for ensuring that personal data which are exempt from the provisions of the Act by virtue of section 27 are relevant and not excessive for the purpose for which they are collected. Nevertheless, as I explained in reply to a similar question from the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) on 5 July 1984, at column 219, my hon. and learned Friend is satisfied that in the organisations for which he is responsible appropriate arrangements exist for ensuring the security and quality of personal data.

Dogs

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidelines are issued to the police relating to policy on prosecuting subsequent to attacks by dogs.

Mr. Giles Shaw: General guidance on criteria for prosecution is to be found in the Attorney-General's memorandum on criteria for prosecution, issued under Home Office Circular 26/1983, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. No specific guidance has been issued centrally on prosecution policy in relation to attacks by dogs.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will, after consultation with the British Veterinary Association, take urgent action to ban both the importation into the United Kingdom of Chinese Sharpei dogs, and breeding from those already here, until an effective screening process can be put into effect to prevent the importation and breeding of Sharpeis with inheritable entropion.

Mr. Mellor: No. We have no power to prohibit the import or breeding of these animals.

Great Ape (Experimentation)

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what species of great ape are or have been used for the purpose of experimentation in the United Kingdom at any time during the past three years; and for what purpose.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not readily available, and I shall reply as soon as possible.

Police (Search Powers)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals Her Majesty's Government plan to introduce to enable the police to search football supporters following the enactment of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act.

Mr. Giles Shaw: When the relevant provisions of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act are implemented on 1 January 1986, the police throughout England and Wales will have the power to stop and search those reasonably suspected of carrying stolen goods, offensive weapons and other prohibited articles such as house-breaking implements. This is a new power, so far as the police in many parts of the country are concerned; and even where stop and search powers already exist, they do not extend at present to searches for offensive weapons.

The use of the power will be subject to certain safeguards, set out in the Act itself and in the associated codes of practice, designed to ensure that the powers are used accountably, and only in the circumstances for which they are intended. Before making the search the constable must identify himself and give the object and grounds of the search; following the search he must make a written record of the search, unless it is not practicable to do so.

Those provisions of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act provide the police with an important new power in tackling street crime, including in the context of disturbances associated with football matches. The proviso that written records need not be made where this is impracticable was designed specifically to meet the problem the police would otherwise face in situations of public disorder, and there is no question of the police being inhibited in such situations, as a result of the Act. Nor does the Act in any way preclude the police or stewards searching those entering football grounds with their consent or because the club makes this a condition of entry.

Northern Ireland (Airport Landing Cards)

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the airports in Britain at which passengers flying from Northern Ireland have to complete airport landing cards; on whose instructions this is carried out; and where the completed cards are sent.

Mr. Brittan: Under article 7 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Supplemental Temporary Provisions) Order 1984 passengers arriving from Northern Ireland at any airport in Great Britain may be required to complete landing cards. It is for the chief officer of the police force concerned to decide whether and how cards should be used at any particular airport; the practice varies according to circumstances. There is no arrangement for central collecting of completed cards; their disposal is also a matter for the chief officer of the police force concerned.

Bullwood Hall, Essex

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what, by each category, is the staffing complement at Bullwood hall girls' borstal, Essex; and what in each of the past three years has been the actual staff in post.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is as follows:

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria are used by the governor of Bullwood hall girls' borstal, Essex, and the deputy governor when deciding upon requests they receive from prisoners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Applications from inmates at Her Majesty's prison and youth custody centre Bullwood hall are considered according to the provisions in prison department standing orders, circular instructions and other central guidance. Staff dealing with applications are expected to have a proper concern for the inmates' interests and I believe that they do.

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what, by each category, has been the full-time and part-time staffing at Bullwood hall girls' borstal, Essex, in each of the past three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is as follows:

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions in the last 12 months at Bullwood hall girls' borstal, Essex, association periods have been curtailed or abandoned because of staff shortages.

Mr. Mellor: In the period 1 April 1984 to 31 March 1985 inclusive, evening association periods at HM prison and youth custody centre Bullwood hall have been curtailed on 214 occasions and abandoned on a further 74.

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the arrangements at Bullwood hall girls' borstal, Essex, for inmates to have access to education, library facilities and television; and what changes in access there have been to these over the past two years.

Mr. Mellor: Education facilities at HM prison and youth custody centre Bullwood hall are intended to be available on five days and four evenings each week. Inmates may normally attend the library once a week and watch television during evening association periods. Staff shortages have restricted the availability of these facilities during the past two years.

Fire and Police Authorities

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance is to be issued by the Home Office on the establishment of the new fire and police authorities proposed in the Local Government Bill.

Mr. Brittan: We are making arrangements to issue to interested parties a consultative memorandum on the establishment of the new joint fire and joint police authorities. The memorandum, copies of which are being placed in the Library and the Vote Office, is primarily directed to those councillors who will be acquiring responsibilities in relation to the police and fire services from 1 April 1986. It describes the action required to ensure that the transition is handled effectively and that the most economic and efficient structure is put into place. The Home Office will be glad to join in discussions at regional level on the new arrangements and to assist in implementation planning by the London boroughs and metropolitan districts which should now be proceeding.

Police (Professional Behaviour)

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis intends to publish the handbook on the principles of policing and guidance for professional behaviour.

Mr. Brittan: The commissioner is publishing today. He is sending copies personally to all right hon. and hon. Members for constituencies which fall wholly or partly within the Metropolitan police district. I am arranging for copies to be placed in the Library of the House.

Transfer of Prisoners

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the administrative arrangements for the transfer of prisoners between (a) England and Scotland and (b) England and Northern Ireland; and how many prisoners have been transferred in the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 3 December 1984, c. 4]: The following table shows the number of transfers which took place in each of the last five years for which figures are available, showing under which of the following sections of the Criminal Justice Act 1961 the transfer took place: section 26 (permanent transfer), section 27 (temporary transfer), section 28 (transfer for trial), section 29 (transfer for other judicial purposes) or section 30 (transfer of prisoners unlawfully at large). It is possible that some transfers authorised at the end of each year may have actually taken place early in the following year. Some prisoners may have been transferred on more than one occasion, and some prisoners initially transferred under sections 27, 28 or 29 may have remained in the other jurisdiction to serve the remainder of their sentences.

THE ARTS

Regional Opera

Mr. Arnold asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what plans the Minister for the Arts has to encourage regional opera with moneys which have already been voted for by Parliament for 1985-86.

Mr. Waldegrave: The distribution of funds is a matter for the Arts Council; but expenditure on opera in the English regions is expected to be approximately the same as in 1984-85.

Equal Opportunities Officer

Mr. Janner asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts whether the Minister for the Arts will now appoint a departmental equal opportunities officer with responsibility for co-ordinating the Civil Service policy of non-discrimination within his Department.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Cabinet Office provides the Office of Arts and Libraries with personnel services and an officer within the Personnel Division of the Cabinet Office has been designated as Equal Opportunities Officer with responsibility for advising on the full scope of equal opportunity matters as they concern race and sex discrimination.

Objects in Lieu of Taxation

Mr. Faulds asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts whether he will specify the objects and property accepted in satisfaction of estate duty or capital transfer tax during the financial year ended on 31 March; and if, in listing them, he will specify (a) the amount of tax satisfied in each case, (b) whether any offer of objects accepted carried conditions as to destination and (c) the total of tax thus satisfied during the financial year in question.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information requested is:

Property accepted	Amount of tax satisfied £
Calke Abbey (house, contents and land)	2,584,000
Drawings by Sir Jacob Epstein	20,000
Sculpture by Dame Barbara Hepworth-Nicholson*	145,191
Two Canalettos (balance of payment)	25,074
Land at Ty Canol Wood	76,307
Renoir painting "La Pensée"*	646,350
Louis XVI bonheur du jour	247,500
Palladius and Seneca manuscripts*	66,000
Birdoswald Land	130,138
Bust of Lord Somers	33,226
Geoffrey Keynes collection*	†26,214
Total	4,000,000

Notes:

* Conditions regarding the allocation of these items were attached to the offer and all were honoured.

† The total amount of tax satisfied by this offer was £194,000. The outstanding balance of £167,786 will be met from the AIL vote for 1985-86.

Mr. Faulds asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts whether he will list the amounts initially appearing in the Supply Estimates for the five financial years from 1980-81 to 1984-85, inclusive, in respect of the tax discharge value of works of art and property accepted in satisfaction of capital transfer tax and estate duty, together with particulars of any subsequent increases in those amounts which may have taken place during any of the five financial years in question; whether he will at the same time specify the total tax discharge value of works of art and property actually accepted during each of the five years; and whether the accounting practice is to cancel the resulting surplus in the event of the estimated quota not being fulfilled in any given year.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Benefits

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he proposes to take in respect of payments to pensioners, war pensioners and parents receiving child benefits resulting from the recommendations issued in the report by the Comptroller and Auditor General entitled, "Arrangements for Delivery of Social Security Benefits."

Mr. Newton: The Report makes clear that we have already introduced payment of certain benefits directed to bank and building society accounts by credit transfer, as recommended by a Rayner scrutiny, as an alternative to the traditional method of payment by order book across post office counters. Take-up of this new method of payment has so far been disappointingly low, and we have begun a survey of current public attitudes towards methods and frequency of payment of benefits to help us in considering whether further steps would be appropriate.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much money was paid out in (a) unemployment benefit and (b) supplementary benefit within the City of Leicester in 1984 and in each of the preceding four years; and how these figures compare with the equivalent national figure.

Mr. Whitney: This information is not available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Elderly Persons

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will ensure that the provision, that those over pension age in residential care and nursing homes will be able to continue for life to have their charges met at the level of payment in force when the new payment limits are introduced at the end of April, will include provision for increases in line with inflation.

Mr. Newton: The draft Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous Provisions Regulations 1985 provide for supplementary benefit board and lodging payments to be protected at the amount being paid when the regulations come into operation. There are no plans to increase these protected amounts in line with inflation, but they will of course increase if they are overtaken by new limits for the relevant accommodation which result from a future review.

Population Statistics

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the size of the population of the United Kingdom forecast for each of the next 10 years, showing men and women separately, in each of the following age bands: (a) 0 to 15 years, (b) men 16 to 64 years, (c) women 16 to 59 years, (d) men 65 to 74 years, (e) women 60 to 74 years and (f) people over 75 years; and what proportion each band is of the total population for that year.

Mr. John Patten: The latest projections by the Government Actuary of the population in the United Kingdom for the years 1985 to 1995 are in the table.

United Kingdom: mid-1983 based principal projections of the population (thousands ,000)

Note:
The numbers in the individual age groups may not add to the all ages total due to rounding.

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many men will reach the age of 64 years in the next year.

Mr. John Patten: The latest population projections for the United Kingdom, show that 294,000 men will reach the age of 64 between mid 1985 and mid 1986 and survive to mid 1986.

Human Embryos (Experiments)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which organisations he proposes to consult before drafting legislation on the Warnock committee proposals to control experiments on human embryos.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We invited views on the Warnock report from a wide range of interested organisations and the public. We are considering the substantial comment we have received and have no plans at present for further formal consultation.

Tinnitus Masker

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will make the device known as a tinnitus masker generally available on the National Health Service;

(2) in which parts of the United Kingdom a tinnitus masker is available on the National Health Service; and why it is not available nationally.

Mr. John Patten: The decision on what treatment is appropriate for a particular patient is a matter for the consultant responsible for his care. Any hospital consultant could prescribe a tinnitus masker if he considered it to be clinically necessary for his patient, subject only to resources being available within the health authority. Alternatively, he could consider referring the patient to a specialist tinnitus clinic, where appropriate treatment would be provided. However I understand that on the available evidence maskers are not regarded as an efficacious form of treatment for many tinnitus sufferers. Consultants are therefore likely to prescribe other forms of treatment more appropriate for particular cases. The Department has funded a multi-centre field trial of maskers, the results of which are now being evaluated. No doubt consultants will wish to take account of this study, and the profession's view of it, in reaching decisions on particular cases.

Orthopaedic Beds (Wolverhampton)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proposals he has to bring the number of orthopaedic beds in Wolverhampton up to the national norm.

Mr. John Patten: It is for the local health authority to decide the number of beds it will provide in any specialty in the light of local needs and circumstances. For this reason we do not lay down national norms.

Research Management Review

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make available to interested persons the review of the Department of Health and Social Security research management carried out by Mr. T. Nodder.

Mr. John Patten: We have recently received Mr. Nodder's report and we are considering it.

Health Authorities (Racial Discrimination)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidance he issues to regional health authorities regarding the implications for their employment practices of Her Majesty's Government's policy on racial discrimination.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In 1978, following the coming into effect of the Race Relations Act 1976, the Department issued a Health Circular (HC(78)36) setting out its implications for the National Health Service. That circular is still current. There is in addition a general Whitley council agreement, binding on health authorities and their staff, which requires that all staff be afforded equal opportunities in employment, irrespective of their sex, marital status, religion, creed or colour. The circular and the agreement are both in accordance with the Government's present policy on racial discrimination.

In November 1983 the Commission for Racial Equality wrote to chairmen of all regional and district health authorities drawing their attention to their code of practice for the elimination of racial discrimination and the promotion of equality of opportunity in employment. We are currently considering whether any further advice should be issued to health authorities.

NHS (Staff Pay)

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Services what percentage of (a) males and (b) females working in the National Health Service in the east midlands earn less than £100 per week.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is not available centrally.

Trent RHA (Job Losses)

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many jobs have been lost in the National Health Service in the area covered by the Trent regional health authority since 1983.

Mr. John Patten: We do not collect centrally detailed information about each health authority post. The total number of staff employed in the Trent region increased between September 1983 and September 1984 — the latest figures available — by about 60 whole time equivalents.

Handicapped Children

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list and describe the information available about the numbers and categories of handicaps in children detected or assessed in recent years, stating whether information is available about the age at which a handicap was detected, and stating the nature of the areas or authorities for which separate information is available;

(2) if he will estimate the proportion of handicaps in children which is detected during (a) pregnancy, and (b) neonatal care; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Information about the numbers of handicaps in children, detected in pregnancy or in childhood, is not collected centrally. There is a voluntary national scheme for reporting congenital malformations detected within the first seven days of birth, and the results of this are published regularly in the "Office of Population Censuses and Surveys Monitor", series MB3.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how handicaps in children are detected and assessed.

Mr. John Patten: Handicapping conditions should be detected within the routine surveillance services that we expect health authorities to provide in order to monitor developmental progress in all children. A programme for these services was put forward by the Department in a paper "Prevention in the Child Health Services" published in 1980, and we know that health authorities have developed a variety of arrangements to provide a subsequent detailed professional assessment of the needs of handicapped children when they are detected.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the latest figures available for (a) the number claiming supplementary benefit and (b) the total number dependent on supplementary benefit; and how many of the latter were children.

Mr. Whitney: At December 1983, 4·3 million people were in receipt of supplementary benefit for themselves and their dependants, totalling 7·2 million people of whom 1·8 million were children.

Family Statistics

Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the latest figures available for the number of children living in families with at least one unemployed parent.

Mr. Whitney: The latest available figures are derived from the 1981 family expenditure survey. These indicate that there were then 1·2 million dependent children in families where at least one parent had been unemployed for three months or more. Figures for families with shorter durations of unemployment are not readily available.

NHS (Funding)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the extent to which any increase in real terms in the funding of the National Health Service over the last five years takes account of demographic changes and the impact on costs of technological developments.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government have increased spending on the National Health Service by 18 per cent. in real terms over the last five years. This increased spending after allowing for increased NHS costs, is more than enough to meet demographic changes and to make some contribution to the costs of medical advance. Greater efficiency has added to the resources available—health authorities planned to make improvements valued at £100 million or over 1 per cent. of their revenue budgets in 1984-85 alone—and will make a growing contribution. Increased resources and greater efficiency are reflected in the use of services by patients. In 1983 hospitals in England alone treated 649,000 more inpatient cases, 252,000 more day cases and had over 2·5 million more outpatient attendances than in 1978.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current level of expenditure on the National Health Service expressed as a percentage of gross domestic product; what information he has as to the comparable figures in other western countries; and to what extent differences in these percentages reflect variations in wage levels as between the countries concerned.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Expenditure on the National Health Service in the United Kingdom, amounted to 5·6 per cent. of the gross domestic product in 1983, the latest year for which data are available.

Estimates of public and total expenditure on health care by other Western countries, which have been derived by the OECD, are presented as follows for the latest year for which data are available (1982).

	Public expenditure on health care as a percentage of GDP (1982)	Total expenditure on health care as a percentage of GDP (1982)
Canada	5·9	8·2
France	6·7	9·3
Germany	6·6	8·2
Italy	6·0	7·0
United States	4·5	10·6
United Kingdom	5·2	5·9

Source: Public Expenditure on Health under Economic Constraints OECD 1984.

These comparisons should be treated with great care. Some countries define health care to include items which we would regard as personal social services and which are not included in our NHS figures. The share of public expenditure on health care in GDP is affected by several factors, including the definition of public expenditure and the balance between public and private provision. These differences and many others mean that precise comparisons cannot be made.

The lack of comparable data on the wages of health care workers in different countries makes it impossible to calculate the extent to which variations in these wage levels contribute to variations in the share of expenditure on health care in GDP.

Population (Distribution)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the percentage distribution of the population as a whole in England by socio-economic group as used for census purposes in 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. John Patten: The information required is available only for years between population censuses from the general household survey and for combined categories of socio-economic group. These figures are shown in the table. Figures for 1984 are not yet available.

Socio-economic groups of the population in England

Percentages

Socio-economic group	1980	1981	1982	1983
Professional (self-employed and employees) workers	5	4	5	5
Employers and Managers	16	14	16	16
Intermediate and Junior non manual workers	21	21	21	20
Skilled manual and Own Account (non professional) workers	36	36	35	34
Semi-skilled manual and Personal Service workers	17	19	18	19
Unskilled manual workers	5	5	5	6
BASE (=100 per cent.)	25,333	26,169	21,473	21,114

In this table members of the Armed Forces, full-time students and those who have never worked have been excluded. Moreover a married woman is classified according to the socio-economic group of her husband if he is in the household, and a child under 16 is classified according to the socio-economic group of the father (if there is no father in the household the child is classified according to the socio-economic group of the head of household).

The General Household Survey is based on a sample of households and differences in these percentages from year to year are subject to sampling error.

Fuller details of the number of households in England and Wales classified by the socio-economic group of the household head—at the time of the 1981 Census—can be found in Table 8 of the Census 1981 report on Household and Family Composition.

Back Pain

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the back pain study by the University of Surrey sponsored by his Department will be published;

if he will publish any interim statistics and information already available to his Department in the Official Report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply on 27 March to the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) at column 253-4.

Iranian Servicemen (Medical Treatment)

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many Iranian servicemen have received medical treatment in the United Kingdom during the last six months, what was the cost of such treatment; and at whose expense such treatment was given.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I understand that during the past six months, visas have been issued to 37 Iranian servicemen to travel to this country for medical treatment and that treatment has been given in private hospitals and paid for by an Iranian organisation. We have no information on the costs involved nor on the numbers who have actually travelled.

Dovenby Hospital, Cumbria

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Social Services for what purpose an open market valuation is being placed on Dovenby hospital in Cumbria.

Mr. John Patten: The report on underused and surplus property in the National Health Service—published in January 1984 — recommended that all NHS property should be valued as part of a wider exercise to create a comprehensive estate data base. I understand that the valuation of Dovenby hospital follows that recommendation.

Mr Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many offers have been made or expressions of interest shown by private interests in the site or parts of the site of the Dovenby hospital in Cumbria.

Mr. John Patten: We do not have this information. The hon. Member may care to contact the West Cumbria health authority.

RHAs (Property)

Mr Steen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the regional health authorities which have sought professional advice on their property holdings, following his Department's circular 22/83.

Mr. John Patten: Thirteen regional health authorities have regional estates surveyors in post and eight regions have set up regional property panels. Two regions—including the one which does not employ a regional estates surveyor — have appointed firms of outside agents to give them comprehensive advice on property matters.

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he has yet had cause to penalise any regional health authority for not implementing the system of notional rents for property, as set out in his Department's circular 22/83: and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will list the regional health authorities which have already complied with his Department's circular 22/83 with regard to the introduction of a system of notional rents on property.

Mr. John Patten: No region has a full notional rental system in operation. It has proved necessary for the Department to undertake further substantial development work before a satisfactory system can become fully operational. This work is planned to be completed shortly. No regional health authority has therefore been penalised for not introducing a system.

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the amount of property and land, in each of the regional health authorities, which has been sold as a result of the changes in estate management practice set out in his Department's circular 22/83.

Mr. John Patten: Circular HC(83)22 gave guidance on a variety of aspects of good estate management. It is not possible to determine what proportion of land sold is as a direct result from the circular's advice. Land sales for the year ending 31 March 1984 were as follows:

Region	Disposals in the Year Total Acreage	Total Receipts £000s
Northern	20	858
Yorkshire	88	844
Trent	55	2,342
East Anglian	6	934
North West Thames	13	6,096
North East Thames	13	3,771
South East Thames	8	1,570
South West Thames	7	2,409
Wessex	233	1,238
Oxford	66	1,522
South Western	80	972
West Midlands	83	1,930
Mersey	148	1,464
North Western	8	999

Speech Therapy Services

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) pursuant to his answer of 20 March, Official Report, column 503, what are the terms of the appointment of Mrs. Susan Swan as the new adviser to his Department on speech therapy services; what are the terms of the appointment of his Department's existing advisers on occupational therapy and physiotherapy, respectively; and if he will make a statement about the reasons for any differences between the terms of Mrs. Swan's appointment and those of his Department's advisers on occupational therapy and physiotherapy;

(2) pursuant to his answer of 20 March, Official Report, column 503, how many days per year he expects Mrs. Susan Swan to devote to her duties as his Department's new adviser on speech therapy services; how this figure was determined; how it compares with the equivalent figures for his Department's advisers on occupational therapy and physiotherapy; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what representations he has received from the College of Speech Therapists regarding the terms of the appointment of Mrs. Susan Swan as his Department's new adviser on speech therapy services; and what response he has made;

(4) if he will appoint a full-time adviser to his Department on speech therapy services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The terms of appointment of Mrs. Susan Swan as adviser to the Secretary of State on speech therapy services are that she is to provide advice on > the effect of current policies on speech therapy services; the formulation of future policies relating to speech therapy services; other matters connected with speech therapy.

Within this she will advise on the planning, provision and development of speech therapy in the context of rehabilitation and education services, and on the work of speech therapists, and in service training of speech therapists.

The physiotherapy and occupational therapy officers are full-time established officers of our Department and each has at present a full-time temporary assistant. The difference between the need for established posts within the Department for physiotherapy and occupational therapy and that for an external adviser lies in the relatively smaller number of issues that arise in the content of speech therapy. On the basis of experience in the past two years, the Department needs to call on the advice of the speech therapy adviser to the extent of some two days per month. The position will be reviewed if our needs for advice increase.

We have received no representations from the College of Speech Therapists about Mrs. Swan's appointment.

Talking Newspaper Association for the Blind (Correspondence)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why there has been no reply to the letter sent to him on 20 November 1984 by Mr. Ted Davis, chairman of the Talking Newspaper Association for the Blind of the United Kingdom; when he intends to reply; if he will publish the exchange of correspondence in the Official Report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Mr. Davis's letter contained a request for funding under section 64 of the Health Service and Public Health Act 1968 as from July 1985. I regret that it has taken longer to consider than I would have wished. I hope to write to Mr. Davis shortly and will arrange for a copy to be sent both to the right hon. Member and to my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) who has also written to me about this matter.

Cervical Screening

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what system for the call and re-call of women who need or who have had cervical smears is operated by the Barking, Havering and Brentwood district health Authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply on 18 March to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) at column 635. We do not routinely collect information on local screening services, but the hon. Member may wish to approach Barking, Havering and Brentwood health authority for the details he requires.

DEFENCE

Cleaners (Dismissal)

Mr. Bidwell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received concerning the dismissal of Mrs. Molly Balkinson and other cleaners at the Ministry of Defence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: I received a letter from the Transport and General Workers Union on 21 March 1985. The question of Mrs. Balkinson's dismissal is the subject of proceedings before an industrial tribunal and it will not therefore be proper for me to make a statement about the case.

Obsolete Service Supplies (Disposal)

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many overseas contractors have received orders for the disposal of obsolete service supplies in each of the last three years; and if he will list the categories of the supplies concerned.

Mr. Butler: It is not the Department's practice to place orders with contractors for the disposal of obsolete service supplies. Stores for which there is no longer any requirement are normally disposed of by public auction or by competitive tender.

Intermedica Ltd.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department has any links or contracts with Intermedica Ltd.; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: Our searches have not revealed any Ministry of Defence contract or other link with Intermedica Ltd. whose name does not appear on the Register of Limited Companies. It would not however be possible without disproportionate effort to establish the position for contracts below £5,000 or placed locally by establishments. If the hon. Member is aware of any particular case perhaps he would write to me with any questions he may have about it.

British Military Nuclear Reactors

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the British military nuclear reactors at Calder Hall and Chapelcross are expected to become obsolete.

Mr. Butler: The reactor facilities at Calder Hall and Chapelcross, which are maintained to meet any defence requirements, are owned and operated by British Nuclear Fuels plc. BNF plc intends to operate the reactors as long as economies and safety requirements allow, and advises that such operation is likely to continue at least well into the next decade.

American Special Commission on Binaries

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he intends to meet members of the American special commission on binaries while they are in London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: No. At their request members of the United States Presidential Review Commission did, however, pay a call on senior United Kingdom officials in London in the course of a visit to Europe last week.

Crown Proceedings Act

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many certificates have been issued under section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act each year since 1955, broken down according to whether issued under section 10(3)(a) or section 10(3)(b).

Mr. Lee: Records are not maintained in such a way as to enable the information requested to be provided.

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will seek to amend the Crown Proceedings Act, section 10, to ensure that immunity from liability applies only in the event of declaration of war or declaration of state of emergency.

Mr. Lee: It would be inappropriate to take any action, legislative or otherwise, with regard to the operation and effects of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947 until the current review of that section is completed.

Armed Forces (Travel Discounts)

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether discounts for travel by British Rail are to be withdrawn from members of the armed forces.

Mr. Lee: It is assumed that the discounts to which reference is made are those available to service personnel and their dependants under the forces railcard scheme. This scheme is a concession given by British Rail which is comparable to the discounted schemes available to pensioners, students and other groups within the community. The British Railways Board, which is responsible for the scheme, will no doubt be able to provide full details of the scheme and changes which are planned. However, I understand that a railcard offering discounted travel will continue to be available to members of the armed forces.

United Scientific Holdings (Contract)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will make a statement on the contract with United Scientific Holdings for the supply of gun pods for Phantom fighter aircraft;

(2) what was the cost of the repair work to the Phantom aircraft cannon pods bought from United Scientific Holdings; and who is to pay for the repair work.

Mr. Butler: No. I do not wish to prejudice the outcome of current contractual negotiations with the company by making any statement on the details of this case.

Honduras

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether any British defence manufacturer has been granted permission to export gun systems to the Honduras Government;

(2) whether any British company was involved in any military contracts with the Honduras Government in 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: It has been the consistent policy of this and previous Administrations not to disclose details of defence sales business with other countries. However, it has always been, and will remain the Government's policy to exercise strict control over the sale of arms and all such business is considered carefully on its merits on a case by case basis.

Military Bases (Maintenance)

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence who pays for the repairs and maintenance of buildings and runways on bases where facilities are shared with United States' forces.

Mr. Lee: Arrangements between the Governments of the United States and the United Kingdom concerning the burden—sharing of the support for United States forces in this country are confidential.

Nuclear Devices

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any information about tests of any triggering devices, similar to those referred to in the paper relating to consideration of trials of an atomic device near Wick, a copy of which he has placed in the Library, in the United Kingdom subsequent to 1954; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, referring to the documents on the testing of initiators placed by his Department in the Library on 26 March, he will make a statement as to (a) what an initiator is, (b) what its function is and (c) what nuclear radiation is produced.

Mr. Butler: I refer the hon. Members to the answer which the Prime Minister gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes).

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether there has been any subsequent revision in the light of experience of any of the figures for the area of contamination both ground and air from those stated in the documents concerning initiator testing recently placed in the Library, in particular the prognostications contained in paragraphs three, four, five and six of the paper on initiator trials September 1954 Wick or Australia dated 5 January 1954.

Mr. Butler: No.

Directorate General of the Defence Accounts (Efficiency Audit)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will provide details of the financial and manpower savings projected by the first phase in the efficiency audit of the Directorate General of the Defence Accounts conducted by Coopers and Lybrand.

Mr. Butler: In their report on phase I of the efficiency audit Coopers and Lybrand Associates offered the view that there are further major efficiency gains which could be made by reviewing and changing some of the present computer and clerical systems. No specific financial or manpower savings were projected.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will modify the terms of reference given to Coopers and Lybrand for phase two of the efficiency audit of the Directorate General of the Defence Accounts to exclude the civilian pay and records office in Portsmouth.

Mr. Butler: No.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence why the Department of Environment pay accounts processed by the Directorate General of the Defence Accounts are not included in the Coopers and Lybrand audit of the Directorate General of Defence Audits.

Mr. Butler: The processing by DGDA of Department of Environment industrial pay accounts was covered by the Coopers and Lybrand audit.

Civil Servants (Pay)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence if it is his policy that the payment of civil servants employed in sensitive areas, such as those in contact with members of the Royal Family, Members of Parliament, and so on, will continue to be processed by civil servants.

Mr. Butler: There are no plans to change the present pay processing arrangements.

Civilian Pay and Record Office, Portsmouth

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the estimated operational life of the new computer facility installed at the civilian pay and record office in Portsmouth; and at what cost this facility is to be installed.

Mr. Butler: The normal estimated operational life for a computer facility of the type to be installed at CPRO Portsmouth is 10 years, though it has often proved economic to replace equipment sooner. The cost of the new computer facility will be just over £1 million.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions have taken place between his Department and other organisations concerning proposals to offer for tender to private contractors work currently undertaken by the civilian pay and records office Portsmouth.

Mr. Butler: None. There are no proposals to offer for tender to private contractors work currently undertaken by the CPRO Portsmouth.

Western Isles (Air Traffic)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that the arrangements for the separation of military and civil air traffic over the Western Isles will be adequate to cope with the increased levels of military air traffic in this area as a result of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation redevelopment of Stornoway airport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Flying activities at Stornoway will continue to be conducted in accordance with existing regulations which govern the operation of civil and military aircraft at Stornoway and all other similar airfields in the United Kingdom. The regulations have been developed over many years and take account of all relevant factors. They are considered to be adequate to maintain the separation of military and civil air traffic over the Western Isles.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the proportion of low level military flights in United Kingdom airspace which included overflight of the Western Isles, giving figures for each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Lee: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what changes have been made to air traffic control and safety procedures, particularly those designed to ensure safe separation of civil from military air traffic, over the Western Isles following the incorporation of that area into the United Kingdom military low flying system in 1979.

Mr. Lee: None.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence which of the air misses between civil and military aircraft recorded over the Western Isles in 1973, 1974, 1976, 1980 and 1982 occurred at heights less than 2,000 ft above ground level.

Mr. Lee: Those which occurred in 1976, 1980 and 1982.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what changes have been made to the requirements for military aircraft to report their position in the airspace over and adjacent to the Western Isles as a result of the air misses occurring in 1973, 1974, 1976, 1980 and 1982.

Mr. Lee: None.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what changes have been made to the requirements for military aircraft to report their position in the vicinity of Stornoway airport as a result of the air misses occurring in 1973, 1974 and 1976.

Mr. Lee: None.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what changes have been made to air traffic control and safety procedures in the air space over and adjacent to the Western Isles as a result of the air misses occurring in 1973, 1974, 1976, 1980 and 1982.

Mr. Lee: None.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what changes have been made to air traffic control and air safety procedures in the vicinity of Stornoway airport as a result of air misses occurring in 1973, 1974 and 1976.

Mr. Lee: None.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list his powers to prevent air traffic controllers at civil airports from inviting, or allowing, military aircraft flying in the vicinity of those airports, to perform low passes and approaches for the benefit of aircraft enthusiasts on the ground.

Mr. Lee: The Secretary of State for Defence holds no powers of control over civilian air traffic controllers who are responsible for air traffic movements in the vicinity of civil airports.

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many practice approaches and practice diversions by military aircraft have been carried out at Stornoway airport in each year since, and including, 1978; and if he will provide a monthly breakdown of the figures.

Mr. Lee: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him on 12 December 1984, at column 504.

WALES

Equal Opportunities Officer

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will now appoint a departmental equal opportunities officer with responsibility for co-ordinating the Civil Service policy of non-discrimination within his Department.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I refer the hon. and learned Gentleman to the reply given to him on 14 May 1984 by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, at column 46.

Milk Quotas

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many farmers in Wales and in Dyfed have now decided to abandon their application for monetary compensation under the outgoers scheme; and how many litres of quota this has made available for redistribution through the secondary quota;

(2) how many farmers in each of the counties in Wales have decided against accepting the terms offered to them by the milk outgoers scheme after having indicated their unequivocal interest in withdrawing from milk production with its financial settlement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The following table gives the fullest breakdown available and shows the position as at 22 March 1985:

Divisional Office	Original application (closing date 28 August 1984)		Withdrawals/Rejections
	Number	Quota (million litres)	Number	Quota (million litres)
Carmarthen (Dyfed)	328	44·4	203	23·8
Caernarfon (Gwynedd)	111	10·2	66	6·3
Cardiff (Gwent, Mid-Glamorgan, South Glamorgan and West Glamorgan)	90	20·9	48	8·4
Llandrindod Wells (Powys)	56	6·5	29	3·3
Ruthin (Clwyd)	116	20·0	64	8·9
WALES	701	102·0	410	50·7

It is not possible to make a meaningful distinction between withdrawals and rejections, as some farmers will have given effect to their decision to withdraw by failing to respond to their firm offers in the time allowed.

No additional quota is made available as a result of these withdrawals and rejections.

Meat Consumption

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he proposes taking to halt the decline in beef, lamb and pork consumption in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: A number of initiatives are already under way to improve the marketing and consumption of meat, particularly of leaner cuts. Given the importance of the livestock sector in Wales, I naturally take every opportunity to encourage and support these developments.

Public Expenditure Plan

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Wales why a public expenditure plan for Wales is not published similar to the" Commentary on the Scotland Programme".

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Extensive information concerning expenditure within my responsibility is provided by the Wales chapter of the annual White Paper on public expenditure and by the various publications listed at the end of that chapter. I do not believe that there is a need for a further publication.

Rates

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Hooson), Official Report, 14 January, column 26, if he will publish in the Official Report a list of the rate increases for all the county councils in Wales for 1985-86.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information is as follows:

County council	Average poundage 1984-85	Average poundage 1985-86	Percentage change
Clwyd	162·00	172·00	6·17
Dyfed	142·67	170·62	19·59
Gwent	141·00	146·00	3·55
Gwynedd	145·00	150·00	3·45
Mid Glamorgan	180·4	187·5	3·93
Powys	134·00	154·00	14·93

Rose Row, Cwmbach

Mr. Hubbard-Miles asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he has concluded a settlement with the Cynon Valley borough council in respect of his Department's financial responsibility arising from the development of Rose row, Cwmbach, Aberdare in 1965.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Last week, £400,892 was paid by the Department to the council in full and final settlement of the council's claim.

ENERGY

Nuclear Power Industry

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy what public funds, measured at constant prices, have gone into the United Kingdom fast breeder nuclear power programme in each of the past 10 years; and when he expects to receive an economic return on this investment.

Mr. Goodlad: Government expenditure on fast reactor research and development over the past 10 years has been (at 1984-85 prices):

Year	£ million
1975-76	*155·3
1976-77	*145·9
1977-78	152·4
1978-79	166·0
1979-80	134·7
1980-81	132·4
1981-82	125·7
1982-83	116·1
1983-84	125·6
†1984-85	104·3

* In these years, expenditure on reactor safety was included within a separate aggregated category. It is estimated that some £9-13 million (1984-85 prices) per annum was spent on fast reactor safety in this period.
† Estimated.

In addition, the CEGB and BNFL have spent relatively small sums on fast reactor work, mainly within their own organisations.

The Government's policy on the fast reactor research programme was set out in my right hon. Friend's replies of 29 November 1982 to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Ancram), at columns 2-3, and of 16 January 1984 to the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry), at columns 47-48.

The time scale on which fast reactors will become economically competitive with thermal nuclear reactors depends on a number of factors. These include:

(i) the future cost of thermal nuclear generation (which depends in part on longer term trends in the price of uranium); and

(ii) the extent to which the European collaborative research and development programme leads to reductions in the capital and fuel cycle costs of the fast reactor.

Electricity (Standing Charges)

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he is considering any new measures to assist small domestic consumers of electricity to meet the cost of standing charges, following the decision of the London electricity board to discontinue the standing charge rebate scheme introduced in 1983.

Mr. Goodlad: I understand that the electricity supply industry is considering how deserving consumers affected by the abolition of the rebate scheme could be assisted.

Departmental Legislation

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many Acts of Parliament have been promoted and how many statutory instruments made by his Department, or predecessor Departments covering his areas of responsibility, in each of the last 20 years.

Mr. Peter Walker: Her Majesty's Stationery Office publishes annually "Lists of Statutory Instruments" and "Tables and Indices to Public and General Acts and General Synod Measures". Both of these are currently up to date to the end of 1983.

The number of Acts promoted by the Department of Energy, and statutory instruments made, during each year from the creation of the Department in January 1974 to the end of 1984 is as follows:

	Acts	SIs
1974	—	35
1975	2	44
1976	3	76
1977	2	73
1978	1	24
1979	—	29
1980	2	45
1981	4	37
1982	2	51
1983	3	107
1984	—	186
	19	707

Given the changes to the machinery of Government over the last 20 years, apportionment of the Acts or statutory instruments — including some of those in the above list — to the areas of present ministerial responsibility could be done only at disproportionate cost.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether any information relating to striking miners was passed from the police to the National Coal Board.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. and learned Friend is making inquiries of the chief constables concerned in England and Wales, and I shall reply as soon as possible.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Veterinary Services (Advertising)

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action he intends to take on the recommendations in the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report on the "Supply of Veterinary Services in Relation to Restrictions on Advertising"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: Following discussions which I and the Director General of Fair Trading have had with the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons, the college is to issue a code of advertising practice to provide guidance to its members with regard to their general right to advertise and the ways in which they may advertise. The code will come into effect on 1 June 1985.

In its report published in 1976 the Monopolies and Mergers Commission found that restrictions in the college's guide to professional conduct prohibited individual veterinary practices from engaging in any form of advertising, promotion or publicity except for a bare minimum that the profession regarded as being essential for keeping the public informed of the existence and location of practices or as being desirable in the interests of the profession as a whole. The commission concluded that these restrictions operated against the public interest, and it considered that they should be terminated and replaced by a rule that would permit veterinary practices to use such methods of publicity as they thought fit subject to certain constraints in respect of claims of superiority, inaccuracies, claims to specialisation, and professional propriety.

The college's code of advertising practice, together with consequential amendments to the guide to professional practice, represents a significant relaxation of the rules governing advertising by vets. I welcome this. In certain respects, notably the continuing prohibition of fee advertising and direct mailing, the new rules are more restrictive than the commission's report considered necessary to protect the interests of either clients or patients; and I should have preferred the code to follow more closely the commission's recommendations in these respects. But I note that the college's advisory committee constantly reviews the college's position in ethical matters, and I hope that the college will keep under review the scope and operation of its rules on advertising, and in the light of experience of its operation consider the scope for further relaxation. I have asked the Director General of Fair Trading, as part of his responsibilities for keeping competition in the economy under review, to review the operation of the code in consultation with the college, and to report to me in two years' time.

Animal Waste (Report)

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the "Supply of Animal Waste in Great Britain" is to be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: The report is published today. The commission found that a monopoly situation existed in that about 44 per cent. of animal waste was supplied to the Prosper de Mulder Group. It also found that implementation of the company's pricing policy for purchases of animal waste was against the public interest. This included both prices paid by the company to abattoirs for waste material for rendering and also prices paid to the abattoirs for contracts to operate their gut-rooms, where abdominal material is recovered and sorted. The commission found that in both cases, when faced with loss of supplies, Prosper de Mulder attempted to secure or recover them by a price campaign, aimed mainly at particular competitors, regardless of whether the prices paid or offered would involve it in losses (which might be met through cross-subsidation). The particular effect adverse to the public interest was that this was likely to restrict competition in rendering or in gut-room operation.

The commission found no current cases of such pricing for material for rendering, but drew attention to the fact that any future examples of predatory pricing in this field could be investigated under the Competition Act 1980. Regarding gut-room contracts there was a current problem and the commission therefore recommended that Prosper de Mulder should give an undertaking that it would not offer for or enter into gut-room contracts without having first established a reasonable expectation that the operation of any particular gut-room, taken on its own, would be carried on at a profit. There should be no cross-subsidisation between gut-room business and other parts of the company's business or between any individual gut-room operations.

The commission also considered allegations that Prosper de Mulder might be refusing to collect an abattoir's low grade material unless it was also offered the high grade material. The commission found no specific cases of this conditional buying and they accepted an assurance from Prosper de Mulder that it never had, nor ever would follow, this practice.

Finally, the commission made two further suggestions for action to maintain competition in the industry. First, it pointed out that further acquisitions of renderers on waste collectors by Prosper de Mulder could be referred for investigation under the merger provisions of the Fair Trading Act, and suggested that this be considered. Secondly, it considered that the tendency of local authorities to seek stricter enforcement of anti-pollution measures might cause problems for existing renderers and possible new entrants to the market. It recognised the need for the public to be protected by such measures and had no wish to suggest any relaxation of steps to enforce them; but it expressed interest in a suggestion made to it that a system of voluntary arbitration might be set up under which a member of the Institute of Environmental Health Officers and a member of the United Kingdom Renderers Associations would visit plants with odour problems and suggest remedies.

I accept the findings of this report. I am asking the Director General of Fair Trading to open discussions with Prosper de Mulder Ltd. with a view to securing an appropriate undertaking regarding gut-room contracts. I am also asking the Director General to seek assurances from the company that it will not pursue a policy of conditional buying and that it will notify the Director General in advance of any proposal to acquire any other rendering business.

I have asked my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to consider the commission's suggestion regarding environmental health controls.

British Aerospace plc

Mr. Wilkinson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the proposed sale of the Government shareholding in British Aerospace plc.

Mr. Pattie: A preliminary prospectus for the joint offer of shares by the Government and the company was issued today.

The preliminary prospectus is a draft, subject to completion and amendment, of the final prospectus for the offer. The offer will be for a total of some 146·9 million ordinary shares, of which 96,852,746 will be offered for sale by the Government (representing the whole of the Government's residual ordinary shareholding in the company) and 50 million will be new shares issued by the company.

The company has given notice of an extraordinary general meeting, convened for 29 April 1985, to seek shareholders' approval of certain matters necessary for the offer to proceed. These include the creation of a special share, to be held by the Secretary of State. The consent of the special shareholder will be required for any change to specified provisions of the company's articles of association, including those dealing with United Kingdom control. Some detailed amendments to those provisions are also being proposed.

Subject to market conditions the offer is intended to take place in early May.

Rural Development Areas (Aid)

57. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will seek to secure that rural development areas determined by the Development Commission become eligible for European regional aid.

Mr. Trippier: The areas eligible for aid from the European regional development fund have already been extended as far as possible. Some rural development areas, determined by the Development Commission, are eligible where they are also in an assisted area.

Trade Statistics

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the volume figures given in special table B of the "United Nations Monthly Bulletin of Statistics" for the volume of exports of manufactures from the United Kingdom are statistically consistent with those given in table B7 of the "Monthly Review of External Trade Statistics"; and if he will account for differences in the actual numbers.

Mr. Channon: In principle the two series are identical apart from the deflator used, which in the UN source is a unit value index and in the United Kingdom source is an average value index. In practice the effect of this is small; most of the difference between the series is due to revisions to export figures which the UN have not incorporated.

Imports and Exports

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the value of (a) imports and (b) exports of the following commodities in 1980 and 1984 at current prices: (i) cereals, (ii) all agricultural products, (iii) motor vehicles, (iv) coal, (v) steel and (vi) electrical goods; and if he will show the net increase or decrease since 1980 in money and percentage terms.

Mr. Channon: The information is as follows:

Value £ million

	(a): UK imports (cif)				(b): UK exports (fob)
	1980 Imports	1984 Imports*	Change £ million	Change Percentage	1980 Exports	1984 Exports*	Change £ million	Change Percentage

South Africa

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to the number of British trade missions which visited South Africa in each year from 1979; how many such missions received a grant from his Department; what was the average grant per mission in each year; and what was the total cost to his Department in each year.

Mr. Channon: The Department does not keep records of trade missions to South Africa outside the BOTB scheme.

Details of missions which received BOTB financial support for the years specified are as follows:

Year	Number of missions	Annual value of BOTB subvention (£)
1979	13	60,375
1980	11	57,960
1981	15	113,645
1982	14	92,325
1983	14	127,680
1984	14	127,200
1985 (1st quarter)	4	36,480

The grant to each mission member for the period until 31 March 1981 was £345; from 1 April 1981 to 31 October 1982, £415; from 1 November 1982 to date, £480.

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many export credit guarantees for exports to South Africa were granted in each of the years from 1979; and what was the total value of such guarantees for each year.

Mr. Channon: As a large part of the Export Credits Guarantee Department's business is conducted under comprehensive policies it is not possible to advise on the number of guarantees issued in each year.

It has been the policy of successive administrations not to discuss details of the Department's exposure on individual markets.

New Businesses

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his estimate of the average annual turnover of a new business in its first, second and fourth years respectively.

Mr. Trippier: Those traders which register for VAT provide turnover information but there are too many uncertainties for estimates to be made in the form requested; we have no knowledge of when a business starts to trade and many businesses never register for VAT. The problems were discussed in the article "Business starts and stops: analysis by turnover and sector of trade, UK 1980-83" (British Business 18 May 1984) copies of which were placed in the Library.

Job Creation

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what is his estimate of the average number of jobs created by a new business by the end of its first fourth and eighth years, respectively;

(2) what is his estimate of the number of jobs created on average by a small business per £1,000 turnover;

(3) what is his estimate of the number of jobs created on average by a high technology company in its first five years of operation.

Mr. Trippier: This information is not available. The VAT system, which is our source of information, does not collect employment details.

Small Businesses

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his Department's definition of a small business.

Mr. Trippier: There are no hard and fast rules about defining a small firm and different definitions can be appropriate for specific purposes. In manufacturing, we stick by and large to the definition of 200 employees or less and use a variety of thresholds, usually related to annual turnover, in the other sectors.

Our views were set out in some detail in the article "How Small is a Small Firm" (British Business 22 June 1984) copies of which were placed in the Library.

Textile Industry

Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his response to the report entitled "The Winding Down of Textiles", published by the board for social responsibility in the diocese of Manchester, a copy of which has been sent to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what evidence he has of investment by Governments of other member countries of the EEC in their domestic textile industries under schemes which have not received the approval of the European Commission in each of the years since 1975.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to his reply, 1 April 1985, c. 470]: Comprehensive information about the investment support given to particular companies in other member states is not available. Sectoral aid schemes for the textile and clothing industry have generally been brought into operation only after Commission approval. The only exception we know of is a scheme for reduced social charges in France which operated for a time without such approval.

The Commission has now, however, stated that sectoral aid schemes in the textile sector are in principle no longer acceptable and the Government intend to give the Commission their full support in ensuring that this policy is implemented.

National Girobank

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the financial objective for the National Girobank.

Mr. Pattie: The existing target expired on 3 April 1985. A new objective has been agreed with the Post Office Board to run for three years from 4 April 1985. During this period, the target will be for the National Girobank to make an annual average return, before interest on long-term loans from the Secretary of State, of 22 per cent. of mean net assets on the historical cost accounting convention.

Humberside (European Regional Development Fund)

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether any further tranches of European regional development fund non-quota funds are to be made available to Humberside; what sums will be allocated to Glanford and Scunthorpe from that source by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to his reply, 1 April 1985, c. 469]: There may be further ERDF non-quota aid for steel industry areas, but as yet there are no specific arrangements.

The European Commission has also published proposals for ERDF non-quota aid for areas where fisheries activities have declined, under which £7·4 million would be allocated to the United Kingdom in respect of Hull and Grimsby. However, it is not clear when these proposals will be considered by the Council.

It is not possible at this stage to say how much from either possible sources of aid would go to Glanford and Scunthorpe.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report the complete range of tourism services provided within the countries of the European Economic Community which attract value added tax together with the individual percentage rates currently being levied.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 14 March 1985, c. 209]: The table showing the percentage rates of value added tax applying to the main areas of tourist expenditure in EC member states contained an error. In Ireland, value added tax is charged at 10 per cent. on hotel rooms and not 23 per cent. as given. The corrected table is as follows:

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Canavan asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many miners are still awaiting trial as a result of incidents arising from the miners' strike; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: As at 22 March 1985, 247 persons had still to be dealt with by the courts in respect of offences arising out of the miners' strike.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Immigration

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many husbands of women who are British citizens were granted entry clearance to join their wives in the United Kingdom in each of the last five years for which records are available;

(2) how many husbands of women who have obtained indefinite leave to remain in the United Kingdom were granted entry clearance to join their wives in the United Kingdom in each of the last five years for which records are available.

Mr. Waddington: Information on the number of husbands in the Indian sub-continent granted entry clearance to the United Kingdom is given in table 8 of "Control of Immigration: Statistics, United Kingdom, 1983" (Cmnd. 9246) and in table 9 of the Home Office statistical bulletin "Control of Immigration: Statistics, Fourth Quarter and Year 1984" (Issue 5/85). Corresponding information for countries outside the Indian sub-continent is not available.

Information on husbands granted entry clearance in the Indian sub-continent since 1980 under the 1977 immigration rules is not available separately for husbands of women who are British citizens and who are not British citizens respectively. The requirements of the 1980 and 1983 rules specify that the wife must be a British citizen, and entry clearance is granted only very exceptionally to a husband where his wife is not a British citizen.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average length of time taken to process applications from the husbands of women who are British citizens who are seeking to obtain entry clearance to join their wives in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waddington: Information on waiting times is available only for the Indian sub-continent, where husbands and fiancés applying for entry clearance to the United Kingdom are put in the same queue as non-priority applicants for immediate settlement. The waiting times to first interview for applicants in this "main queue" are given in table 10 of the Home Office statistical bulletin "Control of Immigration: Statistics, Fourth Quarter and Year 1984" (Issue 5/85). Applications are decided at the first interview unless further inquiries need to be made or a refusal is followed by an appeal, in which case the time taken depends upon the particular circumstances of the application.

Tactical Aid Group (Manchester)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Greater Manchester about the role of his force's tactical aid group; and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The chief constable of Greater Manchester informs me that the role of his force's tactical aid group is to maintain a support team to give assistance to divisional and departmental commanders in a variety of policing operations. These include hijacks and hostage takings; the containment of armed and besieged criminals; searches and cordoning at the scene of bomb incidents and disasters; security of buildings and areas for VIP visits; the support of divisional officers at parades, demonstrations and football matches; assistance in major crime inquiries; escorts for high risk prisoners; and other specialist operations.

Dogs

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many court orders for the destruction or control of dogs have been issued in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: The available information, which may be incomplete, is as follows. Information for 1984 is not yet available.

Orders made under section 2 of the Dogs Act 1871 to destroy dogs England and Wales

	Number of orders made
1979	750
1980	790
1981	900
1982	520
1983	490

Departmental Legislation

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Acts of Parliament have been promoted and how many statutory instruments made by his Department, or predecessor Departments covering his areas of responsibility, in each of the last 20 years.

Mr. Brittan: The information, not all of which relates to current areas of responsibility, is as follows:

*Acts of Parliament		Statutory Instruments
Session	Number	Calendar year	Number
1983-84	5	1984	154

Metropolitan Police (Complaints)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give details of the arrangements which allow officers of the Metropolitan police with misgivings about their duties, complaints about their superior officers or information about malpractice, to put their case direct to the commissoner; how many such requests have been granted and how many refused; and where an appeal lies in the event of a refusal.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Metropolitan police general orders provide that any officer may make written representation to, or request an interview with, any senior officer, including the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis. Requests to see the commissioner must be made in writing and should give—in confidence if the officer so wishes—a brief statement of the reason. I understand that a request for an interview would almost always be granted, but the commissioner would normally ask another senior officer to conduct it on his behalf.

No records are kept of the number of requests made or their outcome.

Football Matches (Policing Costs)

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost of policing football matches in England and Wales for each of the last three years.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information is not collated centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Licensing Laws

Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how soon after the key findings of the report by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys on attitudes to the licensing laws in Scotland are available to Her Majesty's Government in June he intends to publish his recommendations regarding the future of the licensing laws in England and Wales.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend will want to consider carefully both the preliminary key findings of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys' report and the subsequent full report before deciding whether relaxations in the permitted opening hours of licensed premises in England and Wales should be introduced. He is fully aware of the extent of public interest in this matter, and will wish to make a statement as soon as possible.

Swansea Prison (Suicides)

Mr. Williams asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many suicides and attempted suicides have occurred in Swansea prison in the last two years; how this record compares with that of other prisons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Verdicts of suicide have been returned on 21 prisoners who died in 1983 and 23 prisoners who died in 1984: one of the deaths in 1984 occurred at Swansea. There were also 221 incidents of self-injury with apparent suicidal intent in 1983, of which eight were at Swansea; later figures are not available. Fifteen deaths of prisoners in 1984 and 1985 are still subject to inquests: we are provisionally taking the view that one case at Swansea in 1984 and another in 1985 were cases of suicide.

Prisoners (Statistics)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total number of prisoners currently serving more than five years for offences of violence and drug trafficking.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 2 April, c. 565]: It is estimated from central records that on 31 January 1985 between 2,000 and 2,500 persons in prison department establishments in England and Wales were serving sentences of more than five years for offences of violence or drug trafficking within the scope of the parole policy announced on 30 November 1983, that is, as defined under section 32 and schedule 1 of the Criminal Justice Act 1982.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Departmental Achievements

Mr. Pawsey asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list his Department's principal achievements since 1979.

Mr. Jopling: Further to the answers given to my hon. Friends the Members for Welwyn, Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) on 17 May 1984, and for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) on 31 October 1984, my Department has been responsible for, or played its part in, the following achievements.

At the Dublin summit in December 1984 the Community adopted a text on budgetary discipline based on the agreement reached at Fontainebleau in June. This included a financial guideline for agriculture specifying that net expenditure on agricultural markets should, from 1986, grow less fast than the rate of growth of own resources of the Community.

The Council in February 1985 agreed wide-ranging measures to reform the Community's wine regime, by introducing a guarantee threshold to curb surplus production, by encouraging winegrowers to grub up vineyards, and by a restrictive price policy for as long as the surplus remained.

The Community reached agreement earlier this month on a new agricultural structures regulation which will govern member states' farm investment programmes. The text as finally adopted clearly reflects our concern to continue to exclude wasteful and discriminatory items, to control grant-aid to capital expenditure which may add to surplus products and to ensure that agricultural development takes account of environmental needs. In particular, the Council accepted our proposal that member states should be authorised to designate environmentally sensitive areas in which farmers may be offered incentives to maintain valuable landscapes and wildlife habitats.

In Febuary 1985 we successfully obtained agreement in the Council of Ministers on additional measures to simplify the application of the milk supplementary levy arrangements, including a provision to prevent them from operating as an artificial constraint on those dairy producers with mixed businesses selling milk to the milk marketing boards and also marketing their own milk directly for consumption.

Statutory control over the price of liquid milk in England, Wales and Northern Ireland ended on 31 December 1984, a year ahead of our target date. Controls had already ended in Scotland.

I have brought forward the Food and Environment Protection Bill, which will provide for greater protection of the public and the environment in three main areas. First, it will provide statutory backing for measures intended to protect the public from food affected by incidents involving a release of harmful substances. Secondly, it will provide for improved controls over the dumping of wastes at sea. Thirdly, it will introduce statutory controls on the supply and use of pesticides with a view to achieving a higher level of safety for health and the environment.

We have continued to advise and encourage farmers to take reasonable measures to ensure that farm practices do not result in pollution. This has recently been strengthened by the publication of a code of good agricultural practice, which provides advice to farmers on ways to minimise the risk of pollution of water from the use of fertilisers, manures, farm waste, silage and pesticides.

The Environment Co-ordination Unit established in July 1984 continues to strengthen links within the Ministry to ensure a closely integrated approach to environmental issues.

The higher rates of grants for hedges, shelter belts and traditional walls are now payable in the lowlands as well as in the less favoured areas. We are also providing half the cost of an experimental grazing scheme designed to help safeguard the unique landscape of the Broads.

We have recently announced proposals in response to the recommendations of the report of a panel of the Committee on Medical Aspects on Food Policy on diet and cardiovascular disease published last year. Details were given in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, West (Sir P. Mills) on 12 March 1985. Draft guidelines for voluntary full nutrition labelling of foods were issued for comment on 27 March.

My Department has participated actively in efforts to increase exports of food and agricultural products and of associated inputs and technology.

Between May 1979 and February this year the average annual rate of increase in the food prices index has been 7·0 per cent. This is again below the increase for all items in the retail price, index of 9·3 per cent. The current annual rate of increase in the Food Price Index is 3·5 per cent.

In January 1985 hill livestock compensatory allowances were introduced, at rates of £22·25 per eligible cow and £2·12 per eligible ewe, in the United Kingdom's "disadvantaged" areas (that is those marginal land areas which were given less favoured area status for the first time in February 1984).

On 1 January 1985 the Community became a member of the International Sugar Agreement 1984.

We have enacted legislation to give effect to revised support arrangements for potatoes, which should reduce the call on public funds in the longer term.

We have continued to protect farmers and growers from the introduction of non-established plant pests and diseases into the United Kingdom.

We have issued a Green Paper reviewing the long-standing arrangements for financing administration of land drainage, flood prevention and coast protection and proposing changes.

Together with DoE we have issued notes of guidance to drainage authorities regarding their environmental and conservation responsibilities under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 and are now undertaking a strengthening of those Guidelines.

In the field of animal welfare we have pressed for the introduction of Community standards for laying hens in battery cages and have continued to support the work of the standing committee of the European convention on farm animal welfare.

At the beginning of this year we introduced new, permanent arrangements for the sale of certain veterinary drugs to farmers through agricultural merchants. These arrangements will safeguard the farmers' traditional source of supply whilst improving the standards of distribution and service for these products.

In 1983 we began a complete overhaul of the legislation controlling animal breeding. New powers were taken in the Animal Health and Welfare Act 1984 and within the last two months proposals for revised controls over the animal health and livestock quality aspects of the artificial insemination of cattle have been issued for comment.

We concluded the first full year of the effective operation of the revised common fisheries policy by reaching agreement in December last on a complete package of total allowable catches and quotas for 1985, involving significant increases in the fishing opportunities available to our industry, particularly in the North sea.

Community log books and landing declarations, for which we have been pressing for some time, have now been issued throughout the Community and will be in force from 1 April.

To assist the control of fish and shellfish diseases, we have brought into operation the Diseases of Fish Act 1983.

We were the first member state to implement the Community fisheries structures package through the Fishing Vessels (Financial Assistance) Scheme 1983 which provides grants for the decommissioning and laying-up of vessels, exploratory voyages and joint ventures — together with aids for building and modernising vessels. These measures, which came into effect on 1 January 1984, will enable the fleet to adapt to the available fishing opportunities.

Together with the Departments of the Environment and of Transport my officials played a full and constructive part in the North sea conference on marine pollution held in Bremen in the autumn of 1984. At the conference the validity of the United Kingdom's science-based approach to environmental protection was acknowledged with the result that sea dumping will continue to be available for disposal of certain categories of waste under strict safeguards.

My Department's fisheries research effort has been rationalised. In particular, increased resources have been allocated to the protection of the aquatic environment duties which include the commissioning of a new research vessel. At the same time, and even greater commercial orientation has been given to the work of the Torry research station.

All of these policies have been carried out while achieving a further reduction in Ministry staff.

Departmental Legislation

Mr. Galley asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many Acts of Parliament have been promoted and how many Statutory Instruments made by his Department, or predecessor Departments covering his areas of responsibility, in each of the last 20 years.

Mr. Jopling: The number of Acts of Parliament promoted by my Department in each of the last 20 years* is as follows:

Year	Acts

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Forth asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he envisages any increase in the budgetary commitment of the common agricultural policy in the event of the accession of Spain and Portugal to the European Economic Community.

Mr. Jopling: Provision for agricultural expenditure arising from the accession of Spain and Portugal to the European Economic Community will be made in the Community budget for 1986.

Imported Foodstuffs (Levy)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, further to his answer of 4 March, Official Report, column 393, concerning the formula used for calculating the levy on imported foodstuffs, whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the levy chargeable at the current time for all the common agricultural policy foodstuffs together with the monetary compensation amounts, the threshold prices and the world price.

Mrs. Fenner: The information requested is set out for the main commodities in the table.

The import levies are shown after deduction of the monetary compensatory amount (MCA) and adjustment by the monetary coefficient: the MCA that has been deducted is shown separtely. The "world" prices shown are generally the lowest offer prices at the Community frontier which underlie the Commission's calculation of the variable import levies. I would remind the hon. Member that these are the lowest prices recorded and it is likely that, on average, higher prices would have to be paid if larger quantities were to be purchased on world markets.

Levy and Monetary Compensatory Amount Applicable in the United Kingdom, Threshold Price and Notional "World" Price on 27 March 1985 for the Main Food Items covered by the Common Agricultural Policy

Poultrymeat	135	−2	874	754
Eggs	148	−3	788	653

Notes

N/A=not applicable.

All figures have been rounded to the nearest £.

* The rates of levy vary for different tariff headings. The rates quoted are: beef and veal—carcase; pigmeat—carcase; poultrymeat—70 per cent. chickens; rice—wholly milled long grain; olive oil—virgin lampante; eggs-in shell. Levies are shown after deduction of the monetary compensatory amount where applicable.

† For commodities for which there is no threshold price the following have been taken: beef and veal—guide price converted to deadweight (using a killing-out percentage of 53·8 per cent.; pigmeat and sheepmeat—Basic price; poultrymeat and eggs—sluicegate prices and plus basic levy converted at the green rate of exchange.

‡ Notional "world" prices have been calculated by subtracting the levy applicable on 27 March from the "threshold" price. The beef price is also adjusted for duty. In the case of pigmeat, poultrymeat and eggs, the "world" price has been taken as the sluicegate price, less supplementary levy where appropriate. The resulting estimate has been converted from ECU/t at the appropriate market rate of exchange £0·632535=1 ECU.

‖ In practice the United Kingdom's imports from third countries are normally covered by the Lomé convention and enter the Community levy-free.

¶ A special lower rate of levy is applicable to imports of butter from New Zealand.

● Most imports of beef from third countries are subject to special arrangements allowing entry at reduced levy rates.

■ Imports of lamb under voluntary restraint arrangements with principle suppliers and related agreements are subject to a reduced charge of 10 per cent. ad valorem. Any imports outside these arrangements are subject to levies which cannot exceed the 20 per cent. tariff bound in the GATT.

Salmon

Sir Kenneth Lewis asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what consultations he has held concerning the report of the salmon sales group entitled, "Salmon Conservation—A New Approach"; and if he is now in a position to announce his decisions on the report's recommendations regarding the problems of salmon conservation.

Mr. MacGregor: As I said in reply to the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) on 6 March, we have been carrying out a very thorough review of the proposals for salmon tagging set out in the report "Salmon Conservation—A New Approach" and are still examining the problems highlighted by our examination. I shall make an announcement as soon as we have been able to reach a conclusion.

Agricultural Land

Mr. Steen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much agricultural land has been lost to alternative development since 1970.

Mrs. Fenner: I regret that no precise figures are available. However, it is estimated that, from 1970 to 1984, the total net loss of agricultural land in England and Wales was some 300,000 hectares. About half of this net loss was recorded as having been to alternative development.

Council of Agriculture Ministers

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Council of Agriculture Ministers' meeting in Luxembourg on 1 and 2 April; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: With my hon. Friend the Minister of State, I represented the United Kingdom at the Council of Agriculture ministers in Luxembourg on 1 and 2 April. The main subject of the Council was the Commission's price proposals for 1985-86.

It became evident that it would not be possible to reconcile the divergent views of member states on appropriate price levels and related issues at this Council. The Presidency undertook to explore with the Commission the scope for compromise and the Council decided to resume work on the morning of 22 April.

The Council also decided that the marketing years for milk products, beef, sheepmeat and dried fodder should be extended until 28 April.

Uneconomic Farms

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans the Government have to bring forward proposals to facilitate the closing down of uneconomic farms.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 2 April 1985, c. 526]: None. It is up to individual farmers to decide whether to remain in the industry.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Members' Travel Costs

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Lord Privy Seal what was the total cost of hon. Members' travel within the United Kingdom by air for the years 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. Biffen: The total costs of the hon. Members travel, by air, within the United Kingdom paid from the House of Commons Vote (Class 13.2) are as follows:

Year	£
1982-83	317,913
1983-84	310,033
1984-85*	413,035

*To date.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Lord Privy Seal what was the total cost of hon. Members' travel within the United Kingdom by rail for the years 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. Biffen: The total cost of the hon. Members' travel, by rail, within the United Kingdom paid from the House of Commons Vote (Class 13.2.) are as follows:

Year	£
1982-83	389,652
1983-84	447,205
1984-85*	458,840

* To date.

Standing Order No. 2

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal how many times Standing Order No. 2 has been invoked in each year since 1968; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: Before the adoption by the House of Standing Order No. 2 on 12 November 1968 a temporary order with similar effect (agreed to by the House on 12 December 1967) was used six times in 1968. The S.O. was then used on two further occasions that year. In 1969 the S.O. was used seven times. It has not been used since.

Palace of Westminster (Staff)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal how many people work in the Palace of Westminster; and if he will break this figure down into categories including secretaries and research assistants to Members of both Houses.

Mr. Biffen [pursuant to his reply, 2 April 1985, c. 562-3]: The number of Staff and Officers employed by the House of Lords' Departments is 263, and not 315 as stated in my earlier reply.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

School Meals

Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the results of the October 1984 census of school meals; and how they compare with 1983.

Mr. Dunn: The information is as follows:

Maintained Schools (including nursery and special): England

	October 1984		October 1983
	Numbers	As percentage of pupils in attendance	Numbers	As percentage of pupils in attendance
Pupils in attendance	6,613,026	—	6,770,975	—
Pupils taking school meals
On payment	2,243,548	33·9	2,406,955	35·5
Free	1,147,886	17·4	1,074,882	15·9
Total	3,391,434	51·3	3,481,837	51·4
Pupils bringing own food	1,940,682	29·3	1,909,718	28·2
Pupils having other arrangements	1,280,910	19·4	1,379,420	20·4

An analysis of the returns shows the following proportions for primary and secondary pupils, as percentages of pupils in attendance.

	Primary		Secondary		percentage
	1984	1983	1984	1983
Pupils taking school meals	53·4	54·2	48·2	47·8
Pupils bringing own food	35·7	34·4	23·2	22·5
Pupils having other arrangements	10·9	11·4	28·6	29·7

Detailed tabulations on the returns from local education authorities from which these national figures are taken are being placed in the Library.

Schools (Expenditure Statistics)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will provide in the Official Report a table showing the expenditure per head in state schools and service schools, respectively.

Mr. Dunn: In 1983-84 the average expenditure per pupil in maintained schools in England was £1,025; this figure comprises the recurrent expenditure of the schools, the cost of transport from home to school and school meals. In the same year the average cost of each child educated locally in schools run by the Services Children's Education Authority was £2,275. The two figures are not comparable for a number of reasons, including the boarding expenditure at SCEA schools.

Teachers (Pay)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the average annual increase in teachers' earnings as a result of incremental drift.

Sir Keith Joseph: Between April 1979 and April 1984 the average salary of teachers in maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools in England and Wales is estimated to have risen by 5·1 per cent. as a result of incremental drift. The annual average increase over the period on this account is therefore about 1 per cent.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science why the Burnham committee has not replaced its offer of a 4 per cent. pay incease with an offer of a flat rate amount per teacher.

Sir Keith Joseph: This is a question not for me but for the Burnham Primary and Secondary Committee.

Unborn Children (Protection) Bill

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what assessment Her Majesty's Government have made of the potential impact of the enactment of the Unborn Children (Protection) Bill on research on the detection of genetic defects by examining nucleic acid samples from early embryonic tissue; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The Unborn Children (Protection) Bill provides that the Secretary of State's authority for the possession and implantation of a human embryo shall be given only for the purpose of enabling a specified woman to bear a child, and not for any other purpose. It follows that research on the detection of genetic defects by examining nucleic acid samples from early human embryonic tissue would not be possible. I understand from the Medical Research Council that this would prevent further research and development work taking place on the technique known as embryonic biopsy, which might prove especially valuable in diagnosing serious genetic disorder in embryos fertilised in vitro, before possible implantation in the uterus, in the case of couples who are known carriers of a wide range of genetic diseases such as the thalassaemias, haemophilia, sickle-cell disease and Huntington's Chorea.

Teachers (Training)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to implement the decision to include an introduction to the teaching of children with special educational needs as part of basic teacher training as outlined in Cmnd. 9649.

Mr. Dunn: Criteria for the approval of initial teacher training courses issued in April 1984 include the requirement that students should be introduced to ways of identifying children with special educational needs, helped to appreciate what the ordinary school can and cannot do for such children, and given some knowledge of the specialist help available and how it can be enlisted. Over the next three to four years all initial teacher training courses will be reviewed against the criteria by the Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education, which will advise my right hon. Friend whether existing courses should continue to be approved, and whether proposals for new ones should receive approval. Accordingly, my right hon. Friend expects that those teacher training institutions which do not already include an introduction to the subject of special educational needs in their initial training will shortly take steps to do so.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many teachers have received in-service training to assist in the teaching of children with special educational needs since the Education Act 1981.

Mr. Dunn: The total numbers of teachers from maintained and independent schools attending full-time courses of 20 days or more—or the part-time equivalent — concerned solely with special educational needs which have been offered in higher education institutions over the last three years are as follows:

Academic year	Numbers of teachers (rounded)
1981-82	1,040
1982-83	1,360
1983-84	1,530

The figure for 1983-84 includes teachers released for training under the Government's in-service teacher training grants scheme which was introduced in April 1983. Grant has been paid in respect of some 370 teachers released to attend one-term courses concerned with special educational needs in ordinary schools during the period April 1983 to August 1984. These courses remain eligible for the purposes of the scheme in the current academic year 1984-85, and it is intended that they should continue to be so designated in 1985-86.

The Department does not collect statistics on attendance by teachers on in-service training courses of less than 20 days—or the part-time equivalent—or on any training mounted by bodies other than higher education institutions, including that offered by individual local education authorities through their advisory services and teachers' centres.

Pupils (Special Education Needs)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to be able to announce new advice on staffing requirements for pupils with special educational needs as outlined in Cmnd. 9649.

Mr. Dunn: A review of staffing standards for pupils with statements of special educational needs has begun. The results of the review will be published in due course.

Schools (Wheelchair Access)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is satisfied with the extent of wheelchair access to schools since the coming into force of the Education Act 1981; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: It is for individual local education authorities to decide what measures are necessary to fulfil their obligations under the Education Act 1981. Advice on the design and adaptation of buildings was issued last year in the Department's building bulletin 61 "Designing for Children with Special Educational Needs — Ordinary Schools." Specific guidance on access for disabled people to educational buildings, including wheelchair access, is given in design note 18, revised last year.

Homework

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to undertake the consultation on the subject of homework which was proposed in the White Paper, "Better Schools", Cmnd. 9469.

Sir Keith Joseph: I am today issuing a discussion paper on this subject. Copies have been placed in the Library.

Engineering and Technology (Graduates)

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will take steps to increase the output of graduates in engineering and technology; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph [pursuant to his reply, 19 March 1985, c. 482-84]: Proposals from universities to participate in the engineering and technology programme have been considered by the University Grants Committee, which has in turn consulted members of the Information Technology Skills Agency. I have now received and accepted the committee's advice about the institutions which should participate in the first phase of the programme. The participating institutions, the relevant departments and the proposed student intakes, are as follows:

Examination Results

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Department has reached its conclusions about possible methods of comparing examination results from different types of school system; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985, c. 298]: I am considering suggestions for further research into factors affecting pupil performance following my statement to the House on 15 November 1984 at columns 698-99. The Government's policies on examinations and assessment and monitoring were set out in chapters 3 and 13 of the Government's White Paper "Better Schools" (Cmnd. 9469).

PRIME MINISTER

MI5

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Prime Minister what salary will be payable to the person appointed as the new head of MI5.

The Prime Minister: It is not the practice to comment on questions relating to the staffing of the security service.

Civil Servants

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister what steps she takes to satisfy herself that misgivings reported by civil servants to their seniors in pursuance of the arrangements announced by her on 26 February, Official Report, column 130, are fully investigated.

The Prime Minister: Any matters which were reported to a senior civil servant, or about which a senior civil servant was consulted, under the arrangements described in the note of guidance by the head of the home civil service, would be taken very seriously, and anything that needed to be done, by way of investigation or otherwise, would be done.

Mr. Gerald Price

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Prime Minister what reply she is sending to Mr. Gerald Price, a blind person, who sought urgent help in a letter to her dated 26 March; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Although the Civil Aviation Authority has statutory responsibility for the regulation of sport parachuting, the authority looks to the British Parachute Association—a very responsible body with a great deal of practical experience—for the detailed day-to-day control of the sport. My office is writing to Mr. Price explaining that it would not be appropriate for me to intervene over the association's decision not to allow him to make a parachute jump.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Steen asked the Prime Minister what is the present percentage of unemployed in each of the 10 largest cities in the United Kingdom; and how many individuals this amounts to.

The Prime Minister: The following information is in the Library. Figures are given for travel-to-work areas, the smallest areas for which unemployment rates are calculated.

Total unemployment on 14 February 1985 in the travel-to-work areas corresponding to the 10 largest cities in the United Kingdom

	Total unemployment	Percentage rate

Civil Servants

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Prime Minister whether the statement of procedure to be followed when the reliability of a civil servant is thought to be in doubt on security grounds, and the terms of reference of the three advisers, have been revised; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: In the light of the Security Commission's report following its review of security procedures and practices in the public service (Cmnd. 8540) the terms of reference of the three advisers and the statement of procedure have been revised. I am arranging to have copies placed in the Library of the House.

SCOTLAND

Forestry Policy

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the main achievements of his Department with regard to forestry policy in England and Wales since 1979.

Mr. John Mackay: Considerable progress has been made towards achieving the forestry policy objectives for Great Britain as a whole announced by my right hon. Friend on 10 December 1980. The industry is now expanding on a sound base, with restored confidence in the private sector and improved efficiency in the Forestry Commission. The new forestry grant scheme has encouraged the private sector to take the lead in increasing the rate of new planting, while the Forestry Commission has carried through a major internal mangement reorganisation and begun the rationalisation of its forest estate through the programme of sales described by my right hon. Friend in his written reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord) on 8 November 1984 at columns 6-7.

Processing capacity has been expanded with the development of the newsprint outlet at Shotton, the expansion the Thames Board mill at Workington for carton-board production, the investments by Caberboard in medium-density fibre-board and particle-board at Cowie and Irvine and the plant for structural composition board planned by Highland Forest Products at Dalcross near Inverness.

In addition, the Forestry Commission is completing a review of policy toward broadleaved woodlands designed to encourage their positive and sympathetic management, about which my right hon. Friend expects to make a statement before the summer recess.

Equal Opportunities Officer

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will now appoint a departmental equal opportunities officer with responsibility for co-ordinating the Civil Service policy of non-discrimination within his Department.

Mr. Younger: An officer within the personnel division of my Department has been designated since January 1984 as equal opportunities officer with responsibility for co-ordinating policy and advising on the full scope of equal opportunity matters as they concern race and sex discrimination.

Edinburgh Western Relief Road

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it is his policy not to introduce the Confirmation Bill for the Act to confirm the Lothian Region (Edinburgh Western Relief Road) Provisional Order until the transcript of the evidence given at the recent parliamentary inquiry is available for consideration by honourable Members.

Mr. Ancram: In relation to the Lothian Region (Edinburgh Western Relief Road) Provisional Order, my right hon. Friend intends to follow the practice whereby a Confirmation Bill is not introduced until a transcript of the evidence is available to hon. Members.

Departmental Legislation

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many Acts of Parliament have been promoted and how many Statutory Instruments made by his Department, or predecessor Departments covering his areas of responsibility, in each of the last 20 years.

Mr. Younger: Her Majesty's Stationery Office publishes annually "Lists of Statutory Instruments" and "Tables and Indices to Public and General Acts and General Synod Measures." Both of these are currently up to date to the end of 1983.

Given the changes to the machinery of government over the last 20 years, apportionment of the Acts or statutory instruments to the areas of present ministerial responsibility could be done only at disproportionate cost.

Legal Aid

Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will make a statement about possible changes in the arrangements for legal aid in Scotland.

Mr. Younger: I intend to issue a consultation document tomorrow inviting views on a range of proposals for changes in the present system of legal aid in Scotland. I have arranged for copies of the consultation document to be placed in the Library of the House today.

NHS (Improvement and Refurbishment Expenditure)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what allocations he has made to health boards for expenditure on improvement and refurbishment of hospitals and other National Health Service buildings in 1985-86.

Mr. Younger: I have allocated £25 million to health boards from the capital programme to enable them to continue the work of improving the fabric of the existing NHS estate in 1985-86. This represents an increase of 22 per cent. over the sum allocated in 1984-85 and is in addition to the £36·5 million already allocated to health boards for their ordinary capital programme for 1985-86.

EMPLOYMENT

School Leavers

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many and what percentage of school leavers have been on youth training or youth opportunity schemes in each of the last five years in the Greater London area.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Information in the precise form requested is not available.

Table 1 shows the number of school leavers in the Greater London area in each year from 1978-79 to 1982-83 (the last five years for which figures are available).

Table 2 shows for the Greater London area the number of young people on the youth opportunities programme or youth training scheme in March of each year from 1980 to 1984. It should be noted, however, that trainees in a particular year will not necessarily have left school during the preceding academic year.

Table 1: Number of school leavers in the Greater London area 1978-79 to 1982-83

Year	Number (000s)
1978-79	92·5
1979-80	92·1
1980-81	88·2
1981-82	90·5
1982-83	91·4

Table 2: Number of young people in the Greater London area on YOP/YTS March 1980-March 1984

Year	Number (000s)
1980	1·6
1981	4·1
1982	6·5
1983	9·1
1984	18·5

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he has issued guidance to (a) the Manpower Services Commission, (b) the careers service, (c) jobcentres and (d) the managing agents forums following the Commission for Racial Equality's survey of the youth training schemes about the representation of young people of Asian and West Indian origin on mode A youth training schemes.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission has already issued guidance on equal opportunities to all those involved in the delivery of the youth training scheme. In the light of the Commission for Racial Equality's recent survey of the scheme, the Manpower Services Commission is currently revising the guidance given.

Public Sector Employees

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will compare the total number of persons employed in the entire public sector (a) in actual and (b) in full-time equivalent terms, where appropriate, for each of the years 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985; and if he will show these figures as a percentage of the total employed work force in each year.

Mr. Alan Clark: The latest available estimates are given in the table.

Public Sector Employment in the United Kingdom

June	Persons employed ('000)	As percentage of employed labour force	Full-time equivalents ('000)	As percentage of employed labour force
1979	7,417	29·3	6,555	31·8
1980	7,356	29·1	6,512	31·8
1981	7,154	29·4	6,363	32·5
1982	6,992	29·3	6,168	32·3
1983	6,904	29·3	6,071	32·5
1984	6,825	28·5	5,972	31·8

Earnings

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the number of persons in work who have net incomes per week of less than (a) £50, (b) £60, (c) £70, (d) £80, (e) £90, (f) £100, (g) £110, (h) £120.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The latest information on the distribution of the net incomes of employed persons relates to the family expenditure survey for 1982. The table shows the cumulative percentages of those in full time employment with net incomes (gross personal income less tax and national insurance) below various amounts:

60	15
70	25
80	37

Net incomes *below £	Percentage of persons
90	47
100	56
110	65
120	73

* Gross income attributable to the person, both from employment or from other sources, net of national insurance and tax. This will differ from household income to the extent that full-time employees within the household are counted as separate persons, income from part-time employment is not covered and some household income for example child benefit may be attributed to a household member not in full-time employment.

Source: Family Expenditure Survey 1982.

Later information on the distribution of gross income from employment is available from table 1 of New Earnings Survey 1984, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will publish a table showing the proportion of full-time employees in the Greater Manchester area who, in the New Earnings Survey 1984, are paid less than £105 a week and £110 a week, both when overtime earnings are excluded and included, for all males and females and sub-divided into manual and non-manual males and females.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The available information in addition to that already published is shown in the table.

Percentage of employees with average gross weekly earnings less than £110 in Greater Manchester in April 1984*

	Including overtime	Excluding overtime
Full time manual men	22·8	33·9
Full time non manual men	10·4	12·3
All Full time men	17·4	24·5
Full time manual women	82·3	85·6
Full time non manual women	50·0	51·0
All Full time women	59·1	60·8
All men and women	31·0	36·3

* On adult rates and whose earnings were not affected by Absence.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will publish figures showing the distribution of gross hourly earnings of part-time female employees in April 1984, for the Greater Manchester area, using the format adopted for various regions of Britain in table 175 of the New Earnings Survey 1984, together with his estimate of the total numbers of women employed part-time in the Greater Manchester region.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Figures covering the hourly earnings of all part-time employees are not available. The additional available information relating to Greater Manchester, having the same scope and coverage as table 175 of the 1984 New Earnings Survey report is as follows:

Part-time female employees on adult rates in Greater Manchester
Gross hourly earnings

Less than: pence	Percentage
140	3·1
160	6·4
180	17·3
200	46·2
220	57·0
240	68·5
260	77·2
280	82·2
300	85·7
360	91·4
400	93·9

Note: The New Earnings Survey covers a sample of employees who are members of pay-as-you-earn schemes and in general will not cover employees whose earnings are below the national insurance contribution level. The employees excluded would tend to be part-time employees whose hourly earnings will not necessarily be the same as those with higher weekly earnings covered in the survey.

The total number of part-time female employees in the Greater Manchester area is estimated to have been just under 190,000 in 1981.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish harmonised figures for January 1984 or the latest date available showing average earnings for (a) men, and (b) women in each of the member states of the European Community.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The latest harmonised figures on average earnings for all European Community member states relate to October 1982 and were published in "Hourly Earnings and Hours of Work — X, 1982" (Eurostat, 1983). The data for most countries were updated to April 1983 in "Earnings in Industry and Services" (Eurostat, 1984.) For the United Kingdom alone, the latest information on average earnings was published in the February 1985 issue of Employment Gazette. Copies of all of these publications are in the Library.

Community Programme and Youth Training

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment which regions of the United Kingdom will benefit from his proposal to extend the community programme providing 131,000 jobs for the long-term unemployed and to change the youth training scheme into a two-year programme for youngsters under the age of 18 years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: All regions of Great Britain will benefit from the expansion of the community programme and the youth training scheme.

My right hon. Friend has written to the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission and has asked him to proceed so that an additional 50,000 community programme places can be filled by December 1985. He has also asked the commission to make detailed recommendations for the implementation of the two-year youth training scheme.

Noise Surveys

Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many noise surveys have been undertaken by the Health and Safety Executive since the start of the campaign.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I shall write to the hon. Member later this year when I expect an evaluation of the Health and Safety Executive's noise enforcement initiative.

Wages Inspectorate

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) whether he will publish by region and sub-region, the latest breakdown of Wages Inspectorate staff, showing separately those who are outdoor inspectors, on an establishment and in post basis, and if he will also publish comparable figures for April 1979;

(2) whether he will publish for the years 1970, 1974 and 1978 onwards in respect of the north western (east) division of Wages Inspectorate (a) the number of wages council establishments registered, (b) the proportion of these inspected by visit, (c) the proportion of firms inspected by visit found to be underpaying, (d) the total arrears assessed and (e) the total arrears paid;

(3) whether he will publish estimates for 1984 on (a) establishments covered by wages councils, (b) numbers of inspections and underpayments, (c) numbers of workers covered, together with figures on underpayment and arrears assessed and (d) a regional breakdown of wages council inquiries, in the same format as that used in the reply given on 4 June 1984, Official Report, columns 103-4, together with a breakdown of arrears assessed and arrears actually paid by wages council and region; and whether he will also indicate the number and regional location of cases of underpayment where the employer was prosecuted, and where civil proceedings were taken to recover arrears of wages;

(4) whether he will publish for the north-west (east) division of the Wages Inspectorate a breakdown by wages council of (a) the number of firms inspected and number of workers whose pay was checked, showing those by visit and those by other method, (b) the number of firms found to be underpaying, (c) the number of workers underpaid, (d) the total arrears assessed and (e) the total arrears actually recovered, in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) how many applications were submitted for consideration in the pilot enterprise allowance scheme;

(2) how many applications were actually considered in the pilot enterprise allowance scheme;

(3) how many applications submitted for consideration in the pilot enterprise allowance scheme proved successful in their application.

Mr. Alan Clark: A total of 4,992 applications were submitted and considered for the pilot enterprise allowance scheme. Of these 3,379 were approved and 3,331 started on the scheme.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many businesses have received enterprise allowance from the inception of the scheme to the latest cut-off date.

Mr. Alan Clark: By 28 February 1985, 72,630 people had entered the enterprise allowance scheme since it was introduced on a pilot basis in early 1982. The actual number of businesses supported is slightly lower as some participants have set up in partnership with other recipients of the allowance; but exact figures are not available.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Football Hooliganism

Mr. Amess asked the Attorney-General how many prosecutions have taken place arising from incidents at or after football matches in the last year for (a) offences against the person and (b) offences against property.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I have been asked to reply.

Centrally collated statistics of prosecutions do not distinguish between those arising from incidents at or after football matches and other events.

TRANSPORT

The Minch (Pollution)

58. Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Transport what investigations his Department have made into the likely environmental consequences of a spillage from a large, crude oil-carrying tanker in the Minch; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The consequences of an oil spillage depend on a number of factors, including the amount of oil spilt, its type, the weather and tidal conditions at the time and the speed within which a clean-up operation can be mounted.

My Departments marine pollution control unit spends just over £1 million a year on research into methods of dealing with pollution accidents at sea and on the beaches. This research is directed to the minimising of environmental effects, but it is not normally related to any particular section of coastline.

Road Schemes

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, for each road scheme identified in table 1 of Class VI, Vote 1 of the Supply Estimates, 1984-85, he will state (i) the expenditure provision for 1984-85, (ii) the estimated actual expenditure in 1984-85, (iii) the estimate of total cost at November 1983 prices made in March 1984, (iv) the latest estimate of total cost at November 1983 prices, (v) the estimate of year of completion made in March 1984, and (vi) the latest estimate of year of completion.

Mrs. Chalker: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

British Rail (Midland Region)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to the answer of 27 March regarding punctuality of trains in the London Midland Region of British Rail, he will give similar data for services from Rugby to London Euston.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand from British Rail that records are not readily available for this particular service in isolation.

Heavy Lorries

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report a list of those countries in the European Economic Community which have legal requirements that the minimum distance between heavy lorries on motorways must be at least 50 metres.

Mrs. Chalker: I am not aware that any country in the Community has such a requirement, but I am making further inquiries.

Hackney Carriage (Conditions of Fitness)

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Transport which district councils have adopted the hackney carriage conditions of fitness.

Mr. David Mitchell: In England (outside London) and Wales hackney carriages are licensed by district councils, and it is for these authorities to determine the conditions to be attached to such licences. No central record is kept but I understand that the following 30 district councils have adopted the metropolitan conditions of fitness for hackney carriages.

Second Severn Crossing

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now publish phase 1 of the feasibility study into the proposal for a second crossing of the Severn.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friend published the report on Monday 1 April.

Severn Bridge

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the approximate amount spent since his announcement of 7 February 1984 that £33 million would be spent on strengthening the Severn bridge.

Mrs. Chalker: About £2 million has been spent on the preparation of design and associated research and development work. Tenders for preliminary work, worth about £1·4 million, have already been invited and further tenders will be invited later this year for other major strengthening works worth £18 million. This will be followed by further contracts in 1986 and 1987.

Motorway (Repairs and Construction)

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will reconsider his proposals to reduce motorway reconstruction to 70 miles in 1985-86 and to reduce other trunk road reconstruction to 100 miles in 1985-86.

Mrs. Chalker: No. We are doing as much renewal work as can reasonably be achieved, and within the funds available.

Woolwich Ferry

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will set out the financial basis on which he is inviting the London boroughs of Greenwich and Newham to take over the operation of the Woolwich ferry after the proposed abolition of the Greater London council.

Mrs. Chalker: The discussions in hand with local authority associations about grant arrangements following abolition include services such as the ferry, where costs will fall upon a limited number of boroughs. The Local Government Bill provides for appropriate adjustments to targets, if they continue, and to expenditure levels to reflect the actual geographical distribution of such post-GLC expenditure.

Bridges and Tunnels

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list such information as he has for the Severn, Humber, Forth, Tay, Itchen, Cleddau and Tamar bridges and the Mersey, Tyne and Dartford tunnels, the total capital repayment to be made by the bridge authority, and the time scale for repayment, the annual upkeep costs and any central Government revenue provided for these costs.

Mr. Ridley: The information requested is given in the table. Central Government do not make annual contributions to revenue; they do provide loans to meet capitalisation of interest where the legislation so provides. The position on central Government loans outstanding is shown in the tabulation.

Tolled crossings

	Total capital repayment at 31 March 1984	Period for repayment	Operating and maintenance costs 1983-84	Central Government loans at 31 March 1984

Tyne	21·2	30	1·26	16·8
Dartford	66·2	60	2·28	6·5

* Publication of the 1983-84 account awaited.

The period for repayment is different for land and construction costs at Itchen and Cleddau. Repayment periods are extendable in certain cases.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Salmon

Mr. Maclean asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the overall value of the salmon trade in the United Kingdom; what he estimates to be (a) the proportion of the trade made up by salmon farmers, (b) the proportion of the trade represented by net fishermen and (c) the proportion of the trade made up by fly and line catchers; for each of these, if he will estimate the number of people involved; and how many are dependent on this type of fishing for a livelihood.

Mr. MacGregor: We estimate that, of the Atlantic salmon available to the market in Great Britain in 1983, 38 per cent. came from British salmon farms, 38 per cent. from imports, 20 per cent. from commercial net fishermen and 4 per cent. from rod and line catches (not all the latter will necessarily have been marketed). In 1984 fish farm production rose by just over 50 per cent. and imports rose very slightly; final figures for net catches and rod and line catches are not yet available. Records are not available of the value of trade in salmon, of the number of people employed in the trade or of the number of people dependent on salmon fishing for a livelihood.

Outgoers Scheme

Mr. Knox asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on progress made on the outgoers scheme for dairy farmers.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 14 March 1985, c. 266]: A total of 224 million litres of milk quota is available under the outgoers scheme. A further 94 producers, each with over 725,000 litres of quota who in February reaffirmed their interest, have now been invited to join.

These producers will be expected to return their claim forms within one week and to cease milk sales within three weeks but any who experience difficulties in stopping sales within this period may be allowed some extra time, individual circumstances being taken into account.

Any producer in this position should contact his local divisional office.

A total of 1,451 producers have now joined the outgoers scheme in our progress towards meeting the 289 million litre target.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nicaragua

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation has not condemned the threat of force by the United States of America against Nicaragua, in violation of its obligations under the United Nations charter.

Mr. Renton: Like ourselves, the United States Administration have said that they wish to see political reform in Central America through peaceful means. United States support for the Contadora initiative was reiterated at the last United Nations General Assembly session.

Nuclear Test Ban

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what were the existing verification procedures to ensure compliance with a nuclear test ban considered adequate by the United Nations General Assembly in resolution 39/52; why the United Kingdom voted against this resolution; and what attitude was taken by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Rifkind: Resolution 39/52 contained no indication of the measures its Warsaw Pact sponsors considered adequate to ensure compliance with a nuclear test ban. Because it was an unbalanced declaratory resolution which did nothing to advance the prospects for real progress towards a comprehensive test ban, the United Kingdom and the majority of our NATO Allies did not support it. The Soviet Union voted in favour of it. As I told the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on 11 December 1984, at column 450, we believe that for a test ban to command general acceptance it must contain adequate safeguards against the danger of non-compliance by any of its signatory parties. A first step towards ensuring this would be the improvement of current verification techniques. We will continue to play an active part in any discussions of this aspect of a CTB at the Geneva conference on disarmament.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why the United Kingdom voted against resolution 39/60 of the United Nations General Assembly regarding the immediate cessation and non-proliferation of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Rifkind: The resolution referred to by the hon. Member called for the immediate cessation of nuclear weapons testing and urged the conference on disarmament to proceed with negotiations on a treaty. I would also refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him to his previous question.

Our vote against this resolution in no way lessens our determination to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons. We are fully committed to the non-proliferation regime established by the non-proliferation treaty.

Hong Kong

Sir Paul Bryan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with the conduct of the recent elections in Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: In the recent elections held on 7 March for Hong Kong's local district boards, 213 seats were contested by nearly 500 candidates, and over 476,000 people voted. This represents an increase of almost 134,000 over the number who voted in the first elections in 1982. It is a very satisfactory result, and an encouraging indication of popular support in Hong Kong for the steps that are being taken to develop a more representative system of government there.

Departmental Legislation

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Acts of Parliament have been promoted and how many statutory instruments made by his Department, or predecessor Departments covering his areas of responsibility, in each of the last 20 years.

Mr. Rifkind: As my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Treasury indicated on 1 April, at column 507, in answer to a similar question from my hon. Friend, because of the changes in the machinery of government over the last 20 years, the apportionment of Acts and statutory instruments to the areas of present ministerial responsibility could be done only at disproportionate cost.

Non-Proliferation Treaty

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards extending the competence of the European Economic Community into matters of non-proliferation; and how such proposals would affect the United Kingdom obligations under the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Rifkind: We regard competence in non-proliferation matters as resting with the member states of the Community.

Discussions on non-proliferation matters between member states are carried on in the political co-operation machinery which is outside the framework of the treaty of Rome.

Plutonium

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 18 February, Official Report, columns 359-60, whether any plutonium produced in British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. reactors has been exported to any state without the application of nuclear safeguards since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: All exports for civil purposes of plutonium produced in British Nuclear Fuels plc reactors have been in accordance with the guidelines set out in my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce) answer of 18 February to the hon. Member.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Health Education

Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action Her Majesty's Government has taken on the proposals made in the Kirby report on health education.

Mr. John Patten: Following the report's publication in 1981 the Government-funded Health Education Council set up a training consultative group to keep under review the provision for education and training of health education officers. The council subsequently established links with the NHS training authority, to which the staff committees are now accountable. A review day is planned for 1 May, at which the Department will be represented, to update the Kirby report and consider future possibilities.

NHS (Supervisory and Management Boards)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make a statement about the establishment of the Health Services Supervisory Board and the National Health Service Management Board as recommended by the Griffiths Inquiry.

Mr. Fowler: I set up the Health Services Supervisory Board on 25 October 1983. It meets regularly under my chairmanship. Its members are the Minister for Health, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten), my noble Friend Baroness Trumpington, the Permanent Secretary, the Chief Medical Officer, the Chief Nursing Officer, the chairman of the NHS Management Board and Mr. Roy Griffiths.

The chairman of the NHS Management Board, Mr. Victor Paige, was appointed from 1 January this year. The board has now been constituted and is in operation within my Department and accountable to me, as follows:

Director of Health Authority Finance—Mrs. G. T. Banks, Under Secretary DHSS.

Director of Planning and Information Technology—Mr. M. J. Fairey, Chairman of the Health Service Information Advisory Group.

Director of Health Authority Liaison—Mr. C. Graham, Under Secretary DHSS.

Director of Operations—Mr. G. Hart, Deputy Secretary DHSS.

Director of Financial Management—to be appointed.

Director of Personnel—to be appointed.

Dr. Donald Acheson, the Chief Medical Officer, and Mrs. Anne Poole, the Chief Nursing Officer, will serve on the management board, as well as being members of the supervisory board.

The NHS Management Board will be accountable to me for the implementation within the health authorities of the Government's policies for their management. It will, on my behalf, give leadership and monitor performance, with the aim of securing improvements in services to patients and more effective use of resources. The board's membership is drawn from the NHS, the DHSS and the business world — as Roy Griffiths and his team recommended.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will investigate the recent allegations made to his Department of maladministration in his Department's local offices in Glasgow in relation to the suitable alternative furnished accommodation aspect of single payments, regulation 10, and its effect on claimants' entitlements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: We have no reason to believe there has been any maladministration in the Department's local offices in Glasgow. I shall be writing to the hon. Member about this matter.

Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when final results of the 1983 statistical inquiry of supplementary benefit claimants will be available.

Mr. Whitney: Their availability is dependent upon the overall recovery position of the Newcastle computer section, following last year's industrial action. At the current rate of recovery it is estimated that the final figures will be available by the end of May 1985, and printed tables will be placed in the Library from six to eight weeks later.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what will be the position of claimants under the new supplementary benefit regulations making applications for supplementary benefit before 1 April whose claims are not processed until after 1 April; and if they will be treated on the same basis as existing claimants for the purposes of assessing supplementary benefit and transitional protection claims.

Mr. Whitney: I assume that the hon. Member is referring to the proposed new regulations relating to board and lodging payments which are intended to apply from 29 April. Claims made before that date will be assessed in accordance with existing rules and the transitional protection provisions will apply.

Vaccine Damage

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether, in view of the number of awards made under the Vaccine Damage Payments Act 1979, he has revised his assessment of the risk ratio involved in the use of whooping cough vaccine.

Mr. John Patten: I have nothing to add to my reply to the hon. Member on 31 January, at column 299.

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the latest number of those awarded payments under the Vaccine Damage Act 1979; and in how many cases there were published contra-indications prior to being immunised.

Mr. John Patten: Up to 28 March 1985, 800 awards have been made under the Vaccine Damage Payments Act 1979. It is not known in how many of these cases there were published contra-indications prior to vaccination.

Medical Students

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his policy regarding hospitals accepting students from American medical schools for training purposes; whether such entry can occur with lower entry requirements than for British students; if capacity for British students to occupy National Health Service training places is reduced as a result; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are committed to providing National Health Service clinical training facilities for undergraduates students admitted to British medical schools under criteria set by academic authorities. We have no responsibility for students from other medical schools with unknown entry requirements. However, we would expect health authorities involved in any such arrangements to observe the overriding obligations of patient care and certainly not to incur any additional costs on public funds. We have no present reason to suppose that undergraduate students from British medical schools have been deprived of appropriate clinical training, but we shall monitor the situation.

Dogs (Injured Persons)

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people have been treated in hospital as a result of attacks by dogs in each of the last five years.

Mr. John Patten: The requested information is not available centrally.

Maternity Grant

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration he has given to increasing the maternity grant level; and for which categories of families.

Mr. Whitney: The provision of financial help for maternity, including the maternity grant, is one of the subjects which have been under review. The Government will be announcing the outcome of the social security review as a whole shortly.

Single-parent families

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many single-parent families he estimates there are in the United Kingdom now and on 1 January of each of the past five years for which records are available; and in each case how many and what percentage of the parents are male and how many and what percentage are female; how many and what percentage are the result of broken marriages; and how many and what percentage are the mothers of illegitimate children.

Mr. John Patten: Information is available only in respect of Great Britain.

Taking account of results from the 1981 census and information from the general household survey the best estimates at present available of the numbers of one-parent families with dependent children are as follows:

Marital status	1979		1980		1981		1982
	thousands	per cent.	thousands	per cent.	thousands	per cent.	thousands	per cent.
Lone mother		89		88		89		89
Single		16		18		19		19
Widowed		16		14		14		13
Divorced		34		35		37		38
Separated		21		21		19		19
Lone father		11		12		11		11
Total	840		870		900		930

The percentage distributions according to marital status are derived from the general household survey by averaging the results for three years, centred on the year indicated.

Children born to single women are by definition illegitimate. No information is available about the proportion of other mothers who have illegitimate children.

Reye's Syndrome

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the estimated incidence of Reye's syndrome in England and Wales; what is the estimated mortality; and how the figures compare with the incidence in the United States and Northern Ireland.

Mr. John Patten: In the year 1 August 1983 to 31 July 1984 82 cases in the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland were reported to the communicable disease surveillance centre under its voluntary reporting scheme. Of these, 58 were in England and Wales and 17 in Northern Ireland. The estimated incidence based on these figures is 0·5 and 4·0 respectively per 100,000 children under 16 years old. In total 34 deaths were reported, representing a 41 per cent. mortality rate. The estimated incidence of Reye's syndrome in the United States of America in 1984 was 0·3 per 100,000 children under 18 years old.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make Reye's syndrome a notifiable disease.

Mr. John Patten: The voluntary reporting scheme started in August 1981 by the British Paediatric Association and the communicable disease surveillance centre appears to be working effectively and we have no plans to replace it with a statutory reporting system.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what conclusion was reached by the March meeting of experts arranged by his Department which discussed cot deaths and post neonatal mortality, regarding the possible involvement of Reye's syndrome in actual and near miss cot deaths.

Mr. John Patten: I understand that no definite conclusions were reached at the meeting regarding the possible involvement of Reye's syndrome in sudden infant deaths.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what research is currently being undertaken into Reyes syndrome; who is financing it; what is the nature of the research; and when the results are expected.

Mr. John Patten: I understand that currently there are underway at the communicable diseases surveillance centre a two-year epidemiological study, using the voluntary reporting scheme, to determine the part played by risk factors suggested by previous studies, and a follow-up study of survivors reported to the scheme. Neither the Department nor the Medical Research Council is currently funding studies specifically into Reye's syndrome, but both are prepared to consider sound proposals for research.

Mr. Ashley: asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in the study of post-neonatal mortality co-ordinated by Professor John Knowelden, how many of the infants who had suffered a cot death were found also to be suffering from Reyes syndrome; and what proportion this was of the total.

Mr. John Patten: In the multi-care study, individual causes of death were not specifically identified, but were grouped within certain disease categories, and the report does not therefore provide the data requested.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to receive further advice from the Committee on Safety of Medicines on the alleged association between Reyes syndrome and aspirin; if he will make a statement when he does so; and if he will publish the main points of the advice and the reasons for it.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The committee is actively considering this issue. The committee began to re-examine the matter at its March 1985 meeting when it decided to seek further information for consideration at future meetings. When the committee has finished its work on this, we shall decide whether any statement is needed and, if so, the form it should take.

Influenza and Chicken Pox (Salicylates)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which of the studies it considered led the Committee on Safety of Medicines in 1982 to dissent from the view of the United States Surgeon General of the Public Health Service who was advising that children with influenza or chicken pox should not be given salicylates and salicylate containing medications.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The committee considered that the totality of evidence available at that time did not justify the issue of such advice in the United Kingdom.

Imunisation (Adverse Reactions)

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will outline the methods used by his Department for recording the number of children who have suffered an adverse reaction requiring medical attention following immunisation against measles;

(2) if his Department keeps records of the number of children who suffer an adverse reaction to any of the childhood immunisations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Committee on Safety of Medicines is responsible under the Medicines Act 1968 for promoting the collection and investigation of information on adverse drug reactions whether experienced by children or adults. Details of adverse reactions to vaccines and immunological products reported by doctors to the committee, including the age of the patient, are recorded in its computerised adverse reactions register.

Hospital Waiting Lists (Surgery)

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the number of people who have been recommended for surgical treatment on the grounds of extreme pain and who are currently on hospital waiting lists; and what information he has as to the proportion of this figure accounted for by (a) elderly and (b) housebound people.

Mr. John Patten: The requested information is not available centrally. The question of when to treat a patient is a matter for the clinical decision of the consultant responsible. If a general practitioner felt that a particular patient needed to be admitted earlier this should be discussed with the consultant.

Overseas Social Security Payments

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the additional cost in £ sterling at current prices of (a) payments to persons in the United States of America from his Department and (b) payments to persons in the United Kingdom from the United States social security administration arising from the agreement on social security recorded in Cmnd. 9443 in 1985-86 and 1988-89, respectively; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: Since the benefit provisions of this agreement on social security will not take effect until 1 January 1988, there will be no cost to this Department in 1985-86. The cost in 1988-89, at the rates of benefit payable at the present time, is estimated as £210,000. The cost to the United States social security administration of payments arising from the agreement is a matter for the United States authorities.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what, consequent on the agreement on social security described in Cmnd. 9443, will be the entitlement to benefit of a United Kingdom citizen with a sufficient insurance record who falls sick while working in the United States of America before he has been credited with four quarters of coverage under the laws of the United States of America.

Mr. Whitney: From January 1988 a United Kingdom citizen who falls sick while working in the United States of America and who is unable to qualify for United States disability benefit will be able to receive United Kingdom invalidity pension if he has not been absent from the United Kingdom for more than five years and, when he left the United Kingdom, he satisfied the contribution conditions for sickness benefit.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will specify the distinction in the rules relating to the social security entitlement of United Kingdom citizens in the United States of America and in Canada following the full implementation of the agreement on social security between the United Kingdom and the United States of America described in Cmnd. 9443.

Mr. Whitney: Under an agreement on social security made in 1969 between the United Kingdom and the United States of America, United Kingdom pensioners living in the United States of America receive uprating increases of retirement and widow's pensions. The agreement described in Cmnd. 9443 continues this.

The new agreement regulates liability to social security contributions for people from the United Kingdom working in the United States of America so that they are liable to contribute to one country's scheme only in respect of any one employment. In relation to benefit entitlement for people in the United States of America, with effect from January 1988 the new agreement provides as follows:

People who have been insured in both countries and do not have entitlement to retirement or widow's pension from either will be able to aggregate insurance in both countries to qualify for a proportional rate of pension.

People who fall sick and cannot qualify for United States disability benefit will be able to receive United Kingdom invalidity pension if they have not been absent from the United Kingdom for more than five years and if, when they left the United Kingdom, they satisfied the contribution conditions for sickness benefit.

Payment of United Kingdom guardian's allowance will continue.

There are no arrangements between the United Kingdom and Canada which affect the social security entitlement of United Kingdom citizens in Canada.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the reply of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe, on 12 November 1984, Official Report, columns 143-44, if he has reached a decision on repayment of mobility allowance consequent to Commissioner's decision R(M)2/82; and if he will make a further statement.

Mr. Newton: I shall write to the right hon. Member as soon as I can about this.

Renal Transplants and Dialysis

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he categorises (a) renal transplant surgery and (b) dialysis treatment as routine treatments available on the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Yes. Both these services are provided in each health service region.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received advocating that renal transplant surgery and dialysis treatment should not be regarded as an area of priority development in the National Health Service; what response he has made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: No such representations have been received.

National Insurance Contributions

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will give the revenue raised in a full year from employers' national insurance contributions in respect of all areas with a total unemployment rate in excess of 20 per cent;

(2) if he will give the revenue raised in a full year from employers' national insurance contributions in respect of employees under the age of 21 years in areas with a total unemployment rate in excess of 20 per cent. on 1 January.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that this information is not available.

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the revenue raised in a full year from employers' national insurance contributions in respect of employees under the age of 21 years.

Mr. Whitney: The estimated revenue in 1984-85 from employers' national insurance contributions in respect of employees under age 21 was roughly £880 million.

Glaucoma

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what support his Department is giving to National Glaucoma Action Week from 21 to 27 April, organised by the International Glaucoma Association; if he will increase the facilities for providing glaucoma treatment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We have been informed of the International Glaucoma Association's initiative in organising a National Glaucoma Action Week from 21 to 27 April, to increase public and professional awareness of glaucoma and we wish them every success. The provision of facilities for treatment of glaucoma must be a matter for individual health authorities, based on their knowledge of local circumstances and priorities.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the number of people suffering from glaucoma in England and Wales; if he is satisfied with the facilities available for treating such patients; if he is satisfied with the methods used to alert patients to the importance of early diagnosis and treatment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I understand that surveys reported in the medical press suggest that the prevalence of all types of glaucoma within the total population is around 1 per cent., with the following approximate percentages for different age groups:

Age	Per cent. suffering from glaucoma
40-50	under 1
50-60	under 1
60-70	under 1
70-80	under 3
80-90	about 10

Facilities for the detection and treatment of glaucoma are provided in hospital eye departments and are the responsibility of individual health authorities. The present view of the Faculty of Ophthalmologists is that glaucoma screening is cost-effective only for patients at special risk, in particular the first degree relatives of glaucoma sufferers. Opthalmologists would normally advise glaucoma sufferers that their first degree relatives over the age of 40 should be screened.

Family Practitioner Committees (Audit)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the estimated cost of establishing internal audit sections in each family practitioner committee, or in groups of family practitioner committees; and how much additional money he plans to make available to family practitioner committees for this function.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No estimate of the cost of internal audit arrangements is possible until family practitioner committees have submitted their proposals to our Department. The cost of the arrangements made is to be met from within existing allocations to committees.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Ulster Office, London (Flag)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the Northern Ireland flag was last flown at 11 Berkeley street, London.

Dr. Boyson: There is no record of a Northern Ireland flag having been flown at the premises in question. Arrangements regarding the flying of the Union Flag are the same as for other Government buildings.

York Road-Central Station (Rail Link)

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether plans have been completed for the proposed rail link between York Road-Central Station; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Outline design and engineering plans for the proposed rail link between York Road and Belfast Central railway stations were prepared by consultants in 1979. Since then the Government have made it clear on several occasions that the proposal would have to compete with other public expenditure priorities. An updated analysis of the costs and benefits associated with this proposal will form part of a review of transport policy which is being undertaken in connection with the preparation of a new plan for the Belfast urban area.

Constitutional Study (Funds)

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will consider providing funds for the study by a Northern Ireland-based body, such as one of the universities or an all-party committee, of the extent to which the American constitution could serve as a model for the future government of Northern Ireland within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hurd: I have no plans to do so.

Human Rights

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to introduce legislation to extend the scope of the remit of the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights to include a broader range of human rights issues.

Mr. Hurd: Any change in the statutory remit of the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights will require amendment of the Northern Ireland Constitution Act 1973. I cannot at present say when such legislation is likely to be introduced. I recognised the commission's wider role in the field of human rights generally in Northern Ireland in my response to the commission's tenth annual report, a copy of which was placed in the Library on 21 February 1985.

Employment Grant Schemes

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will consider the extension of employment grant schemes in Northern Ireland to cover the retail sector, as in Great Britain.

Dr. Boyson: The employment grant schemes administered by the Department of Economic Development are all available to the retail sector.

Housing Executive House Sales

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the number of dwellings, and percentage of the total stock, sold by the Housing Executive to tenants and others.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. I understand from the chairman that at 27 March 1985, 26,029 dwellings had been sold, representing 14·5 per cent. of the Housing Executive's stock of dwellings.

Lignite

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether any study has been made of the possible effects of transport of lignite by road from County Antrim on roads and the environment in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: These were investigated at the early planning stage of the project.

Railway Museum, Carrickfergus

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what encouragement he is giving to the Railway Preservation Society of Ireland in its efforts to establish a railway museum at Carrickfergus.

Mr. Scott: I accept in principle the need for the development of local museums, but because of pressure on resources I am unable to commit funds to this, and other, local museum initiatives. I will, however, keep the situation under review.

Voluntary Bodies (Grants)

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a list of those voluntary bodies who received grants under class C3 from the Northern Ireland Department of Health and Social Services; and if he will list the amounts received in each case for the last five years.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985, c. 301]: The information is as follows:

Labour Statistics

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish in the Official Report the number of long-term youth unemployed in each year since 1979 to the latest date.

Dr. Boyson [pursuant to his reply, 1 April 1985, c. 484]: The following table shows the number of young people aged 16 to 17 who had been unemployed for more than one year in Northern Ireland at April of each year since 1979 and at February 1985.

	Number
April 1979	353
April 1980	219
April 1981	603
April 1982	483
April 1983	498
April 1984	481
February 1985	472

Job Creation

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the impact of the Budget on reducing unemployment in the Province.

Dr. Boyson [pursuant to his reply, 1 April 1985, c. 484]: The 1985 Budget will improve labour market prospects in Northern Ireland, as in the rest of the United Kingdom, by continuing the Government's strategy to control inflation and create the conditions in which enterprise and initiative can flourish. The increases in personal tax allowances and the restructuring of National insurance contributions will help to increase the opportunities and incentives for employment at wages that businesses can afford. For illustration, it will now cost an employer £3 per week less to take on an employee at £90 per week, and the employee will take home £3 more out of the same £90 wage.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to reduce unemployment in the Province; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson [pursuant to his reply, 1 April 1985, c. 484]: The Government are continuing their efforts to stimulate the revival of the Northern Ireland economy and to promote a climate favourable to innovation and enterprise of all kinds. The measures announced in last month's Budget add further impetus to these efforts, particularly in relation to the creation of new employment.

THE ARTS

Grants Policy

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts whether, in considering applications for grants, the Arts Council seeks information about the annual running costs of individual theatres or other bodies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Arts Council seeks detailed information about the financial efficiency of funded bodies, as well as evaluating their artistic standards.

Objects in Lieu of Taxation

Mr. Faulds asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what offers of pre-eminent objects and property for acceptance in satisfaction of capital transfer tax or estate duty have been received in respect of the value of £2 million which has been provided for during the financial year 1985-86; and if he will state the total commitment involved, and specify the individual items, together with the amount of tax to be satisfied in respect of them.

Mr. Waldegrave: Offers in lieu of tax are put to the Government on a confidential basis, and it would be inappropriate to give the information requested. Details are released when an offer has been accepted by the Government.

Mr. Faulds asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts whether he will list the amounts initially appearing in the Supply Estimates for the five financial years from 1980-81 to 1984-85, inclusive, in respect of the tax discharge value of works of art and property accepted in satisfaction of capital transfer tax and estate duty, together with particulars of any subsequent increases in those amounts which may have taken place during any of the five financial years in question; whether he will at the same time specify the total tax discharge value of works of art and property actually accepted during each of the five years; and whether the accounting practice is to cancel the resulting surplus in the event of the estimated quota not being fulfilled in any given year.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 2 April 1985, c. 578]: The information requested is as follows. The sums involved are shared equally on the Votes of the Department of the Environment and of the Office of Arts and Libraries.

£ million

ENVIRONMENT

Mobile Homes Act 1983

15. Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied with the operation of the Mobile Homes Act 1983.

Sir George Young: On the whole, yes; the Mobile Homes Act 1983, together with other statutory provisions relevant to mobile homes, provides a fair and sound framework for mobile homes' residents and site owners; but I am watching progress closely.

Repair and Improvement Grants

16. Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish a consultative document on repair and improvement grants.

Home Improvement Policy

33. Mr. Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he plans to publish his proposed changes in home improvement policy.

Mr. Gow: We intend to issue shortly a consultation document on private sector housing improvement policy, including the future of the home improvement grant system.

Students (Housing)

17. Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations or discussions he has had since last September or proposes to have with representatives of universities, polytechnics and colleges, and their student bodies, on the subject of the provision of housing for students in the coming academic year.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend has had no such consultations or discussions and has no plans to have any.

Artefacts and Animals (Preservation)

18. Mr. John Browne asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what amount of money was provided in 1984 for (a) the preservation of man-made artifacts and (b) the preservation of endangered species of animals.

Mr. Waldegrave: During 1984-85 my Department made grants totalling £54·4 million to the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission, the Royal Commission on Historical Monuments (England) and the Redundant Churches Fund; and grants totalling £21·3 million to the Nature Conservancy Council and the Zoological Society of London. The National Heritage Memorial Fund, which is concerned with both the natural and man-made heritage, received £29 million.

Gleneagles Agreement

19. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he next intends to discuss the Gleneagles agreement with the chairman of the Sports Council.

Mr. Macfarlane: I have at present no plans to do so.

51. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he has taken in 1985 to bring to the attention of sports bodies the Goverment's view of the Gleneagles agreement.

Mr. Macfarlane: All governing bodies have been advised of the Government's commitment to the 1977 Commonwealth statement on apartheid in sport in advice issued by the Sports Council. I only rarely need to approach individual bodies to repeat or clarify that advice; the last occasion was in respect of the RFU tour of South Africa in 1984.

Rate-capped Authorities (Publicity Campaigns)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to how much money has been spent to date by each of the rate-capped local authorities on publicity campaings opposing rate capping; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I do not have precise information though the sums are considerable, because of their concern about such matters, the Government have set up the committee of enquiry chaired by David Widdicombe.

Inner Urban Aid (Churches)

Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning the extension of eligibility of inner urban aid to cover repair of churches threatened with demolition.

Sir George Young: Ministers have received a few representations, including one from the area dean of Bolton on behalf of the Bolton Council of Churches, which has the support of Bolton metropolitan borough council.

Urban Land (Development)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what impact he expects the abolition of development land tax to have on the redevelopment of urban land held by public bodies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The abolition of development land tax has been welcomed by the building and development sectors. Its abolition will encourage land owners, including those public bodies hitherto liable to pay this tax, to sell more land or to undertake its development. This would particularly apply to sites where the development value likely to be realised is large. Some sites of this kind are in Urban areas.

Local Authorities (Recruitment)

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has received from the Joint Manpower Watch about the level of recruitment by local authorities in the most recent period for which figures are available.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Local authorities in England in 1984 employed some 5,000 fewer staff than 12 months previously. The joint manpower watch is a head count and it is not possible to give the figures for recruitment.

Domestic Rating System

24. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received in favour of the domestic rating system during the past year.

Mr. Waldegrave: None.

Business Rates

25. Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received in response to the report commissioned by his Department on "The Effect of Business Rates on the Location of Employment".

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Many people expressed astonishment and disbelief when a few carefully selected bits of the report were circulated before its publication. The full report, which is based on figures only up to 1981, did not examine the impact of rates in the most extreme cases. In such cases, rate increases may be the last straw that leads to closures and redundancies.

38. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the bodies to whom he has sent copies of the Cambridge report on "The Effect of Business Rates on the Location of Employment" for their comments.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have specifically invited comments from the Confederation of British Industry, the Trades Union Congress, the Association of British Chambers of Commerce, the Association of County Councils, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the Association of District Councils, the London Boroughs Association, the Association of London Authorities, the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives, the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy, the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors and the Rating and Valuation Association.

Housing Expenditure

26. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he makes of the effect of the Budget on Government spending on housing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gow: The Government's public expenditure plans for housing are set out in the annual public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9428) and have not been changed by the Budget.

Building Regulations

27. Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in amending the building regulations to incorporate access provision for disabled people.

Mr. Gow: My right hon. Friend laid before the House yesterday an amendment to the 1976 building regulations. The amendment introduces a new part T to the regulation which requires that access for disabled people should be provided to all floors of all new offices and shops and to new single storey buildings which are open to the public.

The commencement date for the new requirements to come into operation is 1 August this year.

GLC and Metropolitan Counties (Staff)

28. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the number of staff who have left the employment of the Greater London council and the six metropolitan counties since the publication of the Local Government Bill; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: This information is not available centrally.

Natural Environment Research Council

29. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will assess the environmental implications of restructuring proposals in the Natural Environment Research Council's corporate plan 1985 to 1990.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department commissions research from a range of organisations including the Natural Environment Research Council, universities, Government laboratories, research associations, and the private sector. The Natural Environment Research Council is an important source of advice and we shall continue to ask the council to undertake work for us where it is the best body to do so. Its restructuring proposals are a matter for decision by it.

Local Authorities (Expenditure)

30. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many consents under section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 have been refused by his Department.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: None.

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish, for each year from 1981-82 to 1985-86, total net provision, cash limit, for local authority capital expenditure in England, total capital allocations, and total gross capital provision; if he will publish outturn or estimated outturn figures against each of these heads; and if he will analyse the figures by service area.

Mr. Waldegrave: Following is the information.

* In 1981-82, 1982-83 and 1983-84 urban programme provision and allocation are included in the other services block but expenditure is included under the relevant service blocks. The urban programme allocations in the three years were £83 million, £174 million and £179 million respectively.

† Including the capital value of leased assets.

‡ The figures for 1984-85 and 1985-86 exclude local authority capital expenditure on urban programme and derelict land, which is now included in the DOE/UA1 cash limit and for which provision in 1984-85 and 1985-86 is £296 million and £279 million respectively. The outturn information for 1984-85 is available for the first three quarters only.

‖ Allocation in 1985-86 will be increased by 5 per cent. across all service blocks for authorities complying with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's request for restraint in 1984-85.

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish, for each year from 1981-82 to 1985-86, the estimates of total local authority capital receipts underlying public expenditure provision for local authority capital expenditure in England, and actual or estimated receipts in each year; if he will show separately the prescribed and non-prescribed proportions of receipts; and if he will give separate figures for each service area.

Mr. Waldegrave: Following is the available information.

‖ Outturn information for 1984-85 is available for the first three quarters only.

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will detail the information that he collects from local authorities about their capital expenditure and capital receipts.

Mr. Waldegrave: The main information which the Department of Environment collects from local authorities about their total capital expenditure and receipts is provided on the following forms, specimen copies of which I have today placed in the Library.

Capital Estimates and Commitments Return (CECR)

This is an annual return which provides forecasts at the start of the year of capital commitments, payments and receipts in the year ahead.

Capital Payments Returns (CPR)

These are quarterly forms which provide summary outturn information on capital payments and receipts by service. They also collect information on capital allocations, prescribed expenditure and the prescribed proportion of in-year capital receipts.

Capital Outturn (CO) Forms

There are annual forms which provide detailed outturn information on capital expenditure and income for each service.

Tenants' Charter

31. Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review the effectiveness of the tenants' charter.

Mr. Gow: My Department has commissioned a study into local council implementation of the tenants' charter provisions in the Housing Act 1980. My right hon. Friend will consider its findings in due course.

Tenants' Rights

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to publicise private tenants' rights.

Sir George Young: My Department publishes a series of booklets which explain the rights of private tenants. These are widely and freely available through local authorities, citizens' advice bureaux, rent officers and other sources. We have no plans to add to this publicity.

Rate Capping

32. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he proposes making a statement about the future designation of authorities under the Rates Act.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Not yet.

Pre-cast Concrete Council Houses (Sale)

34. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the extent to which the effectiveness of the legislation governing council house sales may be affected by the reluctance of tenants to purchase pre-cast concrete council houses as a result of the unwillingness of insurance companies to issue policies in respect of such properties.

Mr. Gow: I have no such information.

Children (Play Opportunities)

35. Mr. Ron Lewis asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the achievements of his Department in providing for children's play opportunities.

Mr. Macfarlane: My responsibility is to provide a focus for Government policy across Departments in relation to children's play. I am not responsible for the provision of play opportunities since the need for such provision is clearly a matter for local decision.

We have encouraged and supported the voluntary movement to set up a new national body to promote facilities and opportunities in children's play. As a result, the Association for Children's Play and Recreation known as Play Board, has been established as an independent agency funded by my Department. I look to Play Board to play an increasingly important role in the promotion of local opportunities and facilities for play, and to advise central and local Government on needs and resources.

Local Authorities (Rate Yield)

36. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the total yield of local authority rates; and what proportion of local authority expenditure this will provide in 1984-85.

Mr. Waldegrave: Rate income — net of domestic rate relief grant and rate rebates—for local authorities in England in 1984-85 is estimated at £11·1 billion. This represents 52 per cent. of authorities' budgeted "Total" expenditure estimated at £21·39 billion.

Council Houses

37. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authority houses have passed to the control of the private sector, excluding sales to sitting tenants, in each of the last three years.

Sir George Young: Excluding sales to sitting tenants, English local authorities sold 5,875 dwellings in 1981-82, 4,710 in 1982-83 and 8,455 in 1983-84.

Gipsy Sites

39. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek powers to make 100 per cent. grants to local authorities for the establishment of gipsy sites in London boroughs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: My right hon. Friend already has powers in section 70 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 to make grants on such terms as he and the Treasury determine. The current rate is 100 per cent. of admissable costs.

Marine Nature Reserve

40. Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects agreement to be reached on the first marine nature reserve.

Mr. Waldegrave: It is not possible at present to forecast exactly when the first reserve will be designated; we have reasonable hopes of agreement at two sites.

Green Belt (Planning Appeals)

41. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many planning appeals have been determined by his inspectors; and how many of these have been upheld, relating to designated green belt land within the Greater London area and in the rest of the metropolitan green belt, respectively, in the last 12 months for which figures are available.

Mr. Macfarlane: The information is not available in the form requested. Currently available statistics of planning appeals in designated green belts were recently supplied to my hon. Friend in reply to parliamentary questions which I answered on 13 March 1985 at column 146.

Derelict Land Scheme

42. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied with the operation of the derelict land scheme.

Mr. Macfarlane: In general, yes. My Department continues to monitor the scheme to ensure that its objectives are being met in the most efficient way.

Local Authorities (Capital Expenditure)

43. Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received a copy of the latest Audit Commission investigation into the operation of local authority capital expenditure controls.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I understand that the Audit Commission's report on local authority capital expenditure controls is to be published very shortly. I have just been sent a proof of the report and am studying it with interest.

Council House Building

44. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the anticipated level of new construction of council-owned dwellings in the outer London boroughs, as estimated by his Department for 1985, 1986 and 1987 in 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Sir George Young: My Department makes no such estimates. It is for the boroughs to decide how many dwellings to build, in the light of their own priorities and resources.

Local Government Reform (Savings)

45. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has made any changes to his estimates of possible savings arising from the abolition of the Greater London council and metropolitan counties.

Mr. Waldegrave: No.

Local Government Finance

46. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations he is undertaking as part of his review of local government finance.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Mr. Speed) on 4 March, at column 349, by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government.

54. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a progress report on the studies on local government finance being carried out by his Department.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Prime Minister and colleagues discussed the studies on 31 March. They welcomed the progress which had been made so far. There is much further work to be done over the next few months and in due course there will be opportunities for wider public discussion before final decisions are made.

Conservation (Environment Committee Report)

47. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to publish his response to the Environment Committee's first report on the "Operation and Effectiveness of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981".

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government's response is expected to be issued shortly after the Easter recess.

Planning Permission (Misuse)

48. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the misuse of planning permissions for dwellings granted on the basis of agricultural need where an agricultural occupancy condition has been imposed.

Mr. Macfarlane: Representations in the last year have included questions from my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay). Other representations have sought the relaxation of my Department's policy on the use of agricultural occupancy conditions.

Disabled Persons (Access to Buildings)

49. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now take steps to ensure that facilities for disabled people are provided in alterations and extensions carried out to existing buildings.

Sir George Young: A circular to accompany the new amendment to the building regulations dealing with access for disabled people will draw the attention of designers and developers to the obligation in the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970 to ensure that reasonable provision for disabled people is made in both new and converted buildings.

There are considerable practical difficulties in devising regulations which can apply to alterations and extensions to buildings and result in positive improvements in access for disabled people. Building regulations apply only to items of new building work and cannot require the provision of facilities that do not already exist. My Department is examining the problem, however, and I hope that progress can be made.

Rate-capped Authorities

50. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will meet a delegation of councillors representing the rate-capped local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Watson) on 14 March at column 219.

Rates

52. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will name those English local authorities which had not, by 1 April, fixed their rate for the financial year 1985-86.

Mr. Waldegrave: The councils are Camden, Greenwich, Hackney, Haringey, Islington, Lambeth, Lewisham, Liverpool, Newham, Sheffield, Southwark and Tower Hamlets.

Swans

53. Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what study he has made of the effect on swans of the use of lead shot by anglers.

Mr. Waldegrave: There has been a number of scientific studies by the Nature Counservancy Concil and other organisations. Recent evidence shows that there has been a small increase in the overall swan population over the past five years, but it appears that in excess of 3,000 swans continue to die each year from lead poisoning caused by ingesting anglers' weights.

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he can indicate from his Department's recent surveys what effect on the swan population has been registered by industrial pollution, diesel fumes and pollution of waters by increased river usage of diesel-driven vessels, dredging and the reduction of riverside vegetation as a result of pollution and dredging; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what effects the increased use of herbicides and insecticides has had on the swan population;

(3) to what extent, in determining lead poisoning in swans, a separate analysis was made of the effects of lead shot from gun sports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The 1981 report by the Nature Conservancy Council, "Lead Poisoning in Swans", examined all causes of swandeaths. Post mortem examinations in 1980-81 showed:

Cause	Percentage of deaths
Lead poisoning	39·2
Collisions with overhead wires and by other structures	27·4
Disease and infection	10·4
Internal injuries	10·0
Shot or deliberately killed	5·5

In the period October 1981 to January 1985, 55 per cent. of post-mortem examinations indicated lead poisoning as the cause of death. Evidence from all post-mortems in the period 1973 to 1981 showed that pellets of split-lead shot used in angling were present in 58 per cent. of swans examined, whereas gunshot was found in less than two per cent. of cases.

There is no evidence that industrial pollution, herbicides or insecticides have been a primary cause of death in swans.

In dealing with the suggestion that fumes emitted from petrol-engined boats may cause lead poisoning of swans the 1981 report states.

"Evidence from blood lead levels in swans shows that individual birds feeding on the same stretch of river may have very different blood lead levels. The considerable variation between individual birds can only be accounted for by differences in the amount of particulate lead ingested by each individual bird. Such variation is not consistent with the uptake of dissolved lead direct from water, and this must be discounted."

The 1981 report does, however, acknowledge that the problem of lead poisoning by anglers' weights seems to be particularly acute in waterways which do not have an abundance of aquatic vegetation, often as a consequence of an increase in river traffic. The report suggests that this may occur because discarded or spilt shot may remain more easily accessible to swans where vegetation is sparse.

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the areas within the southern and eastern counties of England and the parts of northern England and Scotland where the swan population has increased over the last 10 years giving numbers and percentage figures where available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Information on increases in the swan population over the last 10 years is not available. However, the Wildfowl Trust conducted a national census in 1978 and again in 1983. In this five-year period the overall population increased by 7 per cent. The following counties in England and Scotland showed increases of over 10 per cent. in the period:

County (old boundaries)	Number of Swans		Percentage Increase
	1978	1983
England
Northumberland	221	300	36
Westmorland	54	93	72
Yorkshire, West Riding	191	227	19
Lancashire	195	331	70
Lincolnshire	511	714	40
Leicester and Rutland	144	268	86
Northampton	186	338	82
Cambridge	322	422	31
Norfolk	999	1,299	30
Suffolk	375	535	43
Buckingham	208	255	22
Hertford	262	294	12
Sussex	615	795	29
Hampshire	801	1,029	28
Wiltshire	622	699	12
Devon	320	570	78
Scotland
Orkney	274	323	18
Aberdeen	208	324	56
Clackmannan	4	8	100
Ayr	69	82	19
West Lothian	8	9	12
East Lothian	83	107	29
Berwick	44	49	11
Kirkcudbright	129	197	53

In addition, the following counties showed increases over 10 per cent., but in these cases either the census coverage was poor or the figures are regarded as suspect from other knowledge, and the figures must be treated with caution: Durham (51 per cent.), Yorkshire, North Riding

(230 per cent.), Shropshire (41 per cent.), Stafford (55 per cent.), Essex (53 per cent.), Somerset (27 per cent.), Cornwall (136 per cent.), Inverness (59 per cent.), Kincardine (200 per cent.), Stirling (183 per cent.), Kinross (100 per cent.), Lanark (209 per cent.), Dumfries (160 per cent.).

Washington, Easington and Aycliffe

55. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the future of Washington, Easington, and Aycliffe new towns.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I refer the hon. Member to the answer which I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster).

Olympic Games

56. Mr. Denis Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent discussions he has held with the British Olympic Association about a bid to hold a future Olympic Games in the United Kingdom; and what financial commitment will be made by the Government in support of any such bid.

Mr. Macfarlane: I asked officers of the British Olympic Association for their assessment of the likelihood of staging the games in this country between now and the end of the century. I have made no offer of financial resources.

Departmental Achievements

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list his Department's principal achievements since 1979.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I have today placed in the Library copies of a detailed report which brings together accounts of the various measures taken by my Department between April 1984 and March 1985. This report supplements the earlier documents covering the periods May 1979 to April 1983 and April 1983 to April 1984 which were provided pursuant to the replies to my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) on 3 May 1983 and 9 May 1984 respectively; all three documents should be read together for the full list of measures since 1979. The principal achievements since April 1984 have been:

LOCAL GOVERNMENT

— the passing of the Rates Act 1984 and the subsequent protection of ratepayers in 18 local authorities from high rate increases;

— the continuation of downward pressure on high spending authorities in the rate support grant settlement for 1985-86. Rate increases in 1984-85 were the lowest for 10 years and are likely to average single figures again in 1985-86;

—the passing of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act, paving the way for the abolition of the GLC and metropolitan county councils in 1986. The Local Government Bill, containing the main abolition provisions, completed its Commons stages on 28 March;

—the setting up of an inquiry into the conduct of local authority business and the undertaking of new studies into the system of local government finance.

HOUSING

—a continuing rise in owner-occupation—an increase of more than 1·5 million between May 1979 and March 1985;

— further encouragement of council house sales and the introduction of a new system of building control in the Housing and Building Control Act 1984. 814,000 council, new town and housing association dwellings have now been sold under the Government's right-to-buy and voluntary sales schemes;

—more than 71,000 low-cost home ownership sales by public authorities;

—£740 million is expected to be spent on home improvement grants in 1984-85, a total of 200,000 grants; 85,000 local authority and new town dwellings renovated in 1984-85.

INNER CITIES

— continued support for inner area renewal and the encouragement of enterprise, with £338 million devoted to the urban programme in 1984-85;

—the approval of projects worth nearly £365 million in capital investment for urban development grant: grant offers of £67·89 million have attracted £295 million of private sector investment, since 1983-84;

— rapid progress by the London Docklands and Merseyside Development Corporation in the regeneration of their areas. By end 1985-86 some £360 million of public money will have been spent. LDDC has so far attracted £860 million of private investment. In Liverpool the successful International Garden Festival was held during 1984, attracting 3·3 million visitors;

—further increases in the resources for the reclamation of derelict land which have tripled from £23·5 million in 1979-80 to £76·4 million in 1985-86. Schemes have been approved for the reclamation of about 1,500 hectares in 1984-85.

ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION

—following a United Kingdom initiative, agreement was reached in the EC Environment Council in March 1985 on a directive requiring the introduction of unleaded petrol by 1 October 1989. The Department reached an agreement with the Paintmakers' Association to eliminate lead additives from their decorative paints;

—agreement to two EC directives on combating air pollution from industrial plants and on air quality standards for nitrogen dioxide; the publication of a White Paper on acid rain;

—enactment with other members of the European Community of a directive to control transfrontier movements of hazardous wastes;

—decision taken on major capital investment to achieve large reduction in radioactive discharges from Sellafield.

PLANNING AND REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

—further steps proposed to simplify and improve the operating efficiency of the town and country planning system;

—record level of grant commitment secured in 1984 from the quota section of the European regional development fund (£181 million) for English local and public authorities which provide infrastructure services.

THE RURAL AND BUILT HERITAGE

—major increases announced in the level of grant aid to be made available in 1985-86 to the Nature Conservancy council and the Countryside Commission — a measure of the high priority attached by the Government to nature and countryside conservation;

—a further £25 million given to the National Heritage Memorial Fund to secure the future of Kedleston hall, Weston park and Nostell priory, and their contents, for the nation.

WATER

—increased investment by regional water authorities projected to increase from £799 million in 1984-85 to £964 million in 1987-88, a rising proportion to be directed towards the repair and restoration of underground assets; —extension of water pollution controls to protect all inland, esturial, coastal and underground waters.

GOVERNMENT ESTATE

—an increase in the extent to which the Property Services Agency has its work undertaken by the private sector. All new construction, 85 per cent. by value of maintenance and 60 per cent. of new design work are now placed with private contractors and consultants.

EC Directives

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report the details of each directive from the European Economic Community relevant to his Department for each year since and including 1979; and what subsequent action he took in respect of each.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: My Department has the primary responsibility for the following directives which have been adopted since 1979. They have been, are being, or will be implemented by administrative or statutory means as indicated.

Number	Subject matter	Method of implementation
79/409	Conservation of wild birds	The Nature Conservancy Council has identified some 150 sites which might qualify for listing as special protection areas under Article 4. An initial list of seven areas was forwarded to the Commission on 31 August 1982 and a further batch of sites will be forwarded for listing shortly. Bird protection measures in Great Britain under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 comply with the Directive. Orders in Council to implement the Directive in Northern Ireland were laid before Parliament on 22 November 1984. They will become effective on 14 April 1985.
79/869	Frequency of sampling and analysis of surface water intended for abstraction for drinking purposes	This Directive does not, save in certain minor respects, change existing practices, and was implemented in a circular letter to statutory water undertakers in March 1982.
79/923	Quality of shellfish waters	To date 29 waters have been identified under this Directive, and consideration is being given to identifying further waters in response to the Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution's request. Arrangements are in hand for the preparation of reports on the quality of shellfish waters for the Commission of the European Communities.
80/68	Protection of groundwater	A Joint Circular (DOE 4/82, WO 7/82) was issued on 1 March 1982. The provisions of the Directive are being implemented by the use of the Control of Pollution Act 1974.
80/778	Quality of water for human consumption	This Directive is being implemented under existing legislation and reinforces existing policy and procedures. Circular letters have been issued to statutory water undertakers and two Departmental Circulars (DOE 20/82 and DOE 25/84) to local authorities explaining how the Directive is to be implemented in detail. Action is well in hand to ensure that all public water supplies comply with the terms of the Directive by 15 July this year when it comes into operation.
80/779	Air quality for SO2 and particulates	Ambient smoke levels, in areas of the country which have not, hitherto, introduced smoke control, need to be brought down by 1939, to comply with this Directive. My Department published a Circular in 1981 (DOE 11/81) on new procedures for smoke control, and has subsequently pressed relevant local authorities to introduce smoke control programmes.
82/176	Mercury discharges from chloralkali industry	This Directive has been implemented and in the United Kingdom consents to discharge have been set in accordance with the standards in the Directive.
82/242	Biodegradability of non-ionic surfactants Amending directive 73/404	This Directive is applied in the United Kingdom by Regulations (SI 1984/1369) made under the European Communities Act 1972.
82/243	Biodegradability of anionic surfactants Amending directive 73/405	This Directive permits the use of a new test method and is implemented by the same Regulations (SI 1984/1369) as those for the Directive on the biodegradability of non-ionic detergents.
82/883	Monitoring of wastes from Ti02 industry	This Directive sets out more explicitly the monitoring requirements of Article 7 of the 1978 Directive on waste from the titanium dioxide industry. The monitoring called for in the 1982 Directive is being carried out.
82/884	Limit value for lead in air	Evidence from earlier monitoring suggests that there are unlikely to be any breaches of the air quality standard imposed by this Directive. My Department has, however, purchased monitoring equipment complying with the Directive's specification, and is seeking the co-operation of local authorities in industrial areas, to monitor for lead in accordance with the Directive's requirements.
83/29	Amending 78/176 on Ti02 waste	This Directive is a procedural device for changing the time-limit by which the Commission of the European Communities might bring forward proposals under Article 9 of Directive 78/176/EEC.
83/129	Seal pup skins and products	The Directive is enforced in the United Kingdom through a Modification Order to the Endangered Species (Import and Export) Act 1976 which came into operation on 26 November 1983. As a result of the Directive, and other measures, very few young harp or hooded seal pups were taken in the Northern Atlantic during 1983 or 1984.
83/513	Cadmium discharges	This Directive was adopted in September 1983. It applies to discharges of sewage and industrial waste and is to be implemented by 1 January 1986. No delay is expected, although the number of individual discharges to be identified is large.

Number	Subject matter	Method of implementation
84/156	Mercury discharges other than from the chloralkali electrolysis industry	This Directive was adopted in March 1984 and is to be implemented by 1 July 1986. It completes the earlier Directive on discharge of mercury from the chloralkali electrolysis industry.
84/360	Air pollution from industrial plants	This Directive describes a system of air-pollution control broadly similarly to that already exercised by the Industrial Air Pollution Inspectorate, in respect of major industrial plants. The Directive, however, covers certain industrial plants within local authority control, and authorities will need new powers in order to ensure that the United Kingdom complies fully with the Directive. The question of new powers is being considered as part of the review of clean air legislation which is presently being undertaken.
84/491	Discharges of hexachlorocyclohexane	This Directive was adopted on 9 October 1984 and is due to be implemented by 1 April 1986. Work on its implementation is proceeding well and a Circular implementing this Directive and EC Directive 84/156 will be issued later this year.
84/631	Transfrontier shipment of hazardous waste	This Directive provides for pre-notification of intended transfrontier shipment of hazardous waste and for a consignment note to travel with the waste. It is to be implemented by 1 October 1985. A Working Group in Brussels has just finishing preparing the documentation which will be used. The Government intend shortly to consult on draft regulations which will designate the competent authorities involved define their duties and identify the materials which will be controlled.
85/ (not yet allocated)	Air quality standards for NO2	This Directive was adopted in January. My Department plans to extend monitoring of nitrogen dioxide in urban areas, to comply with the directive.

Non-Toxic Split Lead Shot

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he intends to take with manufacturers of non-toxic lead and representatives of angling bodies to ensure that suitable and effective non-toxic split lead shot is available to anglers before he considers legislation on this matter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Nature Conservancy Council held a meeting in January this year to review all recent evidence on swan deaths and populations and progress towards the development of alternatives to lead fishing weights. I am currently considering its report and I will make a statement in due course. Meanwhile, however, the NCC, together with representatives of manufacturers of alternatives to lead fishing weights and national angling organisations, has set up a small working group to look into the speeding-up of testing, developing and introduction of alternatives to lead fishing weights.

Horse Breeding and Rearing (Rating)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether he will introduce legislation to reverse the decision in November 1984 of the Lands Tribunal in the case of Whitsbury manor stud so as to define that for the purposes of section 26 of the General Rate Act 1967 the breeding and rearing of horses is an agricultural operation on agricultural land; and whether he will make a statement;

(2) what representations he has received from the Thoroughbred Breeders Association to the effect that legal definitions of horse breeding and rearing on stud farms contained in rating law should be harmonised with the definitions for the purposes of capital transfer tax contained in the Finance Act 1984; and what reply he has given.

Mr. Waldegrave: I met a delegation, led by my hon. Friend the Member for Devizes, (Mr. Morrison) and including the chairman of the Thoroughbred Breeders Association, last December to discuss these issues and I am considering the representations they made. I understand that the ratepayers in the Whitsbury manor stud case intend to challenge the decision of the Lands Tribunal in the Court of Appeal.

Enterprise Zones

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the total average of Government direct and indirect expenditure per annum on enterprise zones; how many new firms now operate in such zones; and how many jobs have so far been created;

(2) by what percentage, in real terms, rate revenues from enterprise zones have risen since 1980;

(3) by what percentage, in real terms, rate revenues have risen annually since 1980 in areas (a) inside and (b) outside enterprise zones.

Sir George Young: The only enterprise zone measure for which the expenditure borne by central Government can be stated precisely is the exemption from rates. The cost of this (at outturn prices) has been:

1981-82 £3,508,770 (seven zones).
1982-83 £8,069,839 (eight zones).
1983-84 £10,377,343 (seventeen zones).
1984-85 £5,837,863 (advance payments as at July 1984) (seventeen zones).
Final figures for 1984-85 are not yet available.

The consultants who monitored progress in the first 11 zones reported that on the basis of surveys carried out between the date of designation of the zones and 31 May 1983 some 8,065 jobs had been created in the zones. In addition, they estimated that a further 2,885 jobs had been created in the period 31 May to 31 December 1983. During the whole period they reported that 1,024 firms had moved into the enterprise zones; 60 per cent. of the firms that moved in before 31 May 1983 were new ones.

The numbers of firms and jobs in all 17 English zones are being gathered but are not presently available.

The cost of rates revenue foregone from the first eight English enterprise zones has risen at the following rate:

	Percentage over previous year (at constant prices) percentage
1982-83	115·7
1983-84	23·2

For the same years, revenues from non-domestic rates increased by 6·8 per cent. and 2·4 per cent. in real terms respectively in all England.

No comparable figures can yet be produced for the 17 English zones now in existence. Nor is information available about the increase in general tax revenue in the enterprise zones.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much in total the rate support grant was in 1983-84; and what percentage of this total went to the authorities in the 10 largest cities.

Mr. Waldegrave: The total of rate support grants payable under the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) (No. 3) 1983-84 is £9,075 million. 10·7 per cent. of this went to the 10 largest district councils outside London-Birmingham, Leeds, Sheffield, Liverpool, Bradford, Manchester, Bristol, Kirklees, Wirral and Coventry.

Urban Development

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much Her Majesty's Government spent on urban development schemes in 1983-84; and if he will provide a detailed breakdown of this figure.

Sir George Young: My Department gave approval to urban development grant of £37 million in respect of 72 projects in 1983-84. The estimated total costs of these projects, including private sector investment, are more than £227 million and the expenditure, both private and public, will be spread over several years. These figures do not include offers of grant which have not been taken up. Lists of individual projects approved for UDG are regularly placed in the Library of the House, most recently last December. I am arranging for the list to be updated.

International Conference Centre, Westminster

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the latest estimated capital cost per square foot of the new international conference centre at Westminster.

Sir George Young: £146 per square foot. This is based on the current estimated cost of the construction of the centre, including fixed equipment. It does not include landscaping or fitting out the parliamentary telephone exchange.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Environment to what use the lowest of the three floors of the new international conference centre at Westminster will be put.

Sir George Young: The ICC's telephone exchange will be in the lowest of the three basements.

Space previously earmarked for an extension of the parliamentary telephone exchange may be used to provide storage for the conference centre.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimates he has made of the potential demand for facilities in the new international conference centre at Westminster; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The centre's primary function will be to accommodate Government conferences of all kinds, national as well as international. At other times, its facilities will be made available to other users on commercial terms.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what are the estimated annual running costs of the new international conference centre at Westminister;

(2) which existing facilities the new international conference centre at Westminister is designed to replace or supplement; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what is the projected rate of return on capital of the new international conference centre at Westminister; and how this figure has been calculated.

Sir George Young: The new conference centre is being built to meet the Government's need for major international conferences for which existing facilities are inadequate. A business plan is being prepared which will include a detailed assessment of prospective revenue and costs and the opportunities for relinquishing any surplus property held on lease.

Non-Domestic Property (Rating Revaluation)

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has now abandoned the proposals in the White Paper on rates issued in 1983 to undertake a revaluation of non-domestic property.

Mr. Waldegrave: No.

Sports Events (Violence)

Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a progress report with regard to steps being taken by his Department to reduce violence at football and other sporting events.

Mr. Macfarlane: I shall answer this question shortly.

Water Industry (Privatisation)

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress he has made with his examination of the scope for introducing a measure of privatisation into the water industry.

Mr. Gow: On 1 April I sent a discussion paper to water authority chairmen. At this early stage I am anxious to obtain the initial views of the water authorities and water companies on the many complex issues that need to be addressed.

I am placing a copy of the discussion paper in the Library of the House. It is not a formal consultation document. Its purpose is to identify the issues which need to be considered on which the water authorities' views will be valued before I consult more widely.

Council House Sales

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will update the table giving information on sales of dwellings by each local authority in England, which was referred to in the answer given to the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire on 19 February, Official Report, column 412.

Mr. Gow: I have today placed in the Library the latest figures, to which my hon. Friend refers, giving information reported by each local authority in England on the progress of council house sales to the end of December 1984.

Rent Acts (Prosecutions)

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many private landlords have been prosecuted under the Rent Acts for each of the past 10 years; and under what sections.

Mr. Mellor: I have been asked to reply.

Records available to us may be incomplete because they cover only prosecutions by the police, and do not separately identify offences by private landlords. The available information is given in the following tables.

Construction (Expenditure Statistics)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has concerning per capita expenditure upon construction in the latest year for which figures are available in United States dollar equivalents in the following countries: United Kingdom, Canada, France, Japan, the Federal Republic of Germany and the United States of America.

Mr. Gow [pursuant to his answer, 29 March 1985, c. 397]: The available information, in United States dollar equivalents* is given in the table:

New Construction† Per Capita in 1982

	$ per capita
United Kingdom	820
France‡	1,160
United States of America	1,200
Federal Republic of Germany	1,370
Canada	1,750
Japan	1,970

* Figures converted to United States dollar equivalents using purchasing power parities.
† Figures exclude repair and maintenance work. In the United Kingdom this would add substantially to the figure given above.

It is difficult to make valid international comparisons of construction work because of different population densities; different rates of population growth; differing purchasing powers; different costs of construction; and differing rate of economic growth. These factors would all contribute to an apparent lower level of spending on new construction in the United Kingdom than in other countries.

In addition, the United Kingdom has a considerable legacy of housing and other infrastructure from the 19th and earlier 20th century, the substantial cost of whose repair and maintenance is not reflected in the figures given.

The Government's economic policies have, since 1981, contributed to an 8 per cent. growth in GDP; an 18 per cent. growth in total fixed investment; a 10 per cent. rise in total construction industry output; and a 15·6 per cent rise in output by the construction industry for the private sector—excluding housing repair and maintenance.

DEFENCE

Service Bands

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of engagements of each service band in 1984 together with the number which were (i) essential for reasons of state, (ii) reasonably necessary for strictly military duties, (iii) for public entertainment and (iv) for private entertainment, including performance at mess and on other service occasions;

(2) whether he will publish in the Official Report a list of the service bands together with the total number of bandsmen and the total number of military and other persons employed directly or indirectly in training, provisioning, transporting, housing and paying them, including the contingent liability to pension payment.

Mr. Lee: The following table lists all service bands and the personnel in each. Figures showing their engagements are not kept centrally in the form requested, but the number which were fee-paying are listed.

The number of individuals employed in training service bands is as follows:

Army	51*
RAF	Full time: 6
	Part time: 8
Royal Marines	Full time: 40
	Part time: 16

* Training also takes place at junior musician training units; those that can be accounted for in training bandsmen cannot be separately identified.

The number of individuals employed in provisioning, transporting, housing and paying bands personnel cannot be separately identified from those employed on these tasks for the benefit of service men as a whole in the units which they serve.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the total direct and indirect costs of retaining service bands including the costs of accommodation, transportation, training, recruitment, victualling, pay and all allowances of any kind, and contingent pension cost; and how much of this cost is incurred overseas.

Mr. Lee: Costs are not available in the detailed format requested as many of the sub categories identified cannot readily be separated from amongst the overall costs of units of which the bands form but a part. However, the current costs for all service bands, in the following broad categories, can be estimated—primarily on the basis of present capitation rates—as follows:

	£ million
Personnel Costs (including Pay, ERNIC and Personal Allowances)	25·5
Support Costs (including movements, basic training and office support costs)	5·3

Contingent pension costs are estimated at £5·2 million.

Services (Musical Requirements)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will consider contracting out part of the services' musical requirements to colliery and other bands of high standing.

Mr. Lee: No.

Services (Catering)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what progress he has made in contracting out the services' catering requirements; and if he will publish in the Official Report the total numbers employed directly and indirectly in catering now and when he took office; and if he will provide similar figures for the value of the catering contracted out.

Mr. Lee: Catering contracts have been let at nine static units, and more than 50 other service establishments and some staff restaurants are being considered for contracting out. Full details of the numbers of staff employed in catering are not available and cannot be provided without disproportionate effort, but more than 300 posts have been saved by contracting out. The cost of contracting out catering in 1979 was about £1 million and is now £4 million.

Services (Transport Requirements)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what progress he has made in contracting out the transport requirements of the services where these are not part of the war establishment of field formations below corps, and so on level; and if he will publish in the Official Report the reduction in the numbers of such general service vehicles since he took office together with the increase in the value of transportation contracted out.

Mr. Lee: A number of feasibility studies are in progress for the contracting out of the transport requirements of the services, but the reduction in the numbers of vehicles and the value of transportation contracted out so far are minimal.

Royal Navy (Ships)

Mr. Garrett asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Royal Navy ships will be taken out of service over the next 10 years; and how many will be replaced by new ships.

Mr. Lee: It is not the practice to give operational and planning details of this kind. However, I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) on 1 March at column 299, which outlined the Government's policy on the future strength of the Royal Navy.

Territorial Army

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list in the Official Report those Territorial Army infantry units that do not have their own unit transport with the reasons in each case; what plans he has for changing the situation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: All Territorial Army infantry battalions have their own unit transport.

West German Border (Barrier)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation last considered the possibility of the construction in peacetime of a physical barrier along the West German border with Eastern Europe; what forms of barrier were considered; what were the costings; what assessment was made of the potential impact of the construction of such a barrier on Union of Soviet Socialist Republics' policy regarding the use of nuclear weapons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: As I said in my reply to the hon. Member's question on 18 March, at column 407, no physical barrier along the West German border with East Germany could ever be certain to be impenetrable. Our researches have revealed no detailed consideration by NATO of the construction of such a barrier since the Alliance's present strategy of flexible response was adopted in 1967.

Naval Dockyards

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the number of naval dockyard employees during the period covering April to June 1982, July 1982 to December 1982, the whole of 1983 and 1984, respectively; and on what factors he has based his proposal to initiate a scheme of privatisation of the remaining naval dockyards.

Mr. Lee: During the periods in question the average numbers of civilian employees in the royal dockyards were as follows:

	Numbers
April-June 1982	29,638
July-December 1982	28,820
January-December 1983	27,038
January-December 1984	24,159

We are at present considering possible future arrangements for managing the royal dockyards. No decisions have yet been taken. A wide range of factors are involved, including national security and the need to ensure that the taxpayer receives best value for money.

Dockyards (Privatisation)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many civilian companies have expressed interest to his Department in administering the remaining dockyards which he intends to privatise; and what consultations he intends to seek with dockyard trade union labour representatives about the terms of employment and conditions they are willing to offer.

Mr. Lee: No such decision on future arrangements for the royal dockyards has been taken. However, of more than 20 companies approached in the course of studies last year, on an informal basis and without commitment, over half expressed initial interest in the concept of commercial operation of the dockyards. We have made it clear that there will be a period of consultation before any major decisions are taken.

Nuclear Weapons (Radioactive Fallout)

Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has as to the known lowest altitude at which nuclear weapons can be safely detonated in space so as to avoid self-contamination by radioactive fallout.

Mr. Lee: I regret that it is not possible to answer this question since we have no definition of the phrase "safely detonated in space" nor the word "self-contamination". If the hon. Gentleman wishes to write to me, I will endeavour to send him a full reply.

Main Battle Tank

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to invite tenders to build models of the new main battle tank; and if this will take place within the next year.

Mr. Lee: The options on a new main battle tank continue to be the subject of study. It is highly unlikely that industry will be invited to tender for models of a new main battle tank within the next year.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence which companies will be invited to tender for the new main battle tank; and in which year he expects to announce a decision on the tenders.

Mr. Lee: It is too early to give any meaningful answer on this subject, but all firms with the necessary expertise will be considered.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what basis the Government invited private sector companies to submit evaluation studies for the new main battle tank.

Mr. Lee: In 1982-83 the Department invited companies concerned with armoured fighting vehicles building to submit their ideas on main battle tank concepts which should meet the possible requirements of the British Army from the mid-1990s into the next century, together with time and cost data. These inputs form part of the present studies in the Department.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what he estimates to be the value of the final contract for the new main battle tank for the British Army.

Mr. Lee: It is far too early to give any meaningful answer on the subject.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what role the defence procurement section is to have in the examination of the evaluation studies for the new main battle tank for the British Army.

Mr. Lee: The procurement executive will continue to fulfil its normal role of technical and procurement evaluation of options available.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what role the defence procurement section is to take in the award of the final contract for building the new main battle tank; and in which year he expects to announce such a decision.

Mr. Lee: The procurement executive would carry out its normal role of technical and procurement evaluation of available options. It is too early to forecast any final contract time scales.

RAF Trainer

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether, before the announcement to the House on Thursday 21 March of the contract for the Royal Air Force trainer which had been awarded to Shorts, Belfast, he had received a tender price from British Aerospace £3·5 million or more less than the price accepted by him from Shorts, Belfast.

Mr. Butler: No.

RAF Molesworth

Mrs. Clywd asked the Secretary of State for Defence why permission has been refused for the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament to use fields surrounding RAF Molesworth for the forthcoming Easter demonstration.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his answer, 18 March 1985, c. 412]: It is not the Ministry of Defence's practice to make land or facilities available for the purpose of protest. However, in order to assist the civil police in their efforts to minimise the inconvenience to local people likely to be caused by demonstrations at Molesworth this Easter, some unfenced surplus land near Molesworth is being made available to the civil police at their request. The civil police have authority, should they decide it would assist them in controlling events, to allow CND organisers on to this land in the Easter period.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Banking Act (Short-term Securities)

Mr. Eggar asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he intends to introduce the secondary legislation that he announced in his Budget speech to remove the constraint under the Banking Act which at present prevents companies from financing themselves by a series of issues of short-term securities.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The necessary regulations under the Banking Act have today been laid before the House.

These regulations will facilitate issues of sterling bonds by companies whose shares are listed on the Stock Exchange or dealt in on the unlisted securities market. In the light of representations made since the Chancellor's announcement, issues by the wholly-owned financing subsidiaries of such companies (provided that the subsidiary in question is not a UK private company) will be treated in the same way, on condition that the parent company gives its guarantee. The regulations will permit such companies and subsidiaries to issue bonds in circumstances where they would at present be prevented by the Banking Act, subject to the bonds being offered by prospectus or having a full listing. Such bonds must be denominated in sterling; they must have a minimum maturity of one year; the minimum deposit accepted in respect of each bond should be £100,000, and the bonds should be transferable only in amounts with an aggregate redemption value of not less than £100,000; and any interest or dividend in respect of any bonds of this kind issued on or before 28 August 1985 must be payable not before 28 August 1985 and not later than six months from the date of issue. Bonds can carry either fixed or floating rates of interest and may be issued in either the domestic capital market or in the eurosterling market.

An order has also been laid today, further amending the Control of Borrowing Order 1958. This will require companies wishing to make issues of sterling bonds with a maturity of between one and five years to obtain the prior approval of the Bank of England for the timing of the issue, or the period during which such bonds are to be issued and the aggregate amount of the money to be raised during that period. The bank has indicated in a guidance notice issued to the market on 19 March that, in order to give companies maximum flexibility over timing, consent will normally be given for imediate issue of bonds in this maturity area.

The regulations and order will take effect on 24 April 1985. They will be published as statutory instruments Nos. 564 and 565 of 1985.

Public Sector Exchange Cover Scheme

Mr. Merchant asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has made any amendments to the terms of the public sector exchange cover scheme.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The scope of official exchange risk cover available to eligible bodies on new floating interest rate foreign currency borrowing has been broadened. Cover is now available to eligible bodies on such borrowing at a ¼ per cent. discount to variable NLF and PWLB rates. The terms announced on 7 November 1983, at column 9, which allowed for floating rate borrowing to be covered at the same guaranteed benefit on fixed rate NLF/PWLB rates as is already available where borrowing is at fixed foreign currency interest rates, are unaffected.

Business Expansion Scheme

Mr. Alton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total number of individual taxpayers to benefit by gaining tax relief under the business expansion scheme in 1983-84; and what was their average investment.

Mr. Moore: Almost 20,000 taxpayers made investments under the scheme in 1983-84. The average investment was about £5,000.

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will provide an estimate of the number of new jobs created by the business expansion scheme since its inception; and what is the cost of each new job created in this way.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 21 March 1985, c. 604]: Further to my replies of 18 March 1985, at columns 395-96, it is now estimated that in 1983-84 about £100 million was invested under the scheme in over 500 companies. The direct revenue cost of tax relief was about £50 million. It is not possible to estimate how many new jobs were created as a result of business expansion scheme investments, though information about just over 300 of the companies receiving investments indicates that these employ a total of nearly 9,000 people. It is too early to provide information in respect of 1984-85 investments.

Income Tax

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the figures tabulating the extra revenue obtained from the higher rate of income tax bands, in each year since 1978-79, at current and constant prices.

Mr. Moore: Estimates of the income tax due from the higher rate income tax bands in excess of basic rate liability are as follows. The figures exclude yield from the investment income surcharge.

	£ million
	at Current Prices	*at 1978-79 prices
1978-79	810	810
1979-80	780	675
1980-81	980	730
1981-82	1,350	900
1982-83	1,420	880
1983-84†	1,440	860
1984-85†	1,675	950
1985-86†	1,880	1,010

* The column has been expressed in 1978-79 prices using the retail price index.
† Provisional.

Mr. Maples asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the expected total of yield of the higher rates of income tax for 1985-86.

Mr. Moore: The yield of income tax at higher rates due in respect of 1985-86 incomes is estimated at £4,730 million (of which £1,880 million is in respect of liability in excess of the basic rate element).

Mr. Maples asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the expected yield in the 1984-85 tax year from higher rate income tax in respect of taxpayers whose highest marginal rate of tax is (a) 40 per cent. (b) 45 per cent., (c) 50 per cent., (d) 55 per cent. and (e) 60 per cent., respectively.

Mr. Moore: The yields of income tax, both at higher rates and at the excess of those rates over the basic rate element, due in respect of 1984-85 incomes are estimated as follows:

	Tax due
Taxpayer's marginal rate of tax Per cent.	at higher rates (£ million)	at excess over basic rate (£ million)
40	180	45
45	500	140
50	680	230
55	520	200
60	2,330	1,060
Total	4,210	1,675

Each row of the table is independent and shows the yield of tax at all higher rates from taxpayers with the specified marginal rate.

Mr. Rooker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will now update his answer to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr of 27 March 1984, Official Report, Column 109, by giving information about the reductions in the basic rate of income tax which would be necessary to restore tax payments to their 1978-79 levels in 1985-86.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 29 March 1985, c. 369.]: Estimates for 1984-85 and 1985-86 are in the table. The figures for 1984-85 have been revised to include estimates of indirect tax payments based on the most recent family expenditure survey.

Real take home pay for these illustrative households will be over 11 per cent. higher in 1985-86 than it was in 1978-79.

Notes to Tables
Average earnings are taken to be the average gross weekly earnings of all full time males on adult rates with pay unaffected by absence. Figures for 1984-85 and 1985-86 are illustrative and assume growth of 7½ and 7 per cent. respectively.
2. Income tax payments are calculated on the assumption that households have no other tax relief apart from the standard allowances. Earners are assumed to be contracted-in for NI purposes.
3. Indirect tax payments are estimates based on the 1983 family expenditure survey. Because of sampling variation, there can be substantial differences between the estimates obtained from different years' surveys.

Mr. Straw asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report tables showing (a) the proportion in percentage terms, (b) the amount in current prices, and (c) the amount in constant 1984-85 prices of personal income taken by taxation and rates for the year 1985-86, taking account of any changes announced in his Budget statement and any previously announced changes, and for each of the years, 1978-79, 1979-80, 1980-81, 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 for each level of average earnings, each category of taxpayer, and each category of taxation and rates, in the manner of the answer of 21 March 1984, Official Report, columns 480-86.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 19 March 1985, c. 465]: Figures for all the years requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Figures for the years 1983-84 to 1985-86 are in the tables.

Notes:

1. Income tax payments are calculated on the assumption that households have no other tax relief apart from the standard allowances. Earners, including earning wives, are assumed to pay class 1 NI contributions at the contracted-in rate. The figures for NI contributions are financial year averages.

2. Average earnings are taken to be the average gross weekly earnings of all full time males on adult rates with pay unaffected by absence. Figures for 1984-85 and 1985-86 are illustrative estimates which assume growth of 7½ and 7 per cent. respectively.

3. In order to facilitate comparisons with the other household types, the working couple are assumed to have joint earnings of the various multiples of average male earnings. In calculating income tax and NIC payments it is assumed that the joint earnings are split between husband and wife in the ratio 60:40.

4. For the married couple with two children, the percentage column expresses taxes etc. as percentages of gross earnings plus child benefit. For this purpose, financial year averages are used for child benefit.

5. The figures for indirect taxes are estimates based on the 1983 Family Expenditure Survey. Estimates cannot reliably be made outside the income range for which figures are shown. In practice, there are quite wide variations in spending patterns between households with similar incomes and compositions and because of sampling variation, there can also be substantial differences between the estimates obtained from different years' family expenditure surveys. The category "other indirect taxes" includes the indirect effects of taxes levied on businesses, such as duty on derv and the national insurance surcharge.

Broad and Narrow Money

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to his answer of 5 March, Official Report, columns 495-96, concerning the supply of broad money and narrow money in the United Kingdom and certain other countries, whether he will publish a table in the Official Report showing the figures deflated by the increase in output or money gross domestic product.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The money supply data underlying the growth rates given in the previous answer were taken from financial statistics—for the United Kingdom—and from the IMF's international financial statistics — for other countries. Precise definitions were given in the footnotes to the table. The data on money GNP needed to construct estimates of velocity can also be found in international financial statistics (line 99a).

Tax Revenue

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will show the estimated yield in 1985-86 from the following: (a) road fuel duty, (b) vehicle excise duty, (c) car tax, (d) value added tax on vehicle sales and (e) value added tax on petrol and derv sales.

Mr. Hayhoe: Estimates are as follows:

	1985-86 (£ million)
(a) Road fuel duty	6,300
(b) Vehicle excise duty	2,500
(c) Car tax	760
(d) Value added tax on vehicle sales	1,550
(e) Value added tax on petrol and Derv sales	1,050

Mr. Steen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) by what percentage, in real terms, tax revenues from enterprise zones have risen since 1980;

(2) by what percentage, in real terms, tax revenues have risen annually since 1980 in areas (a) totally and (b) outside enterprise zones.

Mr. Moore: I regret that no information relating to the tax revenues from enterprise zones is available.

Mr. Steen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the percentages of total tax revenue in 1982-83 and 1983-84 derived from income generated through the ownership of stocks, including shares, bonds and gilts.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Bloodstock Breeders

Mr. Latham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what action he intends to take to assist United Kingdom bloodstock breeders within the European Community regarding the method by which France treats bloodstock for the purposes of value added tax following infraction proceedings;

(2) whether he will place in the Library a copy of the letter sent by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 30

August 1979 to the chairman of the Bloodstock and Race Horse Industries Confederation Ltd. in which he indicated that the Government would give further and urgent consideration to the problems of the bloodstock industry if early progress was not made within the European Community to harmonise the treatment of value added tax on bloodstock; and what action arose from that consideration;

(3) what action he intends to take to assist United Kingdom bloodstock breeders within the European Community regarding the continuing exemption by the Republic of Ireland of bloodstock sales from value added tax.

Mr. Hayhoe: A copy of the letter to which my hon. Friend refers has been placed in the Library. The VAT treatment of bloodstock is governed by the EC sixth directive on the harmonisation of VAT and the position in the United Kingdom conforms to the directive. Partly because of pressure from the United Kingdom Government, the EC Commission brought infraction proceedings before the European Court against France in respect of its system of charging VAT only on the carcase value of bloodstock. As a result, France is understood now to charge VAT on the full selling price, though at a reduced rate, which is permitted under the sixth directive. Ireland's exemption in respect of bloodstock is permitted under a temporary derogation from the directive. However, the EC Commission has recently published proposals for its abolition, along with other derogations, in the draft eighteenth directive on VAT. Customs and Excise is currently consulting bloodstock interests in order that the industry's views may be fully taken into account in EC discussions on the Commission's proposals, which would require the unanimous agreement of all member states before being adopted.

Economic Growth

Mr. Steen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average rate of economic growth in 1960, 1970, 1975, 1980, 1983 and 1984 in (a) Great Britain and (b) each of the 10 largest cities in Great Britain.

Mr. Peter Rees: Estimates of average growth rate for the United Kingdom, for each year from 1949 to 1983, were published in table 3.14 (page 33) in the 1984 edition of "United Kingdom National Accounts".

Estimates for 10 largest cities are not available.

Capital (Export)

Mr. Steen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much capital was exported from Great Britain in each year from 1980 to 1984.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Net capital movements are identical in size to the total balance on the current account of the balance of payments, although they are recorded in the accounts with the reverse sign. The figures are as follows:

	£ million
1980	3,477
1981	6,929
1982	4,934
1983	2,543
1984	51

Positive figures here represent current account surpluses and net capital outflows.

Capital Investment

Mr. Steen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the total level of capital investment in 1983-84.

Mr. Peter Rees: The latest national accounts statistics show total fixed investment in the economy of £50·9 billion in the financial year 1983-84.

Covenants

Mr. Freud asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will list in the Official Report (a) the cost of administering covenants to students and their parents, (b) the average repayment from his Department under the covenant system and (c) the annual amount paid out in total, and the number of payments, in each case for each of the last three years.

Mr. Moore: Estimates are available only for 1983-84.

The administrative cost of making income tax repayments in respect of covenants to students is estimated to have been about £3 million. The average repayment was about £280 per student. About 375,000 individual repayments were made, including interim payments, to a total of about 196,000 students. In all, about £55 million was repaid.

Advertisements (VAT)

Dr. Glyn asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about the practical difficulties facing newspapers in adjusting their accounting system by 1 May to accommodate their liabilities for value added tax on advertisements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Several letters have been received and technical discussions have taken place between the Newspaper Society and Customs and Excise about the practical implications of implementing the Budget decision to extend VAT to newspaper advertising. The six-week period allowed for the implementation of this change should be sufficient.

Mortgage Interest (Wales)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average mortgage interest tax relief per owner-occupier by county in Wales.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 29 March 1985, c. 373]: I regret that information is not available from which to provide sufficiently reliable estimates for each Welsh county. However, for the whole of Wales in 1982-83, the latest year for which information is available, the amount of tax relief on mortgage interest averaged over all owner-occupiers (with and without mortgages) resident in Wales would have amounted to about £130.

Personal Allowances

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people have been lifted out of tax by the personal allowances above that increase required by indexation; and how many of them (a) have children and (b) are estimated to be caught in the poverty trap.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985, c. 325]: Counting husband and wife as one, my right hon.

Friend's Budget measures will mean that some 260,000 fewer tax units will pay tax in 1985-86 than if allowances had only been indexed. Of these 260,000, some 40,000 have children and approximately 10,000 are in receipt of means-tested benefits.

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the cost to the Exchequer in 1985-86 of the married man's tax allowance in excess of the single person's allowance; how much of this cost is attributable to taxpayers aged below 65 years; and what is the weekly value of this extra relief to a married man paying income tax at the standard rate.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985, c. 325]: The direct revenue cost of the married man's allowance, in excess of the single person's allowance, is estimated to be £4·4 billion in a full year at 1985-86 income levels. Of this, some £3·9 billion is in respect of those aged under 65. The extra relief is worth £7·21 a week in 1985-86 to a non-aged basic rate taxpayer.

Agricultural Land and Buildings

Mr. Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the value of agricultural land, including buildings, in the United Kingdom; and how this figure compares with the figure for 1970.

Mr. Jopling: I have been asked to reply.

The following table gives the average prices of land (and buildings), for each country in the United Kingdom by type of tenure, in 1970 and 1983; estimates are shown for 1984. Information on the price of land (and buildings) is collected on a continuous basis by the Inland Revenue.

Unemployment Costs

Mr. Beith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest estimated cost to the Exchequer of the average unemployed person, including all benefits and the cost of lost taxes and national insurance contributions.

Mr. Whitney: I have been asked to reply.

The estimated average cost per beneficiary of benefits paid in respect of unemployment is £2,300 for 1984-85. Changes in tax revenue and income from national insurance contributions depend on the causes of unemployment and there is a wide range of possible effects. No single estimate can be given.

ENERGY

Point of Ayr Colliery (Liquefaction Scheme)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects the construction of the Point of Ayr colliery coal liquefaction pilot scheme to begin and to be operating; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: The National Coal Board expects, in a few months' time, to place a civil engineering contract for the 2½ tonne per day coal liquefaction project at Point of Ayr. This contract will cover site preparation and erection of main buildings. A general construction contract for process plant is scheduled for the end of 1985, after completion of the current work on detailed engineering design. In the meantime, advanced orders are being planned for key plant items.

Completion of construction is expected in 1987 and will be followed by a phased start-up of process equipment.

The board's commitment to construction was triggered by the award of £4·8 million support from the European Economic Community and was not conditional on further direct support from the Government. However, the £2·5 million balance of the Department of Energy's contribution remains on offer and is subject only to NCB securing suitable participation from the private sector. The chairman and the board are continuing their discussions with interested parties.

Nuclear Safeguards

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his answer on nuclear safeguards, Official Report, 18 February, column 353, if he will set out ways in which his Department's safeguards office ensures that operators of United Kingdom nuclear facilities undertake nuclear material accountancy required by the United Kingdom and European Economic Community legislation to which he refers.

Mr. Goodlad: Officials of my Department's safeguards office participate in negotiations with the United Kingdom nuclear operators and the Directorate of Euratom Safeguards to draw up the "particular safeguards provisions" called for under Commission Regulations (Euratom) No. 3227/76. In these provisions are requirements to determine the flow and stocks of nuclear materials in nuclear facilities and for procedures to determine the physical inventories of nuclear materials for accounting purposes. To ensure that these provisions are implemented effectively the safeguards office maintains liaison on a routine basis between the United Kingdom nuclear operators and the Directorate of Euratom Safeguards to resolve any difficulties which may arise. In addition the Directorate of Euratom Safeguards regularly send inspection teams to civil nuclear facilities in the United Kingdom to examine accounting records and to verify the physical presence of nuclear material. In many cases the safeguards office has a representative at these inspections as allowed for under the Euratom treaty.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his answer about Euratom inspectors at Sellafield and Springfield on 18 February, Official Report, columns 355-356, if he will set out the texts of the two proposals made to the Commission.

Mr. Goodlad: No. These proposals are the subject of continuing confidential negotiations with Euratom.

Israeli Minister of Energy

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will make a statement on his recent meeting with the Israeli Minister of Energy; and what discussions took place regarding the supply of coal by the United Kingdom to Israel.

Mr. Peter Walker: We had a useful exchange on energy trade opportunities. I was able to tell the Minister that the United Kingdom has large reserves of coal and that the National Coal Board remains a real competitor in export markets.

Fishermen (Fuel Costs)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Energy what was the change in the cost of marine gas oil to fishing vessels in the years 1983, 1984 and the latest date in 1985.

Mr. Peter Walker: Information is not available for the use of gas oil in the fishing industry. The latest information for the price of gas oil to large industrial customers, the only figures for which information is readily available, showed the following changes:

	per cent
1982 (average) to 1983 (average)	+3·5
1983 (average) to 1984 (average)	+2·6
1984 (average) to fourth quarter 1984	+5·6

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

High Technology (Graduates)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the additional £40 million announced in the Budget for the expansion of the number of graduates in high technology applies to both universities and polytechnics.

Mr. Brooke: In his pursuant reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) on 3 April, my right hon. Friend announced those institutions which had been selected to participate in phase 1 of the Engineering and technology programme. All the institutions concerned are universities.

The Government are at present considering which institutions should participate in phase 2 of the programme, and will consider in this context whether institutions not within the responsibility of the UGC should be included.

Expenditure

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Billericay on Thursday 28 March, if he will give a breakdown for the year 1983-84 and for each local education authority of the amount of education expenditure supported by grant under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966.

Mr. Dunn: Section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966 is administered by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Education expenditure in respect of which local education authorities claimed support under section 11 in 1983-84 broke down between authorities as follows:

Education expenditure in respect of which local authorities claimed support under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966

Higher Education (National Insurance Contributions)

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what estimate he has made of the increased costs to (a) universities, (b) polytechnics and (c) colleges and institutes of higher education in England and Wales imposed by the changes in national insurance contributions; and if he will take steps to match these with an increase in grants.

Mr. Brooke: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Synoptic Geomagnetic Measurement

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about the effect on the continuation of synoptic geomagnetic measurement in the United Kingdom of the reductions proposed in the Natural Environment Research Council's corporate plan in support for strategic research within its component bodies in favour of commissioned research and of the transfer of science budget funds from the institutes to universities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I have received 60 letters about NERC's corporate plan.

The Natural Environment Research Council has recently, with the help of a special allocation from the Advisory Board for the Research Councils, invested additional funds in the geomagnetism unit of the British geological survey for the automation of three observatories at Lerwick (Shetland), Hartland (Devon) and Eskdalemuir (Dumfries and Galloway). This is part of a modernisation programme consistent with the council's corporate plan. Although the corporate plan proposes an increase in support for university research, as well as attempts to win more commissioned research, it is not intended that this should be at the expense of high-priority basic and strategic research.

New Blood Posts (Age Limit)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has had about the operation of the 35 year age limit for new blood posts in universities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The three year new blood programme, announced by my right hon. Friend in December 1982, is designed to give additional scope for institutions to recruit bright young researchers and lecturers who might otherwise not have had the opportunity of university employment. Both the Government and the University Grants Committee (UGC) have received a small number of representations about the 35 year age limit, particularly in relation to women. The UGC has reconsidered the limit but has concluded that generally it should be maintained, except in the case of clinically qualified appointments in 1985-86 (the final year of the programme), where the age limit has been extended to 38.

Tenured Appointments

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to the number of appointments of tenured academic staffs, such as lecturers at universities in each of the last four quarters for which figures are available; and, of these, how many were new blood posts.

Mr. Brooke: Figures are available only on a yearly basis. 230 of the 785 new academic appointments to universities in 1983-84 were made under the Government's "new blood" scheme. Figures for 1984-85 are not yet available. Information is not collected centrally about the terms of employment of particular academic staff.

Particle Physics Research (Review Group)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science from what outside sources the review group chaired by Sir John Kendrew examining British participation in particle physics research at CERN is seeking evidence.

Mr. Brooke: The review group chaired by Sir John Kendrew, which is concerned with all aspects of United Kingdom participation in particle physics, is an independent one commissioned jointly by the Advisory Board for the Research Councils and the Science and Engineering Research Council. For convenience, however, the group issued a general invitation for evidence through a departmental press notice dated 24 May 1984 and I understand that it has also specifically invited evidence from a number of organisations, including the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals and the Royal Society, and from scientists and others covering a range of interests.

Brixton Church of England School, Devon

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, in view of the recent deterioration in the condition of Brixton Church of England-aided school, Devon, he will now approve the application by Devon county council for permission to provide 15 per cent. of the cost of rebuilding the school under its capital programme for 1987-88.

Mr. Dunn: The Devon local education authority has alerted the Department to the view of the local diocesan authorities that the replacement of this school should be regarded as a high priority in the 1986-87 school building programme. As in previous years capital expenditure allocations for 1986-87, naming those voluntary aided school projects on which a start can be made in that year, will not be announced until about December 1985.

Manchester (Capital Allocation)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, why he will not meet the chief education officer of the city of Manchester in connection with the capital allocation for 1985-86.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has not received a request for such a meeting. The town clerk and chief executive of the city of Manchester wrote to him on 15 February requesting a meeting with officials of the Department; this was held on 28 February.

WALES

Departmental Legislation

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Wales, how many Acts of Parliament have been promoted and how many statutory instruments made by his Department, or predecessor Departments covering his areas of responsibility, in each of the last 20 years.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: As far as legislation relating solely to Wales is concerned, my Department promoted one Act of Parliament in each of the following four years: 1967, 1975, 1976, 1983. It also promoted one Act relating solely to Wales, jointly with the Cabinet Office, in 1978. Most primary legislation relating to Wales is, of course, promoted jointly with other Departments.

Her Majesty's Stationery Office publishes annually "Lists of Statutory Instruments". This is currently up to date to the end of 1983.

Given the changes to the machinery of Government over the last 20 years, apportionment of statutory instruments to the areas of present ministerial responsibility could be carried out only at disproportionate cost.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what advice he is issuing to health authorities in Wales regarding the need to identify the shortest available hospital waiting lists following the comment of the Deputy Health Commissioner that authorities which fail to do so could be guilty of maladministration

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Guidance was issued to health authorities commending the advice of a working party that information on waiting lists should be exchanged between hospitals and made available to general medical practitioners so that patients may be given the opportunity to be referred to hospitals with a shorter wait, though further from their homes. The most recent edition of the Welsh hospital waiting list bulletin covers a much larger number of hospitals than its predecessor and therefore provides more comprehensive information.

Hospitals (Vale of Glamorgan)

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales what new developments are planned and at what approximate cost, at the hospitals within the area of the administrative Vale of Glamorgan, namely, Llandough hospital, Sully hospital, Barry Neale-Kent hospital and Barry community hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: This is a matter for South Glamorgan health authority but I am aware of the following developments:

Llandough hospital
Obstetric block and associated works, a centrally funded scheme	7,718,000
Ward upgrading and new admission unit	200,000
Extension to outpatient department at the Pneumoconiosis Research Unit	200,000
Sully hospital
Provision of day facilities for psychiatric patients	200,000
Neale Kent hospital, Barry
Extension to provide day facilities	100,000

Unemployment Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many people in Wales are currently unemployed over the ages of 40, 45, 50 and 55 years, respectively;

(2) what are the present numbers of people who have been unemployed for one year or more in Wales; and what was the comparable figure for April 1979;

(3) what are the numbers of 16 to 24-year-olds in (a) Wales, (b) Clwyd and (c) Mid Glamorgan who have been unemployed for more than one year.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: This information is available in the House of Commons Library.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he proposes a domestic and business rates revaluation in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Responsibility for rating rests with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. The White Paper on Rates in August 1983 announced our intention to set in train the work required for a non-domestic revaluation and to issue a consultation document on a domestic revaluation. Action on these fronts is proceeding.

Forestry Land

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total acreage of forestry land sold by the Forestry Commission in Wales over the last 12 months; and if he will estimate the value of these estates and represent the total acreage sold as a percentage of Welsh Forestry Commission land.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Private Schools

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the total amount of money given to and provided by his Department to private schools in Wales between 1982-83 and 1985-86.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The only expenditure has been under the assisted places and direct grant schemes. In the financial years 1982-83 to 1984-85 it has totalled £295,181, £515,963 and £637,560, respectively. The total estimated cost for the current financial year is £854,066.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all those private schools in Wales which will be in receipt of grants from public funds in 1985-86; if he will indicate in the case of each school the amount of grants proposed: (a) under the assisted places scheme and (b) under all other headings; and if he will provide equivalent information for each year since 1982.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The only payments made by the Welsh Office are reimbursement for remitted fees under the assisted places scheme and grants under the direct grant scheme; details are in the following tables. Some schools will have received payments from boarding school allowances paid to some members of the Armed, Diplomatic and Civil Services or from local authorities in respect of children assisted by them

M4

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many miles of the M4 motorway in Wales are lit, in which county areas the lit sections are; and what further plans he has to light sections of the M4 motorway.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: A total of some 18 miles of the M4 in Wales are lit. The lit sections are mainly in Gwent and west Glamorgan with an additional small section in south Glamorgan. I have no current plans to light further sections.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the cost of lighting the stretches of the M4 motorway so far unlit.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: About £4·5 million at current prices.

DEFENCE

British Aerospace plc

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Defence what advance warning of an announcement on the Royal Air Force trainer was given to British Aerospace plc, its bankers, brokers and other professional advisers involved in the offer for sale of the Government's shareholding.

Mr. Butler: No advance warning was given. The company, along with the other three contestants, was officially informed at the time of my right hon. Friend's statement to the House.

Test Ban Treaty

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence why it would not be in the national interest to disclose details of research and development effort devoted to verification of a comprehensive test ban treaty; and what advantage could be gained by other countries if this information was published.

Mr. Butler: The United Kingdom has published information about verification techniques in relation to a comprehensive test ban in the context of this issue at the Geneva conference on disarmament. Full details of the United Kingdom research and development effort devoted to this subject, however, might provide information about certain aspects of United Kingdom capabilities in this area which we would not wish to reveal, as well as assisting evasion techniques of others.

Departmental Staff

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the total number of civil servants who have been employed by his Department in each year since 1979.

Mr. Butler: I refer the hon. Member to table 5.1 in volume 2 of the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1984 (Cmnd. 9227-II).

Departmental Legislation

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Acts of Parliament have been promoted and how many statutory instruments made by his Department, or predecessor Departments covering his areas of responsibility, in each of the last 20 years.

Mr. Stanley: HMSO publishes annually "Lists of Statutory Instruments" and "Tables and Indices to Public and General Acts and General Synod Measures". Both of these are currently up to date to the end of 1983. Such information as is readily available about the Acts of Parliament promoted by the Ministry of Defence in the last 20 years is as follows. There may however be other Acts relating to other defence topics which, having regard to the changes in the organisation of the Ministry, cannot be so readily identified.

Year
1965	1
1966	3
1967	1
1968	1
1969	2
1971	1
1973	1
1976	1
1980	1
1981	1
1982	1
1984	1

Given the changes to the machinery of government over the last 20 years apportionment of statutory instruments to the areas of present ministerial responsibility could only be done at disproportionate cost.

Research Contracts

Mr. Hill asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, in the next two months, he will be conferring with representatives of the aerospace industry of the United Kingdom with a view to seeking to gain strategic defence initiative research contracts for the United Kingdom.

Mr. Butler: I refer to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) and the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) on 26 March at column 178. We are now considering our response to the formal invitation from the United States Secretary of Defence to indicate, within 60 days, areas of research in which the United Kingdom would be interested in participating. It remains our intention to keep closely in touch with United Kingdom industries, including aerospace industries, which have relevant expertise to offer.

Soviet Union (Nuclear Forces)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has about recent changes in the level of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics' nuclear forces; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: Information on Soviet nuclear forces at the beginning of 1984 was contained in annex A of the Statement of Defence Estimates 1984. This data will be revised in the Statement of Defence Estimates 1985. Over the past year the Soviet Union has continued to expand and modernise its nuclear forces. Two new Soviet inter-continental ballistic missiles (ICBMs) are in an advanced stage of development. New strategic ballistic missile submarines (SSBNs) have been launched, and a new submarine launched ballistic missile flight tested.

Another strategic bomber is under development and a new variant of the BEAR bomber designed to carry cruise missiles is operational; additional BACKFIRE bombers have been deployed. Long range cruise missiles for launch from ground, sea and air platforms have been or are about to be deployed. A large number of new SS20 bases in both the Eastern and Western USSR are under construction. Improved versions of the shorter range SCALEBOARD, SCUD and FROG missiles have been developed and during 1984 for the first time SCALEBOARD missiles were deployed into Eastern Europe. Soviet nuclear capable artillery is being improved and additional weapons are being deployed.

HM Vessels (Log Books)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether the log books of HMS Superb, HMS Warspite and HMS Courageous for the period March to July 1982 are (a) in the possession of his Department and (b) intact;

(2) whether the signals to and from HMS Superb, HMS Warspite and HMS Courageous for the period March to July 1982 are (a) in the possession of his Department and (b) intact.

Mr. Heseltine: I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Peter Levene

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence with which company or companies he has had discussions over the possible secondment of Mr. Peter Levene to the Ministry of Defence.

Mr. Butler: I have nothing to add to the reply my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave the hon. Member on 29 March at column 365.

Nimrod Aircraft (Servicing)

Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the major servicing of the Nimrod aircraft.

Mr. Butler: Subject to the satisfactory completion of contractual negotiations, the major servicing of two Nimrod aircraft will in the near future be allotted to British Aerospace at Woodford. It remains our intention that the major servicing of Nimrods should be opened to competition.

Harrier GR5 Aircraft

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about orders for the Harrier GR5 aircraft.

Mr. Butler: I have recently authorised my Department to enter into commitments progressively in 1985-86 for some long lead materials and equipment for a possible purchase of Harrier GR5 aircraft beyond the 62 (including two prototypes) already on contract. A final decision on this purchase will not however need to be considered until the latter part of next year and major commitments on the aircraft themselves would not be incurred until then.

Chemical Weapons

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what monitoring has been conducted in the vicinity of the disposal sites for British chemical weapons stocks in the 1950s; and what results there have been.

Mr. Butler [pursuant to the reply, 12 March 1985, c. 56]: Disposal of chemical weapons and agents began shortly after World War II and involved both sea and land disposal. Disposal at sea was carried out well offshore and in very deep water. Disposal on land was principally by burning or chemical neutralisation. Periodic monitoring of the land disposal sites has been conducted according to the particular circumstances at each site. A review of a small number of sites, which may remain contaminated and which remain in Ministry of Defence ownership, is currently in hand in order to assess the present degree of hazard, if any, and the feasibility, where appropriate, of decontamination.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Child Benefit

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the distribution of the increased expenditure which would follow an increase in child benefit of £3 per week; and, in particular, how much of this would be spent on manufactures.

Mr. Peter Rees: An increase in child benefit of £3 per week (taking effect in November 1985) would increase public expenditure by about £1½ billion in a full year. The economic effects would depend on how this was financed. Information on the distribution of any additional consumers' expenditure which might result is not readily available.

Expenditure and Taxation

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state (a) total public expenditure as a percentage of gross domestic product and (b) total taxation revenue as a percentage of gross domestic product, for each of the years 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984 and projectd for 1985, calculated on the basis used for the figures quoted in the speech of 10 May 1982 to the Institute for Fiscal Studies by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury.

Mr. Peter Rees: The figures are as follows:

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86
Public expenditure as a percentage of GDP*	39½	42	43¼	43	42½	43¼	41½
Taxation as a percentage of GDP	35	36½	39	39	39	39	39

* As shown in Chart 1.3 in Cmnd. 9428, updated by Table 5.1 in the 1985-86 Financial Statement and Budget Report.

Negative External Financing Limits

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why he uses the term negative external financing limits in the context of the nationlised industries; and what is its economic rationale.

Mr. Peter Rees: An industry's external financing requirement is the difference between its capital requirements and its internal resources. It is similar in concept to sources and applications of funds statements in company accounts which are intended to show net cash flows to and from a company. Where an industry is generating a positive cash flow, ie internal resources exceed capital requirements, the external financing requirements will be negative. External Financing Limits (EFLs) are control limits and have been set by successive Government as a basis for monitoring industries' financing requirements and regulating flows of finance to and from an industry.

Value Added Tax (Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act)

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received from organisations seeking an extension of zero-rating for value added tax to cover all expenditure on building alterations certified by local authorities as necessary under the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act.

Mr. Hayhoe: My Treasury colleagues and I have received four such representations from one organisation, the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities.

Tax Relief (Charities)

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total cost of tax relief for giving to charities.

Mr. Moore: In the year to 30 September 1984 the Inland Revenue repaid to charities tax of some £250 million, of which repayments in respect of deeds of covenant amounted to some £110 million. Following the introduction by the Government of legislation in 1980, reducing the qualifying period of such deeds from 7 years to 4 years, and the introduction of higher rate tax relief for charitable payments, tax repayments have increased by 93 per cent. Repayments in respct of deeds of covenant have increased by 15½ per cent. over the last year.

No exact information is available about the cost of exempting charities from tax on income which they receive without deduction of tax; nor about the cost of other exemptions or reliefs to which they are entitled. However it is unlikely that the cost of all direct tax concessions is less than £400 million a year.

To give further help to charities, the Chancellor announced in his Budget that he proposed to increase, from £5,000 to £10,000, the limit to which relief at the higher rates of tax is allowed for covenants.

Nationalised Industries (Financing Limits)

Mr. Bright asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make a statement on the effects of the miners' strike upon the external financing limits of the nationalised industries.

Mr. Peter Rees: The National Coal Board, electricity supply industries, British Rail and the British Steel Corporation are expected to exceed their external financing limits for 1984-85 as a direct result of the coal strike. No change in external financing limits for these industries is proposed to accommodate this development, but, in the exceptional circumstances, the Government accepts that overshoots directly attributable to the coal strike which cannot be offset through savings by the industries concerned should be a charge on public expenditure in 1984-85. Provisional EFL outturn figures for all industries will be published later this year in the cash limits 1984-85 provisional outturn White Paper. Estimated strike costs have been taken into account in the 1984-85 public expenditure planning total outturn shown in the Financial Statement and Budget Report.

Taxation Policy

Mr. Hill asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it is his policy to reduce personal and corporate taxes in favour of indirect taxes.

Mr. Moore: It is our policy to reduce overall burden taxation, resources permitting. We are also concerned with the balance of taxation. In both the 1984 and 1985 Budgets my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed measures which shifted some of the burden of personal taxation from earnings to spending.

Customs and Excise (Industrial Action)

Mr. Greenway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the proposed industrial action by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise staff.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that union leaders are seeking to persuade staff in Her Majesty's Customs and Excise to take industrial action which they claim will disrupt the travelling public and I deplore these cynical and wholly unjustified manouuvres.

However, the red/green system of passenger clearance is designed to ensure that undue delays do not occur. Senior staff will be in attendance at ports and airports over the holiday period to ensure that passengers do not experience abnormal delays.

EC (Finances)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the maximum rate of increase in expenditure other than that necessarily resulting from the treaty fixed by the European Economic Community under article 203 for each year since 1972.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 20 March 1985. c.522]: The maximum rate increases in non-obligatory expenditure for the years 1972-1974 are not readily available. Figures for the years 1975-1983 are set out in the table:

	Commitment Appropriations per cent.	Payment Appropriations per cent.
1975	—	40·77
1976	—	44·29
1977	—	28·67
1978	23·35	56·04

	Commitment Appropriations per cent.	Payment Appropriations per cent.
1979	35·02	3·50
1980	22·77	12·70
1981	13·86	16·23
1982	29·13	42·43
1983	33·52	38·67

Before 1978 the maximum rate was set only on payment appropriations.

Income Tax

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update, to take account of the 1985 Budget, the information on income tax reductions provided in his reply of 4 April 1984 to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), Official Report, columns 542-44.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985]: The table shows the reductions in income tax liabilities at 1985-86 income levels of the proposed 1985-86 allowances, thresholds and rates compared with an indexed 1978-79 regime. For the comparison, the 1978-79 allowances and thresholds have been indexed in line with the increase in the RPI between December 1977 and December 1984. As child tax allowances were being phased out in 1978-79 they have been excluded from the comparison.

It is not possible to provide useful estimates of the liabilities in 1985-86 for the 1978-79 regime without indexation since Inland Revenue records do not cover many of the people who would be brought into tax by such low levels of personal allowances. A partial analysis with incomplete coverage would be misleading.

Range of total income in 1985-86*	Number of units paying tax in 1985-86	Reductions in income tax compared with 1978-79 indexed regime

PRIME MINISTER

Rates

Mr. Winnick asked the Prime Minister whether, in the consideration she has given to changes in the rating system, she has taken fully into account recent reports on this matter; and if she will make a statement on the outcome of this consideration.

The Prime Minister: The local government finance studies currently in progress are taking into account all reports which appear to be relevant to their work. There is still further work to be done over the next few months and there will be opportunity for wider public discussion before final decisions are made.

EC Reports

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will place in the Library copies of the reports submitted to the European Council on 29 to 30 March by (a) the ad hoc committee for a people's Europe and (b) the ad hoc committee on institutional affairs.

The Prime Minister: Both documents were placed in the Library of the House on 2 April, in connection with my statement to the House on the European Council.

Scotland-England Football Match

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Prime Minister if she will meet representatives of Scottish football fans to discuss the decision to play the Scotland v. England match in Glasgow.

The Prime Minister: No.

Engagements

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 April.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 April.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 April.

Mr. John M. Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 4 April.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Gentlemen and my hon Friends to the reply that I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright).

Civil Service (Secondments)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Prime Minister how many secondments have been made to the Civil Service without satisfying the legal requirements of the Civil Service Order in Council 1982 in 1984-85, and in each of the preceding five years; and if she will list the secondments.

The Prime Minister: As I explained to the House on 18 March in the answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) at column 366-67 measures are being taken to ensure that secondments to the Civil Service from outside organisations are made in compliance with the Civil Service Order in Council. Details of the number of secondments to Government Departments in the period up to 1983 were published in a Report by the Management and Personnel Office, a copy of which was placed in the Library of the House. In 1984 (the last full year for which figures are available) there were 116 such secondments as follows:

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Prime Minister if she will list the measures now being taken in respect of secondments to the Civil Service to ensure compliance with the Civil Service Order in Council 1982; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: As I made clear in my reply of 18 March to my hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett), the Civil Service Commissioners are devising procedures to ensure that future secondments are made in compliance with the Civil Service Order in Council 1982 and any regulations made thereunder. Secondments that are currently in train are being referred to the Civil Service Commissioners on an individual basis and they will consider all such cases against the background of the provisions and discretionary powers contained in the Civil Service Order in Council 1982.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Prime Minister who has been appointed to the Civil Service under section 1(2)(g) of the 1982 Order in Council in the current year and in the preceding six years.

The Prime Minister: The Commissioners approved the following appointments under article 1(2)(g) of the Civil Service Order in Council 1982 or the corresponding article—1(2)(f)—of the 1978 Order in Council:

Year and Department*	Appointment

1985
MOD	Chief of Defence Procurement

* In which appointment approved under Article 1(2)(g) or 1(2)(f).

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Prime Minister how many appointments to the Civil Service have been made without the issue of a certificate of qualification in each year since 1979; and under what provisions.

The Prime Minister: Article 1(2) of the Civil Service Order in Council 1982 (a copy of which is in the Library) lists seven categories of appointment in the Home Civil Service or Diplomatic Service which do not require the prior issue of a certificate of qualification by the Civil Service Commissioners. The categories are:

(a) Crown appointments;
(b) Appointments filled by the transfer of staff by or in pursuance of an Act of Parliament which exempts such staff from the requirement to be certificated;
(c) Appointments which terminate at the end of an Administration;
(d) Part-time appointments normally involving less than 15 hours a week;
(e) Appointments of one year or less;
(f) Appointments in the grades included in the Schedule to the Order in Council;
(g) Appointments not exceeding five years which the Civil Service Commissioners are satisfied it is desirable should be made without the issue of a certificate of qualification.

Details of special advisers appointed under 1(2)(c) were given to the hon. Member in my reply of 10 April 1984, since when there have been a further 10 such appointments. No appointment under 1(2)(b) has been made since 1979. Those appointments made under 1(2)(g) have been listed in a separate reply to the hon. Member. The remaining categories cover a wide range of circumstances, including many thousands of staff recruited locally by Departments, including casual and part-time staff, on which information is not held centrally.

Mr. Peter Levene

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Prime Minister if she will publish the evidence presented to the Civil Service Commissioner demonstrating the desirability of the appointment of Mr. Peter Levene without the issue of a certificate of qualification.

The Prime Minister: It is a principle of long standing not to publish such detailed information about individuals being considered for particular appointments.

Football Matches

Mr. Boyes asked the Prime Minister if she will list the association football matches she has watched in her official capacity since May 1979.

The Prime Minister: I attended the final of the FA cup at Wembley in 1980 and 1981.

Argentina

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister whether Her Majesty's Government have been informed by the United States Government of the content of President Reagan's discussions with President Alfonsin of Argentina between 1 and 20 March.

The Prime Minister: It is not our practice to discuss our confidential exchanges with other Governments.

Voluntary Bodies (Grants)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Prime Minister if she will publish figures showing expenditure by Government Departments on grants to voluntary bodies during the financial year 1983-84; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Wilkinson asked the Prime Minister if she will publish figures showing expenditure by Government Departments on grants to voluntary bodies during the financial year 1983-84; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The figures are shown in the table attached. The total amount provided in 1983-84 represents a cash increase of 20·5 per cent. (in real terms 14·5 per cent.) on the level of grant-giving in the previous year. In the period between 1979-80 and 1983-84 the level of Government grant-giving to voluntary bodies has risen by over 95 per cent. (or in real terms 35 per cent.)

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Family Court

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Attorney-General what is the nature, composition, terms of reference and time scale of the review being undertaken of proposals for a family court; and whether its terms of reference extend to a consideration of the nature of the court or tribunal which sentences young offenders.

The Attorney-General: A was announced by the Lord Chancellor's Department in July 1984, the terms of reference of the committee set up by the Lord Chancellor and the Home Secretary are as follows:

"To examine the feasibility of the establishmnt of a unified court for the exclusive exercise of jurisdiction in family and domestic matters below the level of the Court of Appeal, to identify the main options for such a court and to assess the resources implications of each of these options."

The committee consists of officials of the Lord Chancellor's Department, the Home Office, DHSS and the Treasury. They plan to issue a consultation paper describing possible options later this year. It is hoped that a final report will be made in 1986. The committee will consider whether and to what extent the present jurisdiction of the juvenile court might be included within a unified family court.

Vaccine Damage Claims (Legal Aid)

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Attorney-General how many applications for legal aid have been made since the passing of the Vaccine Damage Payments Act 1979 by those claiming compensation for brain damage caused by the whooping cough vaccine; and how many such applications have been granted.

The Attorney-General: Since 1979, the Law Society has received 265 applications for legal aid to bring proceedings related to vaccine damage. It is not possible, except at disproportionate cost, to identify how many of those relate specifically to whooping cough vaccine, though the majority do. Of the 265, legal aid certificates (some of which may have been limited in scope) have been issued in 193 cases; 33 applications are still pending; 16 have been abandoned by the applicant; 16 have been refused on legal grounds; 4 have been refused on grounds of financial ineligibility; and in 3 cases an offer of legal aid was made but not taken up by the applicant.

Agricultural Holdings

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Attorney-General if Her Majesty's Government have any plans to introduce a Bill consolidating the statute law on agricultural holdings; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: Work is proceeding on a consolidation of the law relating to agricultural holdings in England and Wales. Consultation will be carried out and it is hoped to introduce a Bill next session.

Dangerous Dogs

Mr. Galley asked the Attorney-General how many civil actions have been brought relating to dangerous dogs under the Animals Act 1971 or other relevant legislation in each of the last five years; and in how many cases the plaintiff has been successful.

The Attorney-General: The information sought is not available.

Departmental Legislation

Mr. Galley asked the Attorney-General how many Acts of Parliament have been promoted and how many statutory instruments made by the Lord Chancellor's Department in each of the last 20 years.

The Attorney-General: Her Majesty's Stationery Office publishes annually "Lists of Statutory Instruments" and "Tables and Indices to Public and General Acts and General Synod Measures". Both of these are currently up to date to the end of 1983. Nearly all of these, if not all, contain enactments prepared by the Lord Chancellor's Department of the day.

Given the changes to the machinery of government over the last 20 years, apportionment of the Acts or statutory instruments to the areas of present ministerial responsibility could be done only at disproportionate cost.

Liquidators (Reports)

Mr. Gould asked the Attorney-General, in respect of each year since 1975, how many reports the Director of Public Prosecutions has received from liquidators in accordance with the duty imposed by section 334(2) of the Companies Act 1948, now section 632(3) of the Companies Act 1985.

The Attorney-General: The number of reports received by the Director of Public Prosecutions from liquidators and specified to be pursuant to the duty imposed by section 334(2) of the Companies Act 1948 for each year since 1975 is as follows:

Year	Number
1975	12
1976	44
1977	28
1978	45
1979	26
1980	28
1981	43
1982	16
1983	32
1984	30

The director also receives each year a number of reports drawing attention to matters giving cause for general concern without referring specifically to matters reportable under section 334(2). The number of such cases is not available and could only be obtained at disproportionate expense.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will list for each region of Scotland his most recent information on the number of arrests, cases where proceedings have been instituted, and convictions arising from the miners' strike; and if he will list the offences for which persons have been: (a) charged and (b) convicted.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The most readily available information is set out in the following tables.

The first table details for each local authority region in Scotland the most recent information on, the number of persons arrested in relation to incidents arising from the miners' strike; the number of persons proceeded against by procurators fiscal in respect of offences arising out of the miners' strike and the number of persons convicted in respect of such offences. There are a number of such cases which have still to come to trial.

The second table details the most recent information on the nature and number of charges brought by procurators fiscal which have resulted in conviction. A large number of those persons brought to trial were convicted of two or more charges.

Local Authority Region	Number of Persons Arrested	Number of Persons Proceeded against by Procurators Fiscal	Number of Persons Convicted
Dumfries and Galloway	3	2	2
Central region	44	39	17
Fife region	225	216	148
Grampian	0	0	0
Lothian region	474	436	272
Borders region	0	0	0
Strathclyde region	745	309	151
Highland region	0	0	0
Tayside region	13	13	13

Nature of the Charge	Number of Charges
Breach of the peace	569
Police (Scotland) Act 1967 section 41	220
Bail Etc. (Scotland) Act 1980 section 3	51
Vandalism and malicious mischief	27
Assault	6
Possession of an offensive weapon	5
Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875	4
Careless driving	1
Reckless conduct	1

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many police complaints have been recorded in the course of the miners' industrial dispute.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The information requested is not readily available and I will publish the information in the Official Report later.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will list for the duration of the miners' dispute: (a) the number of people arrested and charged with an offence, (b) the number of people convicted and (c) the number of people acquitted, stating in each case the nature of the offence.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Pursuant to my reply on 11 March 1985 at column 17, the information for the period to 22 March 1985 is as follows:

1,483 persons were arrested and charged by the police in connection with incidents arising out of the miners' strike. This figure cannot be broken down to reflect the nature of the alleged offence involved in each case. Of those persons prosecuted in respect of offences arising out of the miners' strike whose cases have been disposed of, 603 persons were convicted and 140 persons were acquitted. Information on the nature and number of the charges brought by procurators fiscal is set out in the following table. A large number of the persons brought to trial in respect of such offences faced two or more charges.

Nature of Charge	Convictions	Acquittals
Breach of the peace	569	109
Police (Scotland) Act 1967, section 41	220	29
Bail Etc (Scotland) Act 1980, section 3	51	2
Vandalism and malicious mischief	27	3
Assault	6	1
Possession of an offensive weapon	5	6
Conspiracy and Prootection of Property Act 1875	4	0
Theft	0	3
Explosive Substances Act 1883, section 2	0	2
Reckless conduct	1	0
Careless driving	1	1

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland what proportion of convictions in Scotland as a result of offences during the miners' dispute are for (a) breach of the peace offences, (b) obstruction or other offences under the Police (Scotland) Act 1967 and (c) offences under the Bail (Scotland) Act 1980.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Pursuant to my reply on 18 March 1985 at column 363-364, the information, based upon statistics for the period to 22 March 1985, is as follows:

(a) approximately 64 per cent.
(b) approximately 25 per cent.
(c) approximately 6 per cent.

Family Law (Representations)

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland what representations he has had on the implementation of the Law Commission and Scottish Law Commission report, "Family Law — Custody of Children, Jurisdiction and Enforcement within the United Kingdom" (Cmnd. 9419).

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I have received representations on several occasions from the hon. Gentleman himself, as have my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate and my right hon. Friend, the Lord Privy Seal. My noble and learned Friend has also received representations in another place from the noble and learned Lord, Lord Elwyn-Jones.

The representations are for early implementation of the recommendations contained in the commission's report. My noble and learned Friend and I have already explained that we see no prospect of implementation in this Parliamentary Session.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisons (Health and Safety)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether a prisoner may ask for an inspection visit to a prison by the Health and Safety Executive in order to investigate a possible health and safety hazard or other problem; what matters a prisoner is permitted to raise with the Health and Safety Executive; what procedure a prisoner who wishes to contact the Health and Safety Executive should adopt; and whether the same rules apply to such a communication as apply to letters between prisoners and their solicitors on legal matters.

Mr. Mellor: Inspectors from the Health and Safety Executive have the right of access and pay regular visits to Prison Department establishments. Once an inmate had raised his complaint through the prescribed internal channels it would be open to him to write to the Health and Safety Executive to ask that it investigate an aspect of his imprisonment. It would be for the Health and Safety Executive to decide whether or not the matter was within its remit and what action to take. A prisoner's correspondence with the Health and Safety Executive would be examined and read by prison staff in accordance with standing order No. 5, which is published and a copy of which is in the Library.

Prisoners (Statistics)

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of persons serving prison sentences who at the time of their conviction were in the United Kingdom on visitors' visas.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not recorded centrally.

Civil Defence

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will allow elected members of councils and officers to attend civil defence courses at Easingwold together.

Mr. Giles Shaw: While there is no bar against elected members and officers attending courses at the Civil Defence College, Easingwold, together, the specialised nature of the courses usually makes it inappropriate.

Strip Searches

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many British citizens were strip-searched by officials on arrival in Britain from overseas in 1984.

Mr. Waddington: No British citizens arriving in the United Kingdom in 1984 were subjected to a strip search by Home Office officials.

I am advised by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer that no central record is kept of strip searches carried out by customs officers.

Television Licence Fee

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated cost of exempting by category (a) pensioners, (b) those in receipt of unemployment benefit, and (c) those receiving supplementary benefit from payment of the television licence at the £58 rate; and, in each category, what would be the cost of transferring the funding of each to the Treasury or to the other licence payers.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The estimated annual loss of revenue from exempting all households in the United Kingdom containing persons in those categories from payments of the current television licence fees and the associated increases in the fees required to recoup this lost revenue are as follows:

	Loss of revenue	Additions to licence fees necessary to recoup loss*
		monochrome	colour
	£ million	£	£
Households with one or more pensioners	325	10	30
Households with one or more persons in receipt of unemployment benefit	50	1	3
Households with head of household in receipt of supplementary benefit	100	2	7

* Assuming that the increases are applied to monochrome and colour licences in proportion to the current levels of these licences.

The estimates (particularly for those in receipt of unemployment and supplementary benefit) have been prepared using a number of assumptions and should therefore be taken as indicative of the amounts involved.

Mr. David Steel asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, when considering the arrangements for paying the increased television licence fee, he will consider introducing a provision enabling refunds to be obtained on unexpired months within a year.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have no present plans to do so.

Draize Tests

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated number of Draize tests carried out on the eyes of conscious rabbits in each of the past five years in the testing of pesticides, herbicides and industrial chemicals.

Mr. Mellor: This information is not available. But a breakdown of the number of experiments which involved the technique of applying substances to the eye in order to select, develop or study the use, hazards or safety of plant pesticides including fungicides, herbicides or substances modifying plant growth and substances used in industry, is given in table 11 of the "Statistics of Experiments on Living Animals Great Britain", for the years 1979-83. Copies of the statistics for these years are in the Library.

Although the information collected for statistical purposes does not identify Draize eye tests separately, all the tests in table 11 are probably modified Draize tests, all carried out on conscious animals but using either the small volume method or the wash-out method, both of which restrict the damage the test may inflict on the experimental animal. In all cases the animal must be immediately and painlessly killed if it is found to be suffering severe and enduring pain, whether or not the object of the experiment has been achieved.

Immigrants (Grants)

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set out in the Official Report, in each of the last five years, expenses under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: The amount of grant paid under section 11 by the Home Office in respect of the financial years 1979-80 to 1983-84 is shown as follows. Certain claims are subject to final settlement and audit. Figures for 1984-85 are not yet available.

1979-80	34,569,234
1980-81	45,752,723
1981-82	54,427,547
1982-83	65,861,308
1983-84	75,193,737

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set out in the Official Report the main headings of expenditure in 1983-84 under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: The main headings under which grant was claimed for the financial year 1983-84 are as follows. The figures represent the amount of grant aid (at 75 per cent. of total expenditure) claimed.

A Direct Expenditure on the employment of staff

1 Education, including teachers, ancillary staff and education welfare officers	55,602,335
2 Social workers	1,859,220
3 Liaison officers	884,916
4 Interpreters and interviewing staff	235,136
5 Clerical staff for 3 and 4 above	102,579
6 Other	5,092,280

B Expenditure determined by the formula referred to in paragraph 21 of Home Office evidence to the Home Affairs Committee, printed as HC 424-II 20 July 1981

1 Children in care	7,697,330
2 Local authority day nurseries	3,457,746
3 Environmental health officers	262,196

Notes:

1. Three local authorities have yet to submit claims.
2. The formula arrangements came to an end on 31 March 1984.

Betting Shops

Mr. Golding asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to obtain the views of users of betting shops on his consultation document, "Possible Changes in the Law Affecting Betting Shops."

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have distributed about 550 copies of the consultation document to about 100 interested parties since its publication on 28 February, and, in order to obtain the views of users of betting shops we have publicised the issue of the consultation document stressing our interest in receiving comments from all quarters. The consultation document is available on request from the Home Office and some of the views already received appear to have come from users of betting shops.

Football Hooliganism

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what technological aids are available to the police to seek to prevent football hooliganism constituting a threat to public order.

Mr. Giles Shaw: In addition to equipment available to the police for general purposes, such as personal radios, use is also made of closed circuit television at some grounds. The Home Office is also experimenting with a van equipped to take good quality still and video pictures outside and inside grounds. The van is intended to assit in crowd control and also to gather evidence for use in court proceedings. It has been deployed in two matches to date, and it is planned to use it at a number of matches in April.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions have taken place arising from incidents at or after football matches in the last year in Wales.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) on 3 April at column 627.

Pensioners (Television Licence)

Sir Anthony Kershaw asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will add to the terms of reference of Professor Peacock's inquiry the consideration of entitling retirement pensioners on supplementary benefit who do not have in their household a person below retirement age to a free colour television licence.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The task of the committee is to consider possible ways of financing the BBC, in whole or in part, by means other than the licence fee, rather than to examine modifications to the licence fee system itself. I therefore do not think it is appropriate for this issue to be included in the terms of reference.

Her Majesty's Prison, Stafford

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will list those companies which have had commercial contract work carried out by prisoners at Her Majesty's prison, Stafford, over the last three years, together with the nature of such work, and the value of each contract; on what basis payment to prisoners is set; how much they are paid; how many prisoners are engaged in such work; and when was the last time payment was increased.

Mr. Mellor: The following firms have had major contracts undertaken at Stafford prison over the last three years:

Britwood Toys Ltd.
Polyfit Ltd. (Pazzity Ltd.)
Promar Ltd.

Minor work has also been undertaken for a number of other commercial firms. Information on prices and quantities is commercially confidential.

Over 150 inmates have been engaged on this work and were paid on the standard piecework scheme, the average payment currently being £2·45 per week. Inmates' earnings rates are reviewed annually, the last increase taking effect from 1 October 1984.

Prison Population

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the latest figure for the prison population.

Mr. Mellor: On 29 March 1985 the total prison population in England and Wales was 46,215.

Metropolitan Police (Identification Parades)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his reply of 28 March, Official Report, column 283, if he will identify the range of public places used by the Metropolitan police for informal identification parades in 1982 and 1983.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the identification parades surveyed in 1982 and 1983 took place either on London Transport or British Rail escalators, or on British Rail platforms or concourses.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to seek the ending by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis of the practice of the Metropolitan police of holding informal identification parades in public places; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. As I told the hon. Member in the reply I gave to his question on 6 December 1984, at columns 281-82, it is the practice of the Metropolitan police (and other forces) to adopt informal procedures when it is not practicable to arrange a formal identification parade. This might, for example, be where the suspect refuses or there are insufficient people of similar appearance willing to take part. The procedure by its very nature has to be held in a public place.

Local Government Reform (Fire Boards)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if non-uniformed staff will be transferred automatically with the uniformed staff to the proposed fire boards in the event of the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county council;

(2) what provisions the proposed fire boards will be obliged to make for redundancy payments to long-serving staff who are not re-employed, in the event of the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The paper "Abolition of the Greater London Council and the metropolitan county councils: arrangements for staffing the new structure" issued by the Department of the Environment in November 1984 announced the Government's intention that the uniformed and non-uniformed members of fire brigades in London and the metropolitan councils would be transferred to the proposed fire joint authorities by statutory order. Redundancy payments to Greater London council and metropolitan county council staff who are left without a job at abolition will be a matter for the appropriate residuary body.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether obligations will be imposed on the proposed fire boards to employ non-uniformed staff currently on the Greater London council's and metropolitan counties' disabled persons list in the event of the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Disabled people who are currently members of the brigades in London and the metropolitan county councils fire brigades will suffer no disadvantage in transfer terms on the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils. The proposed joint fire authorities' employment policies will have to comply with the quota scheme for the employment of disabled people.

Nuclear Winter

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those representations and submissions which he has received (a) in support of and (b) critical of the nuclear winter hypothesis; when he expects to complete his evaluation of the subject; if he will make the submissions he has received available to local and civil defence authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have not received any representations or submissions as such although the nuclear winter hypothesis has featured in general correspondence. The Government's position remains as described in the reply I gave on 20 December to the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Robertson) at column 284.

Prisons (Categorisation)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what criteria have been adopted following the Chief Inspector of Prisons' recommendation in his report on prison categorisation procedures that security requirements should be determined by applying objective and explicitly stated criteria;

(2) what criteria have been laid down following the Chief Inspector of Prisons' recommendation that there should be standard recategorisation procedures and criteria;

(3) if the recommendation of the Chief Inspector of Prisons in his report on prison categorisation procedures that all four regional offices should, in co-operation with headquarters, develop a common approach has been inplemented;

(4) what action has been taken to implement the recommendations of the Chief Inspector of Prisons that the work of observation, classification and allocation units in local prisons should be accorded priority by (a) improving the availability of prison files and lists of previous convictions, (b) not moving observation, classification and allocation staff to other duties except in an emergency, (c) having observation, classification and allocation units deal with long-term prisoners rather than transferring them to long-term allocation centres, and (d) reducing the range of cases in which headquarters or regional office must confirm the decision.

Mr. Mellor: A study of categorisation systems in the USA and Canada which we commissioned from an outside consultant has recently been completed and is now being considered. Revised guidelines on categorisation, allocation and recategorisation are being produced taking into account the recommendations of the chief inspector and of the control review committee.

Suicides (Statistics)

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will give details of all recorded suicide verdicts by coroners' courts involving deaths of girls under 16 years of age in Derbyshire between 20 December 1984 and 11 January 1985; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will give details of all recorded suicide verdicts by coroners' courts involving deaths of girls under 16 years of age in Lancashire between 20 December 1984 and 11 January 1985; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will give details of all recorded suicide verdicts by coroners' courts involving deaths of girls under 16 years of age in Staffordshire between 20 December 1984 and 11 January 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. White asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give details of all recorded suicide verdicts by coroners' courts in Leicestershire, Warwickshire and Worcestershire involving deaths of girls under 16 years between 20 December 1984 and 11 January 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Campbell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give details of all recorded suicide verdicts by coroners' courts in Durham, Northumberland and Greater London involving deaths of girls under 16 years between 20 December 1984 and 11 January 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. I refer the hon. Members to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North, (Mr. Corrie) on 27 March at column 247.

TGWU (Ballot Rigging)

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Avon on allegations of ballot rigging in the Transport and General Workers Union in Bristol, currently under investigation by his force; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the chief constable of Avon and Somerset constabulary that his officers are investigating reports of alleged criminal offences associated with voting irregularities in the Bristol branch of the Transport and General Workers Union and that a report of their investigations will be submitted to the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Injured Police Officers (Civil Remedy)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to provide a civil remedy for a police officer who, whilst searching, with his consent, an individual who is suspected of possessing drugs or offensive weapons, sustains serious injury or contracts a contagious disease.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have no plans to do so.

Stop and Search Powers

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if he will introduce legislation to amend the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 so as to provide the police with the power to stop and search persons who are reasonably suspected of having alcohol in their possession at or in the immediate vicinity of sports stadiums.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Government intend to introduce legislation similar to that which now applies in Scotland which makes it an offence to attempt to enter a designated sports ground while drunk or possessing alcohol. This legislation also gives the police power to search persons reasonably suspected of such offences.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from the Association of Chief Police Officers regarding the provisions of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 on the power of police officers to conduct blanket searches at or in the immediate vicinity of sports stadiums; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I will reply as soon as possible.

Drugs (Hot Line)

Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police forces are operating a drugs hot line.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Two police forces, the Metropolitan police and Greater Manchester police, each operate a telephone answering service for the receipt of information on drug misuse from members of the public: the numbers are 01-230 2121 and 061-228 3276 respectively. Such information may be given anonymously if preferred.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Housing Executive (Staffing Report)

12. Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to receive the report of the Fair Employment Agency on staffing within the Northern Ireland Housing Executive.

Dr. Boyson: The report is a matter between the Fair Employment Agency and the Northern Ireland Housing Executive.

Political Reform

13. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the progress in current discussions between political parties in Northern Ireland and the Department; and if he will indicate which political groupings are involved and which Ministers are taking part.

17. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on any discussions currently taking place or proposed between political groupings in Northern Ireland and the Department; and if he will indicate which political groupings are involved and which Ministers are taking part.

Mr. Hurd: At my request, my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Patten) has begun to talk to the main constitutional political parties to investigate and clarify their positions. In due course, he will help me assess the prospects for progress towards new devolved arrangements for Northern Ireland.

Community Enterprise Scheme

14. Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will consider funding the community enterprise scheme for 18 to 19-year-olds at 100 per cent., where the sponsor has set a maximum of £50 per week.

Dr. Boyson: I have no plans to alter funding arrangements under the action for community employment (ACE) scheme.

Noraid

15. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what evidence he has that funds provided by Noraid are being used to support terrorism in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: In April 1982 Noraid was found by a United States court to be an agent of the Provisional IRA. While the House would not expect me to go into detail, all the information available to the Government since then confirms that Noraid directly or indirectly helps to finance the IRA's terrorist campaign. During my recent visit to the United States I took every opportunity to condemn Noraid activities and urge the people of the United States not to contribute to them.

Prevention of Terrorism Act

16. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people were questioned in Northern Ireland under the Prevention of Terrorism Act in each year since 1976; and what was the number of orders issued as a result.

Mr. Scott: Records are not maintained of how many people were questioned under the Prevention of Terrorism Act or with what results, but since 1976 my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made 29 orders under the Act excluding persons from Northern Ireland.

19. Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make available to Members of Parliament retrospective access to details concerning application of powers under the Prevention of Terrorism Act in specific cases, outlining factors such as reasons for arrest and detention, and outlining the procedural standards used after each arrest.

Mr. Scott: No.

Rubber and Plastic Bullets

18. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many complaints he has received about the use of rubber or plastic bullets.

Mr. Scott: Since September 1984, my right hon. Friend has received 52 letters commenting unfavourably on the use of baton rounds in Northern Ireland.

Higher Education (Report)

20. Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action he proposes to take on the joint report by the Northern Ireland Economic Council and the National Economic and Social Council on higher education in Ireland.

Mr. Scott: I have welcomed this report and its recommendations are now being considered by the Department of Education for Northern Ireland and other interested parties.

Baker Report

21. Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he proposes to introduce legislation to implement the recommendations of the Baker report.

Mr. Hurd: I hope to announce my proposals in the next few months and to introduce amending legislation as soon as parliamentary time allows.

Lignite

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will place in the Library a map of the Province showing the known deposits of lignite; and if he will make a statement about their exploitation.

Dr. Boyson: Until further work has been done by the private sector it will not be possible to provide a precise estimate or a definitive map of all the lignite deposits in the province. I have asked the Geological Survey of Northern Ireland to prepare for the Library a broadly indicative map which will show the general areas in which deposits have been located. In addition to the Crumlin deposit, for part of which a mining licence was issued in May 1984, further deposits were identified during an exploratory shallow drilling programme commissioned by the Department of Economic Development. The results of that programme were made available in November 1984 for purchase by the mining industry so that it can apply for prospecting licences by 28 June 1985 and undertake the detailed investigation and further exploration work that is now necessary to evaluate the precise size of deposits and their economic and commercial potential.

Abortion

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many women have been discharged from hospital following diagnosis of septic abortion in each year since 1955 in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information requested is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Housing Executive (Modernisation Schemes)

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the total amount of money spent by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive on modernisation schemes each year since 1980 in (a) Newry and Mourne district council area and (b) in Armagh district council area;

(2) what is the proposed expenditure by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive on modernisation schemes during 1985-86 in (a) Newry and Mourne district council area and (b) Armagh district council area.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I understand from the chairman that the information is not readily available; I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Housing Executive (Contracts)

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many contracts advertised by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive during the financial year 1983-84 were cancelled after tenders were received; and if he will list them;

(2) how many contracts advertised by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive during the financial year 1984-85 were cancelled after tenders had been received; and if he will list them.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I understand from the chairman that the information is not readily available; I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Northern Ireland (American Investment)

Q96. Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government will discuss with the United States Government greater American investment in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We welcome further investment in Northern Ireland from the United States as from other countries. We take every opportunity to brief Governments as well as individual companies about the advantages of such investment.

Plutonium

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what safeguards exist to ensure that non-nuclear weapons states acquiring reprocessing facilities do not use plutonium for military purposes.

Mr. Rifkind: Non-nuclear weapon states parties to the non-proliferation treaty undertake not to manufacture or otherwise acquire nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices. This obligation is verified by the acceptance of safeguards supervised by the International Atomic Energy Agency on all source or special fissionable material in all peaceful nuclear facilities within the territory of the state or under its control. In the case of non-nuclear weapon states not parties to the NPT, safeguards agreements with the IAEA are in force in respect of reprocessing facilities in two countries.

Moreover, 20 states have adopted the nuclear suppliers guidelines which establish the principles for safeguards and export controls which apply to nuclear transfers to any non-nuclear weapon state for peaceful purposes.

The guidelines specify that restraint should be exercised in transferring reprocessing facilities and that such exports should be subject to certain conditions, including the application of safeguards.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what specific steps he has taken to explore possible ways in which to establish a multilaterally based conservation and management regime for fisheries in the waters round the Falklands.

Mr. Renton: It would not be helpful at this stage to go into detail concerning specific steps taken towards the possible establishment of a multilaterally based fisheries regime in the area of the Falkland Islands.

President Belaunde Terry (2 May Press Conference)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs at what time the telegram from Her Majesty's ambassador in Lima, of the press conference held in Lima by President Belaunde Terry on 2 May 1982, sent at 01.44 Greenwich mean time on 3 May 1982 was received in London; at what time it was available in a form suitable for assessment by Ministers and officials; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The telegram was received in London by 0200 GMT on 3 May, and was processed immediately in the normal way under the arrangements that were in place during the conflict.

El Salvador

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when it was decided to appoint Mr. White and Mr. Ridgeway as official observers to the recent elections in El Salvador; what were their terms of reference; and if he will make public their report.

Mr. Renton: As I told the hon. Member on 2 April at columns 558-59, our decision was publicly announced on 22 March. Our observers covered the elections during the normal course of their functions as members of the Diplomatic Service.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information is available to him concerning the sending of observers to the recent elections in El Salvador by other European Economic Community countries.

Mr. Renton: The Federal Republic of Germany, the Netherlands and Belgium also decided to nominate observers to the El Salvador elections.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps have been taken by the European Commission, following the decision of the European Parliament on 25 October 1984 to make 3 million European currency units available to El Salvador in the form of emergency aid; and through whom such aid will be directed.

Mr. Raison: The European Commission has made no proposals concerning emergency aid to El Salvador since the resolution of the European Parliament of 25 October last.

Poor Regions

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the 50 poorest regions in the European Economic Community as defined by the European Commission.

Mr. Rifkind: The Commission's second periodic report on the social and economic situation and development of the regions of the Community, published in March 1984, lists the following 50 regions as having the most serious regional problems in the Community. The regions of Greece are not included because detailed statistics are still being compiled by the Commission and the Greek authorities. Greece is the member state with the lowest GDP per head in the present Community.

European Council (Votes)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the number of votes which will be given to each EEC member state when the Council is required to act by a qualified majority, including those assigned to Spain and Portugal; and how article 148 of the treaty is to be amended with the accession of Spain and Portugal.

Mr. Rifkind: The detailed arrangements for voting in the Council after the enlargement of the Community will be set out in the draft treaty which will be placed before the House after signature. It is agreed, however, that the proportion of votes required for a qualified majority in the enlarged Community will be the same as in the present Community. The intention is that article 148 of the treaty will be amended to give 8 votes to Spain and 5 to Portugal, raising the number of votes in the Council from 63 to 76. The qualified majority will go from 45 to 54.

Superphenix Reactor

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the French Government's plans to use the Superphenix fast breeder reactor to create plutonium for the warheads for a Western European Union nuclear force.

Mr. Rifkind: We are not aware of any such plans.

Spain and Portugal

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement outlining the basic features of the interim agreement by the Council of Ministers on the admission of Spain and Portugal to the European Economic Community.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer my hon. Friend to the speech I made today in the Adjournment debate on the enlargement of the European Community.

Sudan

Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement concerning United Kingdom relations with the Sudan.

Mr. Rifkind: We have a good relations with Sudan. There is a long and friendly association between our two countries. We have made a substantial contribution to the economic development of Sudan and are doing all we can to help resolve her refugee and drought problems. We hope that the Sudanese authorities will take practical steps to resolve their difficulties peaceably and thus restore stability and prosperity to their country.

Saudi Arabia

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, in the course of his discussions in Saudi Arabia, the Minister of State made representations about (a) the banning of Christmas festivities, (b) the flogging and public humiliation of British subjects and (c) discriminatory restrictions against women; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: As my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce) said on 20 March 1985, he made clear to his Saudi hosts that differences of culture, law and tradition could give rise to strong feelings in both countries which they and we should work to overcome. We acceplt that there is concern in Britain over the methods of punishment employed in Saudi Arabia against British citizens who have transgressed Saudi law. The Saudi authorities have been made aware that caning is abhorrent to British opinion.

As for reports of the banning of Christmas festivities, my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham said on 12 December 1984 that the difficulty was not widespread. But of course we are concerned that British subjects in all countries should be able to worship in private groups in accordance with their conscience at Christmas as at other times. In places where problems may occur, Her Majesty's embassy monitors the situation closely in consultation with members of the British community, and endeavours to ensure that suitable arrangements for worship are made.

The question of the treatment of women in Saudi Arabia is a matter for the Saudi authorities.

Human Rights

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the forthcoming conference on security and co-operation in Europe meeting on human rights and fundamental freedoms in Ottawa.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) on 20 March at column 533.

Antarctica

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, having regard to the United Nations study on the question of Antarctica and the United Nations resolution adopted on the subject in December 1984, he envisages any enlargement of the Antarctic treaty system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We welcomed the United Nations Secretary-General's study on Antarctica and believe it demonstrates the value and benefits of the Antarctic treaty system. The treaty is open to accession by any member of the United Nations. We believe this is the right basis for any enlargement of the treaty system.

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in the recent Antarctic minerals regime negotiations; what is the likely date of conclusion of current talks; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton The recent informal consultations in Rio de Janeiro built upon discussions at the earlier meetings at Wellington, Bonn, Washington and Tokyo. Further progress was made although no final conclusions were reached. There will be a further meeting later this year. It is not possible to predict when the current negotiations will come to an end.

SCOTLAND

Voluntary Conservation Bodies

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, in relation to the special grants programme operated by his Department, he has authorised a review of the exercise of powers to grant-aid to voluntary conservation bodies in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: Yes. It should be noted, however, that the Scottish Development Department does not operate a special grants programme of the kind described by the hon. Member.

Workers' Educational Association

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will make a statement about additional financial support for the activities of the Workers' Educational Association in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Levels of grant for 1985-86 to voluntary and other community education organisations have not yet been decided but continued financial support for the activities of the Workers' Educational Association in Scotland is not in doubt.

Protected Fauna (Control)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland has developed detailed guidelines for the issue of licences under section 16 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 to allow the control of protected fauna doing serious damage; and whether it is normal practice for the Nature Conservancy Council to be consulted on each such licence application and for each damage site to be visited by his Department's technical staff before any licences are issued.

Mr. John MacKay: The Department has guidelines for the use of its staff in considering applications for the issue of licences under section 16 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981.

In regard to applications relating to the protection of crops, where there is likely to be evidence of damage, it is the normal practice to consult the Nature Conservancy Council in each case; and a visit is usually made by a member of the Department's technical staff, though in some instances recommendations are made on the basis of their knowledge of the local situation.

In regard to the issue of licences for the protection of fisheries, my right hon. Friend has decided that it would be impracticable to consult the NCC about individual applications, or to visit each site. Decisions are taken in accordance with general advice given by the council.

Fishermen (Fuel Costs)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will estimate the cost of cutting the present price of marine gas oil charged to fishing vessel owners in order to reduce that cost by 25p per gallon;

(2) if he has any information on the weekly fuel bill cost of a fishing vessel of 80 ft in length;

(3) what information he has as to the cost of one gallon of marine fuel oil for fishing vessels in the years 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984, and the latest available figures for 1985.

(4) what is the amount of rebate granted to fishing vessels when purchasing marine gas oil; and whether value added tax on the purchase of this commodity is recoverable by the vessel owner.

Mr. John MacKay: I am inquiring into the matters raised by my hon. Friend and I shall reply as soon as possible.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the final costs incurred in policing the miners' industrial dispute in Scotland; and if he will list the costs by region.

Mr. Ancram: The information is set out in the following table:

Police Authority Area	Estimated final cost (£'000)
Central	573
Dumfries and Galloway	Nil
Fife	729
Grampian	Nil
Lothian and Borders	1,540
Northern	Nil
Strathclyde	2,095
Tayside	66
Total	5,003

Note: These figures represent the extra costs incurred during the coal dispute.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many miners brought to court during the industrial dispute received legal aid.

Mr. Ancram: Such information is not available centrally, and could not be obtained either readily or without disproportionate cost.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many policemen were involved in other areas of Scotland as a result of decisions on mutual aid during the miners' industrial dispute; and how many police forces were involved in the provision of mutual aid.

Mr. Ancram: Three Scottish police forces had occasion to deploy officers outwith their area in connection with the coal dispute. The forces, occasions and numbers of officers involved are shown in the table. Generally the deployments were for only very limited periods, sometimes less than an hour, during the week in question.

Teacher Training

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has reached decisions on the arrangements for intake to teacher training courses at Scottish colleges of education in session 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: Provisional arrangements suggested in a discussion paper issued by my Department have been the subject of consultation with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, the General Teaching Council for Scotland and the joint committee of colleges of education in Scotland. In the light of views expressed by these bodies, comments from individual colleges of education and other organisations, and education authorities' estimates of their future secondary school staffing requirements, I have now decided that the total numbers of students to be admitted to pre-service teacher training courses in session 1985-86 should be 600 to the four year primary BEd degree course, 200 to the one year primary postgraduate curse and 570 to secondary courses (on the basis that this last figure may be exceeded, if necessary, in order to admit any additional suitable applicants in business studies).

I am seeking the comments of the governing body of each college on the following proposed quotas within the aforementioned overall levels.

College	Primary Intake		Secondary Intake
	Proposed BEd Degree Course Quotas	Proposed Postgraduate Course Quotas	Proposed Quotas
Aberdeen	95	30	65
Craigie	70	20	—
Dundee	50	20	45
Dunfermline	—	—	40
Jordanhill	150	50	245
Moray House	120	45	90
St. Andrew's	115	35	85
Total	600	200	570

In regard to secondary intake I am advising the colleges to give priority in session 1985-86 to students applying for admission to courses leading to a teachig qualification (secondary education) in business studies, mathematics, physics and religious education6; and in regard to business studies in particular I am asking the colleges concerned to admit within their quotas the same numbers as in the current session and advising them that thereafter any additional numbers admitted will be over and above their quotas. I am also reminding each college of the need to consult the education authorities which it mainly serves in order to ensure that the numbers admitted both in individual priority subject and in other subjects appropriately reflect regional needs.

TRANSPORT

Fishing Industry (Research Awards)

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list for the years 1975 to 1985, respectively, the amount of money, expressed both as a total figure and as a percentage of total research awards made by his Department, allocated by his Department to universities or other research institutions for research into the following: (a) the occupational health and safety of United Kingdom fishermen and (b) the safety of United Kingdom fishing vessels.

Mr. David Mitchell: Statistics are not readily available in the form requested: moreover, research into marine safety is in general applicable also to fishing vessels and fishermen. However, the approximate value of some research projects applicable to the fishing industry is as follows:

Year	Research	Cost £
1975-78	Loss of the Gaul	65,000
1975, 1983	Buoyancy clothing	1,970
1979	Safety of gutting shelters	79,000
1978-81	Noise in fishing vessels	23,000
1979-84	Liferafts	104,000
1981-85	SAFESHIP (Survival in extreme seas)	800,000
1982	Navigation lights for fishing vessels	1,000
1983-84	Roll tests on fishing vessels	65,000
1983-85	Ship motion studies	202,000

The total funds spent by the Marine Directorate of the Department on research into marine safety and pollution control and prevention over the last six years was:

Year	Amount £ million
1979-80	1·7
1980-81	1·9
1981-82	2·0
1982-83	2·334
1983-84	2·866
1984-85	*2·600

* Provisional.

Estimated total expenditure on external research contracts by the Department of Transport was £9·8 million in 1984-85.

Motorways (Litter)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Transport on how many occasions in the latest period of time for which figures are available sections of each motorway have been closed in order to collect litter from the verges, central reservations and slopes.

Mrs. Chalker: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to clear the litter from the verges on the M4 between junctions 2 and 3.

Mrs. Chalker: As I told the hon. Member on 15 March, priority is given to work necessary to ensure safety. Our agent, the London borough of Hounslow, has told us it will be clearing up the litter on the verges after Easter.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Transport when was the last occasion litter was cleared from the verges, central reservations and slopes of each of the motorways; how much litter was collected in each case; and at what cost and to whom.

Mrs. Chalker: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any evidence about the effect of litter on the wildlife inhabiting motorway verges, embankments and central reservations.

Mrs. Chalker: No. I am not aware of any harmful effects on wildlife.

Motorways (Accidents)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many accidents on motorways in 1984 were caused by obstacles lost or discarded on the carriageways.

Mrs. Chalker: Causes of accidents are not identified on road accident reports. However, in 1984 it is provisionally estimated that 23 motorway accidents involved a dislodged vehicle load and 184 motorway accidents involved some other object in the carriageway.

Airports Policy

Mr. Haselhurst asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list his powers to determine policy on airports by way of special development orders.

Mr. Michael Spicer: None. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has the power under section 24 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 to make special development orders (subject to annulment by either House of Parliament) which may provide for the grant of planning permission for the developments specified in the orders.

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on his policy on Scottish Lowlands airports.

Mr. Ridley: Last summer, in consultation with the Secretary of State for Scotland, I commissioned a review by officials of the two Departments of policy for the use of the Scottish lowland airports (Edinburgh, Glasgow and Prestwick). Treasury officials and staff of the British Airports Authority and the Civil Aviation Authority also took part in the review.

I am placing in the Library of the House copies of the report of the working group which carried out the review. The report identifies econonic benefits to airlines and their customers, the financial effects on the BAA, and the social and environmental disadvantages to others which a change could entail, but does not make any recommendation for a change in the policy.

The Government have decided that for the present there should be no change in the policy under which Prestwick is designated as the gateway for long haul air services to and from Scotland. This is in line with the recommendation of the Scottish Affairs Committee in its first report of the 1984-85 session. At the same time we are very concerned at the decline in traffic at Prestwick in recent years and at the level of operating losses which have been experienced there. We are anxious tht the situation should not continue indefinately and therefore wish to see every effort made by those who want to preserve Prestwick to improve its economic performance. We look for a steady improvement in the airport's financial results as a result of such efforts, and to this end the freeport should help.

If however a change in the fortunes of Prestwick does not come about by 1989, the decision to maintain the existing policy will have to be reconsidered.

Roads (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what factors were considered in his decision not to make the extra 65 miles of London roads, proposed to be trunked, the responsibility of the appropriate borough councils as with designated roads.

Mrs. Chalker: I will answer this question shortly.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many posts are to be filled following his Department's advertisement in the New Civil Engineer and elsewhere for civil engineers in London to be involved in the preparation and design of major road schemes.

Mrs. Chalker: The Civil Service Commission regularly recruits professional civil engineers for my Department to fill vacancies caused by internal promotions and natural wastage. It is hoped that some 30 grade I and grade II civil engineers will join my Department through the current competition advertised in the New Civil Engineer on 14 February 1985.

I anticipate that roughly half of these will be deployed in various of the Department's regional offices on the management of the engineering aspects of the preparation and design of major road schemes, as set out in successive roads White Papers. The remainder will be in the London headquarters providing advice on aspects of engineering policy to local authorities and to the Department's regional offices.

Hayes Bypass

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport in the event of the abolition of the Greater London council what additional cost there will be to Hillingdon ratepayers arising from expenditure on the Hayes by-pass.

Mrs. Chalker: The Government have made it clear that they expect the overall effect of the abolition of the GLC to be broadly neutral for ratepayers in different areas. The detailed financial arrangements are under discussion with representatives of the local authority associations.

Traffic Signals (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he intends that highway powers in respect of traffic signals, and the ownership of the signals, should be retained centrally, in the event of the abolition of the Greater London council.

Mrs. Chalker: As has been made clear in our published consultation documents and most recently in the debate of the Report stage of the Local Government Bill — on 28 March at columns 609 and 611 — the Bill provides for the transfer of the relevant powers to the London borough councils and it will be for them to make suitable arrangements for these functions. Only if these are not agreed in good time would the Secretary of State activate his reserve power to ensure that the urban traffic control system and the services of the expert staff who support it, continue to be available to help meet the needs of road users in London.

A40 (Enlargement Schemes)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport why the royal borough of Kensington and Chelsea and City of Westminster council were not informed about the public exhibitions and consultation exercises in April 1983 and February 1985 on road enlargement schemes on the A40 in Acton, West London.

Mrs. Chalker: Our usual publicity was given to the arrangements for these informal consultations, which were concerned with getting local views on alternative ways of laying out two junctions on the A40. Once the best layout has been chosen, there will be ample opportunity through the statutory procedures for any LA or other interested party to offer their views.

Driving Test

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the current waiting time for a driving test at the Bradford, Keighley and Skipton test centres.

Mrs. Chalker: There are three driving test centres serving Bradford, and Skipton is an occasional centre served from Keighley. The information is as follows:

Test centre	Waiting time as at 29 March (latest available date) Weeks
Bradford (Brownroyd Hill road)	21
Bradford (Victoria road)	24
Bradford (Farfield street)	18
Keighley/Skipton	23

Waiting times for driving tests are far too high and the Department is recruiting and training new examiners as quickly as possible to reduce them to reasonable levels.

Mr. Watson asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the average length of waiting time experienced by driving test applicants between the receipt of their applications and the date of their tests, in January for each of the following years (a) 1979, (b) 1980, (c) 1981, (d) 1982, (e) 1983, (f) 1984 and (g) 1985.

Mrs. Chalker: The figures were:

Mid-January	National (Weeks)	North Eastern Traffic Area (Leeds) (Weeks)
1979	22	24½
1980	26	21½
1981	19	16½
1982	11½	7
1983	9	3½
1984	10½	5½
1985	15½	18½

Examiners are being recruited to bring the waits down to acceptable levels.

Roads (Statistics)

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for 1985-86 taxation revenue and public road cost figures and also a table showing taxation revenue, attributed costs, revenue-to-cost ratios and numbers of vehicles.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Information in the form requested is as follows:

Rail Services (Timekeeping)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will ask the chairman of British Rail to take steps to ensure the reliability of the published timetables for Sunday services.

Mr. David Mitchell: I am sure the chairman of British Rail is already well aware of the need to ensure that Sunday services should run wherever possible to the published timetable.

Liverpool Airport

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 25 March, Official Report, column 30, how long a period he proposes to allow the district councils in Merseyside to try to reach agreement on the future operation of Liverpool airport before making an order to transfer the interests in the airport formerly held by the metropolitan county council to the passenger transport authority.

Mr. Michael Spicer: On the assumption that the Local Government Bill receives the Royal Assent by the summer we shall wish to know by 1 September 1985 whether district councils have been able to reach agreement.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Departmental Achievements

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list his Department's principal achievements since 1979.

Mr. Tebbit: Since June 1983, the Department of Trade and Industry has added to the achievements since 1979 of what were previously the Department of Trade, the Department of Industry, and the radio regulatory department of the Home Office.

2. In its support of industry and commerce the Department has contributed to the formulation of the Government's economic policy which has brought about a substantial improvement in the operating environment for United Kingdom companies. The reforms of business taxation in the 1984 Budget are progressively helping to strenghen the competitive base of British industry by encouraging investment in projects which offer the prospect of good pre-tax profitability. The 1985 Budget continues this strategy, while offering a number of detailed improvements and a major restructuring of national insurance contributions to reduce employment costs and encourage the creation of sustainable new jobs.

In 1984 the gross trading profits of industrial and commercial companies were 22 per cent. higher than in 1983. Manufacturing output in 1984 rose by 3½ per cent., the largest rise in any one year since 1973. Output per head in manufacturing rose by 4½ per cent. over the same period. Confidence in the prospects for United Kingdom industry as measured by CBI surveys has continued at a high level. The volume of manufactured exports rose last year by 10 per cent., the largest annual increase for some ten years. Investment in manufacturing and service industries has also risen sharply, by about 13 per cent. in 1984.

3. Progress has been made in transferring publicly-owned industries to the private sector. British Telecom was successfully privatised in the largest, and most international, primary share offering ever made, with more than two million members of the British public applying for shares. Other successful transfers to the private sector have been Scott Lithgow, Jaguar and INMOS.

4. Further improvement has also been made in the performance of the state-owned industries for which the Department remains responsible. Over the last two years, the Post Office has increased its efficiency and productivity and more than met its financial targets while reducing the price of basic letter post service in real terms. After excluding the serious effects of the miners' dispute, the British Steel Corporation has made good progress towards achieving viability, with dramatic reductions in losses and external financial requirements since 1980-81 and a doubling of productivity, from 1979, to 271 tonnes per man-year by 1984, and in returning certain of their activities to private ownership through outright disposals and joint ventures. British Shipbuilders has continued to make substantial progress in restructuring its business to enable it to concentrate its resources on a stable cost-effective merchant shipbuilding business. To this end it is disposing of its other business including its warshipbuilding interests.

5. A new framework for telecommunications in the United Kingdom has been created. The Telecommunications Act 1984, which was passed in April 1984, established a regime designed to encourage competition in telecommunications and set up a new body —the Office of Telecommunications—as the regulatory body. Public telecommunication operator licences have been granted to British Telecom, Mercury and the Hull Telephone Company.

6. The Department has continued to offer practical and realistic support for industrial research and development. Some £300 million will be spent in 1984-85 to help with the costs of innovative projects and the introduction and application of new technologies. Policy in this area has been the subject of a major review, the outcome of which I announced on 25 March. This will result in a shift of emphasis in the Department's support towards advisory services, the encouragement of best practice, improvement in the supply of key skills, and collaborative research.

7. Well over 400 applications have now been received for the Alvey programme for research into advanced information technology, and some 80 cooperative projects involving companies and universities have been approved. The Department has also acted as a national focus to spread industrial and technological awareness in schools and to devise new ways of meeting the information technology skills shortages. The micros in schools programme has been successfuly completed. The British schools technology unit has been established to provide a mobile means of in-service teacher training and the Department has been promoting the establishment of mini-enterprises in schools. The Butcher committee's recommendations of a partnership for change between industry and the higher education system are now being implemented.

8. A series of policy decisions affecting the future product strategy of the aerospace industry have been taken. Agreement has been reached to the advance of £250 million launch aid to BAe in support of the company's participation in the Airbus A 320 project; to the advance of £70 million launch aid to Rolls Royce to assist with the development of the RB211-535E4 engine, and of £60 million to Westland towards its civil costs in developing the Anglo-Italian EH101 helicopter. Approval has been given for Rolls Royce to participate in the V2500 international engine project (with £60 million launch aid) to power the A320 and other aircraft, and for the company to collaborate with General Electric of the United States on larger civil engines.

9. Following the publication of a White Paper on regional industrial development in December 1983, decisions on the revised structure of regional industrial incentives were announced on 28 November 1984. The major changes from the previous structure affect the Assisted Areas map and regional development grants, and are designed to concentrate the Department's regional assistance where it can be most effective in creating new jobs.

10. The findings of the major review of tourism policy, which were announced in November 1983, are being implemented by the Department and the tourist boards.

11. The Department's small firms service continues to meet strong demand for information and counselling. In 1984 it handled more than 279,000 enquiries and provided counselling for about 25,000 firms. The loan guarantee scheme has been extended until the end of 1985 to cover up to a further £50 million of lending. Under its provisions almost 6,000 guarantees have been issued since June 1983 for over £191 million of bank lending. In November 1984 Business Improvement Services was launched to help small firms in English areas affected by job losses in the steel, shipbuilding and textile industries. Some £63 million is available to provide grants for business consultancy advice.

12. The Department has published a White Paper announcing the outcome of the review of policy on the film industry, and the Films Bill has been introduced to make the necessary legislative changes.

13. Within the European Community, the Department has continued to press for the consolidation of the internal market and to seek greater European industrial cooperation. The Department has also played its part within the European Community in urging international support for open trading policies, and for a new round of multilateral trade negotiations in the GATT; while continuing to defend vigorously those sectors of United Kingdom industry facing foreign competition recognised as unfair by the GATT.

14. Export volume grew last year by 8½ per cent. and for manufactures by 10 per cent. The Department helped industry to achieve this largest increase for some 10 years through a wide range of Ministerial visits, trade policy work, and the export promotion programme, under the guidance of the British Overseas Trade Board, which included 6,000 new contacts with firms interested in exporting.

15. The Department has continued to support British companies pursuing major project business overseas. Since June 1983 contracts worth about £3 billion with a United Kingdom content of just under £2 billion have been won. The Aid and Trade Provision was used to help obtain contracts with a United Kingdom content worth more than £400 million.

16. The Department has played an increasing role in attracting a growing volume of inward investment in the United Kingdom. 1984 was the best year for inward investment since IBB was founded 8 years ago. In 1984 projects handled and projects successfully landed increased respectively by 17 per cent. and 36 per cent. The projects successfully landed involved capital expenditure of about £3 billion and will create over 28,000 jobs and safeguard nearly 18,000 existing jobs.

17. In 1984 agreement was reached on the Nissan proposal to start production of cars in Britain, and Yamazaki Machinery Works Ltd. announced its intention of building at Worcester what will probably be the world's most advanced factory for the production of machine tools. However, inward investment from the USA remained predominant, with major companies such as Hewlett Packard establishing in the United Kingdom.

18. Royal Assent was obtained to the Trade Marks (Amendment) Act 1984 which provides for extension of the registered trade mark system to include marks used in relation to services. The Department has published a Green Paper on the recording and rental of audio and video copyright material as part of the consultative process leading to reform of copyright law.

19. The Department has pursued a wide range of matters of concern to consumers. For example, new safety regulations and prohibition orders have helped reduce the sale of dangerous goods to the public. Reviews of safety laws and the law on false and misleading pricing have been concluded and new legislations planned.

20. In December 1984 the Department introduced into the House of Lords an insolvency Bill following a White Paper in February 1984.

21. In the last twelve months, the massive task of consolidating the Companies Acts has been completed. The new consolidated Acts set out in clearer and more convenient form provisions previously contained in six major Acts and will be of direct benefit to both the professions and the business community as a whole.

22. Royal Assent was obained to the Restrictive Trade Practices (Stock Exchange) Act 1984 which removed the Stock Exchange from the ambit of the Restrictive Trade Practices legislation. This opened the way for radical changes in its dealing practices and admissions policies and to major innovations in the organisation of financial services in London.

23. Following Professor Gower's report on investor protection, the Department has published a White Paper on financial services in the United Kingdom, with a view to the introduction of legislation in the 1985-86 Parliamentary session to reform the law on investor protection.

24. Further progress has been made implementing the Financial Management Initiative in my Department. Details were set out in Cmnd. 9297.

Net Book Agreement

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what assessments the Director General of Fair Trading has made of the implications for the net book agreement of the decisions of the European Court in (a) VBVB and VBBB v. the Commission and (b) Association Leclerc v. SA Thouars Distribution; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what assessment he has made of the implications for the net book agreement of the judgments of the European Court in VBVB and VBBB v. the Commission and Association Leclerc v. SA Thouars Distribution; and if he will make a statement;

(3) pursuant to the answer of 19 December 1984, Official Report, column 247, what aspects of the net book agreement the Director General of Fair Trading keeps under review and with what considerations in mind; and if he will make a statement;

(4) if the Director General of Fair Trading will make it his policy to review the net book agreement when relevant developments occur in Community law; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: Under the legislation, the Director General of Fair Trading must demonstrate prima facie evidence of a material change in the relevant circumstances before he may apply to the Restrictive Practices Court to review its judgment on the net book agreement. The main consideration he has to bear in mind is whether there has been sufficient change in respect of those aspects of the operation of the agreement on which the court relied in reaching its judgment.

Relevant developments in the European Community are amongst the factors taken into account by the Director General, but it has to be borne in mind that the net book agreement is a voluntary arrangement operating principally within the United Kingdom, whereas VBVB and VBBB v. the Commission concerned trade between member states, Leclerc v. Thouars Distribution SA and Others involved statutory controls on book prices.

EC (Insurance)

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what efforts he is making in conjunction with his European Economic Community counterparts to remove barriers to the liberalisation of the insurance market throughout Europe; what information he has about the attitudes and proposals of the European Economic Community partners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: Freedom of establishment and services (that is, cross-frontier business) in respect of reinsurance were agreed in a Council directive in 1964. Barriers to freedom of establishment for direct insurance in the Community were lifted in further directives in 1973 and 1979. Unfortunately no progress has been made on dismantling the barriers to freedom of direct insurance services. Disagreement remains on the proposed directive on non-life insurance services because we want a liberal directive whereas the majority of our Community partners want a restrictive one. In an effort to make progress on freedom of insurance services, the Commission has brought cases in the European Court of Justice against four other member states in connection with the 1978 Co-Insurance Directive. We are intervening in support of the Commission.

Amateur Radio

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the reason for the refusal to allow class B radio amateurs to use all radio frequencies over 30 MHz.

Mr. Butcher: The class B amateur radio licence permits only the use of those frequencies about 144 MHz which are allocated to the amateur service in the United Kingdom. The only frequency between 30 and 144 MHz currently in the amateur licence schedule for use in the United Kingdom is 70 MHz, and this is not an exclusive allocation, has no international standing, and its use by amateurs is at the discretion of the primary user of the band (another Government Department), who has directed that it should be restricted to Class A licensees.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the cost of administration of the amateur radio licence service and supervision.

Mr. Butcher: The estimated cost for 1984-85 is £0·57 million which includes a contribution to the costs incurred by my Department on national and international planning and other activities relating to radio regulation: such a contribution is required of all licensed services.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to whom the licence fee paid by radio amateurs goes: and upon what purposes the money is spent.

Mr. Butcher: The radio amateur licence fee is collected on behalf of my Department by the Post Office. It serves to reimburse the costs incurred in administering the licensing of radio amateurs, and to make a contribution to the national and international planning and other costs relating to radio regulation.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his estimate of the cost involved in the issue of a gazetted notice concerning radio amateurs.

Mr. Butcher: The cost of gazetting such notices is largely dependent on the length of the notice and, as these vary greatly, it would be misleading to give the general estimate the hon. Member requires. However, to give an idea of the range of costs, during the last two years for notices concerning radio amateurs published in the three Gazettes costs varied from about £160 to £1,500. Staff time in the preparation of these notices has not been included.

Liverpool (Ministerial Visit)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the visit of his noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State to Liverpool.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The visit was undertaken as part of the normal programme for Ministers to visit the region and my noble Friend Lord Lucas of Chilworth took the opportunity to visit Merseyside to see at first hand two successful companies operating in the area. The companies visited were:

1. CBS Automobile Batteries at Aintree. A leader in the production of automotive batteries employing 154 people and exporting 18 per cent. of their output.

2. Manesty Machines Ltd. Manufacturer of tablet making machines employing 460 people in the north-west region and exporting 75 per cent. of its products to over 100 countries.

Whilst in Merseyside Lord Lucas took the opportunity to visit the Merseyside Development Corporation and to review progress of the re-development of the Albert dock. He also made a brief visit to the new enterprise workshops —127 small units in a converted dock side warehouse which are managed by BAT Industries Small Businesses Ltd. in partnership with the Merseyside Development Corporation.

Ericsson Exchanges

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to ensure that British manufacturers of telecommunications equipment will be given reciprocal access to the Swedish market following the proposed purchase of Ericsson exchanges by British Telecom.

Mr. Butcher: Suitable opportunities are taken to bring to the attention of other Administrations the advantages of a liberalised telecommunications equipment market and the merits of United Kingdom produced goods. As regards the AXE 10 equipment BT will be purchasing from Thorn Ericsson a high proportion will be manufactured in the United Kingdom, following an initial build up programme.

Post Office

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he has any plans to suspend the monopoly of the Post Office in regard to the collection and delivery of letters; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he proposes to introduce legislation to introduce competitive services in the field of letter collection and delivery; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: Powers already exist in the relevant legislation to introduce competition in the provision of letter services through the granting of licences to permit activities which would otherwise infringe the Post Office's exclusive privilege in respect of letters, or through suspension of the privilege. There are no immediate plans to make further use of the powers.

Telecommunications Industry (Shares)

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to prevent the sale of further shares of telecommunications operators in the United Kingdom to organisations or individuals based or resident in Japan.

Mr. Butcher: No. Such legislation would be contrary to this Government's belief in more open conditions of international trade and payments.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the negotiations between Her Majesty's Government and the Japanese Government regarding arrangements for access by United Kingdom organisations and individuals to the sale of shares in the Nippon Telegraph and Telephone Public Corporation in reciprocation of the access allowed to non United Kingdom organisations and individuals to the sale of shares in British Telecom.

Mr. Butcher: There have been no such negotiations.

Investment

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of United States and Japanese direct investment in the European Economic Community came to the United Kingdom in the most recent year for which figures are available; and what the comparable figures were in each of the years back to 1970.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The available information is given in the table. United States and Japanese net direct investment into the European Community*: United Kingdom as a percentage of EC.

Pesticides

Mr. Body asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the quantity of organophosporus pesticides imported into the United Kingdom for each of the last three years.

Mr. Channon: Organophosphor pesticides are not separately identified in the United Kingdom overseas trade statistics.

Textile Industry

Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his response to the report entitled "The Winding Down of Textiles", published by the board for social responsibility in the diocese of Manchester, a copy of which has been sent to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont I have only just received this report from the hon. Member and have not yet had the opportunity to consider it. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State will write to the hon. Member.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Agricultural Holdings

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to introduce legislation which will include provisions consolidating the statute law relating to agricultural holdings; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to him by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General on 4 April 1985.

Cheese Spread

Mr. Beggs asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will take steps to amend the food labelling regulations for cheese spread so as to enable cheese manufacturers in Northern Ireland to market products of less than 10 per cent. fat content as cheese spread.

Mrs. Fenner: Cheese spread is required by the 1970 Cheese Regulations to contain not less than 20 per cent. milk fat. These regulations were the subject of a report by the Food Standards Committee in 1982 and the Government are currently preparing proposals for revised regulations which would take into account the recommendations of the committee and of last year's COMA report on diet and cardiovascular disease.

EC (Spain and Portugal)

Mr. Harris asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will set out in full the agreement reached between the European Community and Spain on fishing rights in Community waters; and if he will give his assessment on how this will affect the south-west fishery.

Mr. MacGregor: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made clear in her statement on 2 April about the recent European Council, the agreement reached between the Community and Spain is a very satisfactory one so far as the United Kingdom fishing industry is concerned, setting out as it does arrangements applicable for the whole duration of the present Common Fisheries Policy up to 2002. In particular:

(i) unless the Council should decide otherwise during a review provided for in 1993, Spanish vessels will be allowed to fish only in waters to which they currently have access and will in addition be excluded from the Irish box until the end of 1995;

(ii) only 150 standard vessels (ie vessels of 700 bhp) will be allowed to fish simultaneously at any one time, this figure being divided between the ICES Areas concerned in the same proportions as the licenses at present granted under the EC-Spain Fisheries Agreement;

(iii) Spain will receive 30 per cent. of the Total allowable catches (TACs) for hake in waters which she has traditionally fished which is the same as her average share for the years 1979-84, in addition to which she will be permitted to take up to 4,500 tonnes of hake outside the TACs for the first 3 years only;

(iv) with the exception of megrim in area VII, Spanish shares of monkfish and megrim in areas of direct concern to UK fishermen will be those she currently receives under the EC-Spain fisheries agreement;

(v) Spain will also receive small share of nephrops and pollack, which she currently fishes under the by-catch provisions of the EC-Spain agreement, and for which TACs and quotas will be set for the first time for the Community as a whole in 1986; and she will receive flat rate entitlements for blue whiting and horse mackerel.

With the strictly limited exceptions I have instanced, which are of relatively minor significance to our fishermen, the agreement thus confines Spain to those waters and species for which she currently has access, in addition to which the number of Spanish vessels fishing in our waters will continue to be strictly controlled. As such, it preserves intact the effective fishing opportunities of United Kingdom fishermen and averts any question of a renegotiation of the CFP. These are factors which I know will be very welcome to our fishermen, including those in the south west.

Mr. Harris asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures he is taking to increase fishery protection off the south-west of England in the light of the new agreement between Spain and the European Community on fishing rights.

Mr. MacGregor: The nature of the agreement reached between Spain and the European Community on Spanish fishing in the waters of the existing member states after accession does not require any immediate increase in the resources devoted to fisheries protection, which are deployed flexibly in response to enforcement needs.

We have however impressed upon the Commission the need to ensure that the strength of the Community inspectorate is adequate to meet the increased demands that will be placed upon it after Spain and Portugal have joined the Community.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what information was supplied to the Council of Ministers concerning the admission of Spain and Portugal to the European Economic Community on the differences between the producer price levels and guarantees available in Spain and Portugal by comparison with those which will be available to them after entering the European Economic Community; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if the admission of Spain and Portugal to the European Economic Community will lead to an increase or decrease in the production by these nations of foodstuffs covered by common agricultural policy intervention and guarantees; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: During the accession negotiations the Commission circulated information on price levels in Spain and Portugal which showed considerable variation from those in the Community. Trading arrangements also differed. Overall while prices in Portugal tended to be higher than those in the Community prices in Spain tended to be lower.

Changes in volumes of production following accession will depend on many factors including relative price levels. Existing state trading arrangements will have to be dismantled and the Spanish and Portuguese markets gradually opened to trade from the rest of the Community. Any overall assessment of whether there will be an increase or decrease in foodstuffs covered by the common agricultural policy in the acceding countries would be subject to a wide margin of error.

Potatoes

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has determined the market prices for potatoes to apply in Great Britain and Northern Ireland for the 1985-86 crop year beginning on 1 July 1985.

Mr. MacGregor: Following consultations with the farmers' unions I have decided to authorise the Potato Marketing Board, under the new market support arrangements to apply in 1985-86, to enter into contracts with producers to purchase up to 420 thousand tonnes of potatoes over the months November 1985 to May 1986 at a scale of prices not to exceed an average of £53 per tonne. This represents an increase of £2 per tonne over the average contract price in 1984-85. I have also agreed that the board can additionally intervene directly in the market throughout the season where this will ensure support more cheaply than purchases under contract, provided that the total intervention does not exceed 500 thousand tonnes. The target area for potato planting in Great Britain, another important factor in market stability, was of course fixed last July at 161 thousand hectares.

The maximum target price for Northern Ireland, under the arrangements agreed with the Ulster Farmers Union last autumn, will also be increased by £2 to £46 per tonne. The target area for Northern Ireland plantings is 13,000 hectares and the ceiling for any support operations is 60,000 tonnes.

This price determination must not be taken to indicate that producers can look forward to regular increases in support prices. Support prices must be set in relation to market conditions and with regard to the cost of market support operations to the Government and the Potato Marketing Board.

This decision marks the completion of the package of changes to the system of potato market support which were recently approved by Parliament. The objectives are to ensure an element of stability for the potato market in order to retain producer confidence in the crop and to give consumers some assurance of supply at reasonable prices, while transferring to producers a greater share of responsibility for the cost of market support.

ENVIRONMENT

Olympic Games

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether it is his policy to encourage private enterprise to fund a bid from the British Olympic Committee to hold the 1992 Olympic Games in Manchester.

Mr. Macfarlane: Bids for staging the Olympic Games are the responsibility of the British Olympic Association and any interested city. It is for them to consider how a viable bid could be funded although I would not expect the public sector to bear the cost.

Football Hooliganism

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the officials of the Football Association and Football League on the question of football hooliganism; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a progress report with regard to steps being taken by his Department to reduce violence at football and other sporting events.

Mr. Macfarlane [pursuant to his reply, 3 April 1985]: I met representatives of the Football Association on 19 September 1984 and of the Football League on 25 September to discuss my Department's consultation document "Football Spectator Violence." Since then the Football Association has been represented at my meetings with 16 other interested bodies on that report.

I was present on 1 April when my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, together with my right hon. Friends the Home Secretary and Secretary of State for the Environment and other Ministerial colleagues, met representatives of the Football Association and Football League to discuss soccer spectator violence.

It is clear from that meeting that the football authorities share the Government's commitment vigorously to combat violence at football matches. They agreed to:

- re-examine urgently the FA rules governing discipline and the responsibilities of clubs, with a view to changing and strengthening them;
- accelerate the introduction of CCTV especially at grounds where problem matches may be played;
- ensure that perimeter fencing is in place and effective in those grounds;
- investigate a practical scheme of membership cards for Football League, FA and European/international matches, in discussion with UEFA as necessary, reporting back within six weeks;
- introduce more restrictions on the issue of tickets for problem matches (which should be ticket only);
- encourage more and better family enclosures at League grounds;
- deal severely with any bad example set to supporters by players' behaviour on the pitch;
- in advance of the legislation we propose, to take action under existing powers to deal with the problem of alcohol at matches.

The Government hope that significant progress can be made before the start of the season.

The Government will support the football authorities. We are prepared to take action in the following ways:

- legislation will be introduced in England and Wales to control the sale of alcohol at grounds, and on transport to grounds along lines that have been successful in Scotland. The powers would be used selectively;

under the Safety of Sports Grounds Act, designation will be extended to clubs in divisions 3 and 4 of the Football League, initially to grounds with a record of violence, and the guidelines in the green code will be reviewed; the White Paper is to be published shortly on our conclusions following our public order review and our proposals for legislation in the autumn. Some of the new provisions will assist in preventing and controlling football hooliganism;
my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary will be discussing with the police what improvements can be made to their effectiveness in dealing with football violence, particularly in obtaining evidence to bring more serious charges, where appropriate;
my right hon. and learned Friend is encouraging magistrates to make full use of their powers, including detention and attendance centre sentences and bail conditions forbidding attendance at matches; and is drawing attention to the Court of Appeal guidelines on sentencing violent offenders; for matches abroad, we will consult other Governments about publicising better and perhaps strengthening last years Council of Europe Recommendation on Football violence. We will review how the Diplomatic Service can help in identifying troublemakers. We are considering arrangements for people convicted for offences overseas to serve their sentences in this country. We will seek to discourage travel agents setting up special schemes for problem matches.

I believe this represents a substantial package of new measures from the Government to support the new tough line the Football Association and the Football League have agreed to take.

Overseas Ministerial Visits

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list, pursuant to the reply of 28 March, the individual countries visited by Ministers in his Department in the years 1983-84 and 1984-85 to date, and the costs thereof.

Sir George Young: The table shows the countries visited by DOE Ministers in 1983-84 and 1984-85 and the costs thereof.

DOE Ministerial Visits Overseas

Countries Visited	Cost £
1983-84
France and Holland	845
France and Luxembourg	1,072
Germany	981
Spain	798
Belgium (three visits)	1,365
Greece	1,283
Luxembourg	521
Cyprus	630
Yugoslavia	1,939
13 Countries Visited	9,434
1984-85
Germany (three visits)	1,824
Luxembourg and Germany	604
Italy (two visits)	2,349
France (two visits)	400
Norway	777
Belgium	331
Bahrain and Gulf States	3,069
Malta	1,087
USA	5,009
Malaysia, Hong Kong and USA	8,991
17 Countries visited	24,441

Notes:
1. The costs cover both Ministers' costs and those of private secretaries accompanying them.
2. They include all travel expenses and where relevant hotel subsistence and official entertainment.

Sports Competitors (Drug Abuse)

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has held any discussions with representatives of sporting organisations concerning drug abuse by sports competitors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: Yes, but action lies primarily with the Sports Council on the Government's behalf. The council has given and continues to give a positive and firm lead in combating drug abuse in sport. The Sports Council's drug abuse advisory committee is designated the United Kingdom anti-doping committee and brings together a unique blend of sporting and medical expertise in drugs and sport. In March 1984 the council, with my full support, adopted a resolution obliging all sports to introduce random drug checks, and at a recent symposium on drug abuse for governing bodies of sport the Council announced that it was stepping up its campaign to stamp out this pernicious practice.

I supported the adoption of a European anti-doping charter for sport at a meeting of European Sports Ministers in May 1984. Other countries and international sports organisations must follow the examples set by the Sports Council and the Council of Europe if sport is to rid itself of drug abuse. I also look to sports organisations in this country to comply fully with the Sports Council's resolution and to make sport in the United Kingdom an example to the rest of the world.

Private Sector Rented Accommodation

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends to introduce any measures aimed at increasing the amount of private sector accommodation available for rental; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer which my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) on 13 March at column 144.

Litter

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what grants he has given to those organisations concerned to prevent the discarding of litter in public places.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Keep Britain Tidy group receives a grant (approximately £½ million annually) from my Department under section 3 of the Litter Act 1983 in support of its wide range of litter abatement activities.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will initiate a national anti-litter campaign.

Mr. Waldegrave: There are no plans to initiate a specific new national anti-litter campaign. The Government believe that the long term solution to the problem of litter must lie in educating the public.

To this end, we give financial support to the Keep Britain Tidy group which campaigns continuously against littering in collaboration with local authorities, voluntary groups, industry and commerce.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the annual cost of collecting litter.

Mr. Waldegrave: I cannot estimate the annual cost of collecting litter.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent steps he has taken to abate litter.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government believe that the long-term solution to the problem of litter must be in educating the public not to drop litter. To this end we give financial support to Keep Britain Tidy group, which campaigns continuously against litter in collaboration with local authorities, voluntary groups, industry and commerce.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will initiate a public campaign to discourage the dropping of litter on motorways.

Mr. Waldegrave: There are no plans to instigate a specific campaign to discourage the dropping of litter on motorways. The Government believe that the long term solution to this aspect of the problem of litter lies in education of the public.

To this end we give financial support to the Keep Britain Tidy group which campaigns continuously against littering in collaboration with local authorities, voluntary groups and industry.

Local Government Reform

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations his Department has had with the Epping Forest district council and neighbouring local authoriries about the future management of Hainault forest, at present the responsibility of the Greater London council.

Mr. Macfarlane: None, but on 29 March my Department issued a memorandum on the transfer of property, rights and liabilities' to bodies affected by transfers. This states that, in the case of cross-boundary properities such as the Hainault forest, successor bodies will be invited to agree a solution for inclusion in subsequent transfer orders.

Royal Parks Constabulary

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many houses are available to the royal parks constabulary;

(2) what increase there has been in the last decade in the use of motor vehicles by police and other services in the royal parks; and if he will require it to be kept to a minimum for the avoidance of pollution.

Mr. Macfarlane: I will answer these questions shortly.

Commercial Properties and Hospitals (Waste)

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to bring into operation section 1 of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 relating to the removal of waste from commercial properties and hospitals.

Mr. Waldegrave: It would not be appropriate to appoint a day for the coming into operation of section 1 of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 until the bulk of waste disposal plans required under section 2 of that Act have been completed. To date, 16 English waste disposal plans have been completed, and a further 12 are understood to be at an advanced stage of preparation. My right hon. Friend continues to urge the remaining authorities to make progress as soon as possible.

London Planning Commission (Staff)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many staff will be employed by the proposed London planning commission; whether it will meet in public; and whether it will publish its proceedings.

Mr. Macfarlane: Decisions on the detailed arrangements for the London planning commission remain to be taken.

Civil Servants (Extra-departmental Work)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements are made to log the work of civil servants undertaken outside his Department.

Sir George Young: I will answer this question shortly.

Greater London Council

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why requests for consents from the Greater London council for the provision of vehicle hire services and printing were refused; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: I will answer this question shortly.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will define an inequitable shift of burden between London ratepayers and those in the rest of the United Kingdom as referred to in paragraph 5 of his consultation paper dealing with the effects of the disappearance of the Greater London council precept.

Mr. Waldegrave: Our intention is to ensure as far as possible that the financial effects of abolition itself are fair as between ratepayers in different areas. The detailed financial arrangements to achieve this are being discussed with representatives of local government in the London working party of the grants working group.

London Docklands Development Corporation

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list the sites referred to in paragraph 5.2.1 of the London Docklands development corporation 5-year operational plan, published in January, that the corporation has identified for possible acquisition, and identify the sites that are regarded by the corporation as high priority sites;

(2) what is (a) the cost of acquisition, (b) infrastructure and reclamation costs and (c) the disposal price of each site, listed separately, so far disposed of by the London Docklands development corporation;

(3) if he will list the consultants and consultancy fees used by the London Docklands development corporation in the 1984-85 financial year.

Sir George Young: I will answer these questions shortly.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, in the event of abolition of the Greater London council, London boroughs will be able to give assistance to industry outside their boundaries.

Sir George Young: Yes. Using existing powers, the London boroughs acting either alone or in voluntary co-operation with other boroughs will be able to assist industry outside their own boundaries provided they are satisfied such expenditure will be of benefit to their area or its inhabitants.

Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act (Guidelines)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidelines he has issued to civil servants in his Department in respect of the powers granted to him under sections 7, 8 and 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act.

Mr. Waldegrave: Other than those cases covered by the general consents the Department has issued, each application is treated on its merits.

Superstores (Planning Permission)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the locations in London of multiple-impact superstores with outstanding planning permission, and give details of those such stores where an application for planning permission has been made but is still under consideration.

Mr. Macfarlane: This information is not available in my Department.

GLC (Historic Buildings)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which of the listed historic buildings owned by the Greater London council will be transferred to the London boroughs in the event of the abolition of the Greater London council.

Mr. Macfarlane: The destination of each GLC property will depend on the purposes for which it is held, irrespective of whether it is listed or not; listed buildings could, therefore, go to any of the successor bodies, including London borough councils. I refer the hon. Member to the document "Abolition: Property Memorandum" issued by my Department on 28 March, a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House.

Rate Equalisation Scheme (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the contributions to the extended London rate equalisation scheme will be reduced in real terms in the years following the financial year beginning 1 April 1986.

Mr. Waldegrave: No decisions have yet been taken about the level of contributions to the proposed extended London rate equalisation scheme either for 1986-87 or for subsequent years. These matters are under discussion with representatives of local government in the London working party of the grants working group.

Environmental Organisations (Departmental Patronage)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each of the Ministers in his Department the environmental organisations of which they are the patrons.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave) is patron of the Avon Wildlife Trust threatened habitat appeal fund.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the number of civil servants working in his Department on (a) duties associated with the abolition of the Greater London council and metropolitan county councils and (b) rates limitation, listing in each case the numbers and ranks of officers and the estimated cost per year of each group.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: On 1 March, the number of staff working on abolition of the GLC/MCCs in my Department, including those administering the controls in sections 7 to 9 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 and the new control proposed in the Local Government Bill, was as follows:

Grade	Estimated full-time equivalents
Grade 2	0·2
Grade 3	1·9
Grade 5	9·0
Grade 6	2·6
Principal	15·2
Principal engineer	0·8
Principal information officer	0·1
Principal planning officer	0·7
Principal research officer	0·7
Economic adviser	1·2
PPTO estates officer	0·1
Senior executive officer	4·1
Senior planning officer	0·4
Senior research officer	1·0
Senior scientific officer	0·1
Higher executive officer/HEOD	16·0
Research officer	0·1
Executive officer/administration trainee	10·0
Clerical officer/assistant	11·4
Senior personal secretary	1·7
Personal secretary	6·3
Typist	2·0
Total	*85·0

* Does not sum owing to rounding.

The cost, including accommodation, of employing these staff for a whole year would be approximtely £1·9 million (1984 prices).

In relation to rate limitation, the work load for my Department has recently passed through a peak period. Within the existing commitment of staff resources, as my hon. Friend described in the answer to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West on 28 November 1984, the maximum number of staff engaged during this period on rate limitation work was:

Grade	Estimated full-time equivalents
Grade 3	0·25
Grade 5	2·2
Grade 6	0·4
Principal	3·7
Higher executive officer/HEOD	1·8
Executive officer/administration trainee	2·8
Clerical officer/assistant	3·0
Senior personal secretary	0·25
Personal secretary	1·5
Typist	0·5
Total	16·4

The cost of this level of input, including accommodation, on an annual basis would be approximately £0·36 million (1984 prices).

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he has any arrangements in mind to deal with single holdings of land which straddle boundaries between two or more transferee authorities in the event of the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils;

(2) what arrangements will be made to ensure that the property service for the London probation service and the London ambulance service is maintained in the event of Greater London council abolition.

Mr. Macfarlane: The Government's proposals for the transfer of property rights and liabilities of the Greater London council and metropolitan county councils are contained in a memorandum that was issued on 29 March, as announced in the reply given by my right hon. Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) on that day at column 397.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how he envisages, in the event of the abolition of the Greater London council, that open space replacement lands or other works of environmental reinstatement or consequential local replanning following a new highway scheme will be planned and implemented; and how he will ensure that consistent standards of environmental reinstatement and remedial measures are adopted from borough to borough.

Mr. Macfarlane: In so far as these matters are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend, I envisage no change in current policy and practice.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements he will make to ensure that the proposed London Fire Brigade Board has appropriate land management facilities available in the event of the Greater London council being abolished.

Mr. Waldegrave: It will be for the London fire and civil defence authority to consider appropriate arrangements for land management. The need for architectural and valuation expertise to be available to it is referred to in the advisory memorandum on the establishment of police joint authorities and fire service joint authorities under the Local Government Bill issued by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on 2 April.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Harlow on 16 November 1984, Official Report, column 378, about data collection, which information it is envisaged boroughs will (a) still want to collect and (b) will not wish to collect; and which information he will request of the London boroughs, in the event of the Greater London council being abolished.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: It will be for the borough councils to decide what use to make of the powers in clause 86 of the Local Government Bill. My right hon. Friend will take account of their decisions in considering the use of the powers conferred on him by the clause, which reproduce those in section 71 of the London Government Act 1963.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements, in the event of the abolition of the Greater London council to ensure [illegible] participation and involvement in pension matters through the residuary body of receiving authorities.

(2) if he will make arrangements in the event of the abolition of the Greater London council to ensure that any new residuary body continues the practice of full public disclosure of its superannuation fund investment policy and performance;

(3) in the event of the abolition of the Greater London council what arrangements will be made for the investment of the charitable, voluntary, trust and special funds presently invested by the investment management staff of the Greater London council superannuation fund.

Mr. Waldegrave: Regulations will be made to require the London residuary body to manage and administer the superannuation fund in accordance with the Local Government Superannuation Regulations 1974 (as amended). It will be for the residuary body to decide how this can best be achieved and to what extent it should continue the practices presently adopted by the GLC.

Fairhazel Co-operative, London

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has now received all the information he requires in respect of the application for the latest phase of funding for the Fairhazel Co-operative, NW3; when he expects to announce his decision; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The Department received esential information about the revised costs of the scheme from the London borough of Camden on 1 April. A decision will be announced very shortly.

Enterprise Zones

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many jobs were created at each of the enterprise zones in the United Kingdom during 1984.

Sir George Young: I refer to my answer to the right hon. Member's question on 13 February this year. Figures on employment in enterprise zones are not yet available.

Birds of Prey

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many registered keepers of birds of prey bred or attempted to breed the following species in 1983 (a) the golden eagle, (b) the goshawk, (c) the merlin, (d) the peregrine and (e) other raptores.

Mr. Waldegrave: 1983 was the first year of the bird registration scheme and the initial records were not in a form which enables this information to be obtained. The number of birds registered as bred in captivity in 1983 is:

	Number
Golden Eagle	None
Goshawk	46
Merlin	26
Peregrine	71
Other raptors	903
Total	1,046

Nuclear Fuel

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he proposes to investigate a study into the comparative merits of dry storage of spent nuclear fuel as against reprocessing.

Mr. Waldegrave: The environmental implications of the long-term management of spent nuclear fuel are currently being considered by the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee. It is taking account of studies carried out by the industry, and the position in other countries, where that is relevant.

Radioactive Waste Disposal

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to publish the special development orders for the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive investigation of potential land sites for the disposal of radioactive waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: A special development order will be laid before the House once Nirex have announced alternative possible sites for a particular type of land disposal facility. For sites for consideration alongside Elstow for shorter-lived wastes, I expect an announcement to be made within the next few months.

North Pennine Area of Outstanding Beauty

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends to hold a public inquiry into the proposed designation of the North Pennine area of outstanding natural beauty; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I will answer this question shortly.

Conservation (Special Grants)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will outline the source or sources of funds made available to voluntary organisations in the conservation field in relation to his Department's special grants programme; and if he will list the extent of each of the contributions.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his answer, 1 April 1985, c. 432-3]: Funds for the special grants programme are drawn from DOE Vote VIII 2 subhead C9. The following grants were awarded under the programme in 1984-85 to voluntary organisations concerned with conservation:

British Trust for Conservation Volunteers	100,000
Byways and Bridleways Trust	4,000
Cathedral Camps	10,000
Conservation Foundation	25,000
Conservation Trust	8,250
Council for Environmental Conservation	32,600
Council for National Parks	7,620
Ecological Parks Trust	14,200
International Waterfowl Research Bureau	2,000
Kennet and Avon Canal Trust	5,000
Open Spaces Society	4,500
Pennine Heritage	23,000
Royal Society for Nature Conservation	41,135
Rural Preservation Association	11,536
Tree Council	13,000
Wildfowl Trust	2,600
Wildlife Link	8,000
World Wildlife Fund UK: Youth Education Work	18,000

SOCIAL SERVICES

Benefits

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he proposes any changes affecting the benefit entitlements of 16 and 17-year-olds.

Mr. Fowler: I have no proposals at present for changes in benefit entitlement as part of the current plans for expanding the youth training scheme. It is, however, the aim of this expansion to provide a guaranteed opportunity of appropriate training for young people of this age who are not in work or in full-time education. The benefit position will be given further consideration in the light of progress towards this objective, taking into account also any wider changes in the benefit system which may follow from the present social security review. The Government's objective is to ensure that unemployment need not be an option for this age group.

Health Authorities (Declarations of Interest)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if declarations of interest by members and staff of health authorities are available to the public.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Chairmen and members of health authorities are required to declare any pecuniary interest they may have in all matters considered at authority meetings. These meetings are normally open to the public. Health authority staff are required to disclose any pecuniary interest they may have in contracts considered by the authority.

National Health Service (Internal Audit)

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how far tenders and contracts for laundry, catering and other ancillary services in the National Health Service are subject to internal audit.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: All health authorities must have arrangements for internal audit. The extent to which these arrangements are applied to tenders and contracts for these services is decided locally.

Departmental Legislation

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many Acts of Parliament have been promoted and how many Statutory Instruments made by his Department, or predecessor Departments covering his areas of responsibility, in each of the last 20 years.

Mr. Fowler: The numbers are as follows:

Year*	Acts†	SIs‡
1965	6	51
1966	3	92
1967	6	85
1968	4	82
1969	4	88
1970	5	71
1971	3	121
1972	6	93
1973	5	155
1974	3	152
1975	9	134
1976	5	97
1977	3	140
1978	2	108
1979	6	101
1980	7	132
1981	3	100
1982	4	145
1983	5	125
1984	4	132

* The particulars relate to the Ministry of Health (1965 to 1968), the Ministry of Pensions and National Insurance (1965 to 1966) the Ministry of Social Security (1966 to 1968) and the Department of Health and Social Security (1968 to 1984).

† Where particular responsibilities were transferred from other Departments the numbers above do not include Acts passed or instruments made before the date of transfer.

‡ A small number of Acts resulting from Private Members' Bills, on matters for which the Ministries or Department mentioned in Note 1 were responsible, is included in the particulars in column (2).

General Practitioners

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his reply of 25 March, Official Report, column 97, from what other sources of public monies for which he has responsibility general practitioners received sums; if he has made any estimate or is proposing to make any estimate of the value of those sums to the average full-time general practitioner; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Payments are made to general practitioners for the provision of medical advice and for expenses incurred. Our Department makes payments mainly in connection with social security benefits. Health authorities make payments for work done for the health and community health services. Health authorities or local authorities as appropriate make payments for assistance given to social services departments. Statistics do not normally identify such payments made to general practitioners and details of the payments are not available centrally. We have not made any estimate of the value of such payments to the average full-time general medical practitioner.

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many general practitioners operate within the National Health Service in England; how many operate on a part-time basis and how many on a full time basis; what was the average sum received by unrestricted general medical practitioners who operated full time for the provision of family practitioner services in 1983 and 1984, respectively; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The number of unrestricted principals in England at 1 October 1984 was 23,642 (provisional). We do not make a breakdown between full time and part-time principals. So far as remuneration is concerned I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to him on 25 March at column 97. The average sums referred to in that Answer cover all unrestricted principals whether part-time or full time.

Pharmaceutical Price Regulation Scheme

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the reply of 25 March, Official Report, column 96, what steps his Department takes to ascertain whether companies within the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme have exceededed the sales promotion limit; how many companies exceed it within the last year for which figures are available; and if he will identify them giving the amount of excess in each case.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Sales promotion expenditure is included in the financial returns sent to us and reported on by company auditors. In 1982, 51 larger companies exceeded their sales promotion limit. We treated this excess as profit forgone. We have now introduced a new provision whereby from 1 April 1984 companies have also to pay to us a sum equivalent to any excess. For reasons of commercial confidence we do not identify individual company results.

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he takes to control distribution and administration costs of companies within the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme; what they comprise; whether he has any plans to investigate the same; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: All costs are included in the financial returns sent to us and reported on by company auditors. These are accepted only if we believe them to be reasonable and we can and do disallow any thought to be excessive. Distribution includes expenses of warehousing, storage and transport. Administration covers items such as Directors' and Headquarters salaries, rent, rates and other office expenses.

Drugs (Costs)

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) pursuant to the reply of 14 March, Official Report, column 243, what was the total value of the discount on drugs costs from wholesalers and manufacturers given to dispensing doctors in the last year for which figures are available; and what savings would be made to the National Health Service as a whole if a similar level of discount were given by drugs wholesalers and manufacturers to all purchasers of drugs by or on behalf of the National Health Service;

(2) pursuant to the reply of 25th February, Official Report, column 71, whether discounts will continue to be available on drugs dispensed by dispensing doctors after 1 April; whether similar discounts are offered by drugs wholesalers and manufacturers to all or any other purchases of drugs by the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

National Insurance

Mr Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will break down the projected £800 million of additional revenue in a full year from the Budget proposal to abolish the upper limit on employer's national insurance contributions as between additional revenue from (a) earnings between the current cut-off point or its monthly or weekly equivalent and £15,000, (b) earnings from £15,000 to £20,000, (c) earnings from £20,000 to £30,000, and (d) earnings above £30,000.

Mr. Whitney: The Government Actuary's estimates are:

Annual earnings £	Additional revenue from secondary contributions in a full year £ million
Up to 15,000	25
15,000 to 20,000	300
20,000 to 30,000	325
Over 30,000	150

Health Education Council

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what discussions he has had with the Health Education Council about its first-time endorsement in The Grocer of 2 February of branded food products; and if it is now the policy of Her Majesty's Government that the council should provide such endorsements.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what were the waiting list figures for National Health Service patients in England and Wales as at 1 June 1979 and 31st December 1984 or the nearest convenient dates; what were the staffing figures at the same dates; and what was the expenditure on the National Health Service at the same dates in both cash and real terms.

Mr. John Patten: The available information for England is given in the table. Expenditure figures for the financial year 1983-84 are the latest available. Figures for Wales are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

NHS England

	1979	1984
Hospital in-patient waiting list	740,300 (on 30 June)	682,000 (provisional on 30 September)
Directly employed staff* (whole time equivalent on 30 September)	773,300	817,600 (provisional)
	1979-80 £ million	1983-84 £ million
Expenditure by health authorities in the financial year
Cash	7,357	12,148·8
Cost at 1983-84 prices measured by the GDP deflator	10,673·5	12,148·8

* Manpower figures include agency nursing and midwifery staff, and locum medical and dental staff.

Richmond, Twickenham and Roehampton District Health Authority

Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set out in the Official Report the population of the Richmond, Twickenham and Roehampton district health authority and the absolute and percentage figures for the numbers and proportions within the constituencies of Twickenham, Richmond and Barnes, and Putney.

Mr. John Patten: The latest information is in the table.

District Health Authority/ Parliamentary Constituency	*Estimated Resident Population At 30 June 1983
	Number	Percentage
Richmond, Twickenham and Roehampton DHA	228,700	100
Twickenham	84,300	37
Richmond and Barnes	76,000	33
Putney	68,400	30

* Estimates of population for parliamentary constituencies are not compiled on an annual basis. The above figures for the parliamentary constituencies within Richmond, Twickenham and Roehampton district health authority use proportions derived from the 1981 census data. Putney has one ward which lies outside the DHA and the population of this ward is excluded; the other two constituencies lie wholly within the DHA.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many letters Ministers in his Department have sent to regional, area and district health authorities chairmen since 1981 on privatisation;

(2) how many speeches Ministers in his Department have made since 1981 (a) in the House and (b) outside the House on the subject of his Department's press notices on privatisation.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not keep these figures. Ministers have taken a close interest in ensuring the success of our competitive tendering policy. This policy is already producing large savings which are being used to improve services to patients.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many circulars on privatisation he has issued to health authorities since 1981.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I assume the hon. Member is referring to competitive tendering and only one circular, HC(83)18, has been issued on this subject.

Cervical Cytology

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many letters Ministers in his Department have sent to regional, area and district health authority chairmen since 1981 on cervical cytology;

(2) how many speeches Ministers in his Department have made since 1981 (a) in the House and (b) outside the House on the subject of his Department's press notices on cervical cytology.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not keep those figures but Ministers have made repeated attempts to bring home to health authorities the importance of cervical cytology.

Our policy on this subject has been clearly set out in circulars HC(81)14 and HC(84)17 and health authorities know that they have been expected to implement it. Speeches by Ministers are not the only or even the best method of monitoring the performance of authorities.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many circulars on cervical cytology he has issued to health authorities since 1981.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Two. HC(81)14 and HC(84)17.

Committee on Gynaecological Cytology

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will (a) list the members of the committee on gynaecological cytology since 1 January 1981, (b) give the dates when it has met since 1 January 1981, and (c) place in the Library any minutes of its meetings, official recommendations or other communications with Ministers or officials of his Department since 1 January 1981.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

In Vitro Fertilisation

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which National Health Service clinics conducting in vitro fertilisation were consulted by his Department before officials advised that a four-month limit would cover the period of treatment by in vitro fertilisation.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our Department has never given advice in these terms. I have written to the hon. Member explaining the misunderstanding.

Centre for Applied Microbiology and Research

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about arrangements for the marketing of products and processes at the Public Health Laboratory Service Board's centre for applied microbiology and research.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: A substantial part of the work of the centre for applied microbiology and research (CAMR) has generated products and processes that are commercially exploitable. I am pleased to announce that, in line with its long-standing policy of income generation at CAMR, and after careful consideration with our Department, the Public Health Laboratory Service Board (which is responsible for CAMR) has entered into an agreement with Porton International Limited to handle the marketing and distribution of CAMR products and processes.

A copy of the press release issued jointly by the Public Health Laboratory Service Board and Porton International Limited has been placed in the Library.

Nursing Homes

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what were the total numbers of (a) private hospitals, homes and clinics registered on 31 December 1983 under section 3 of the Nursing Homes Act 1975 and (b) beds they contain; and if he will give the figures for each region;

(2) what were the total numbers of (a) private hospitals, homes and clinics registered on 31 December 1983 under section 3 of the Nursing Homes Act 1975 which contain operating theatres and (b) beds they contain; and if he will give the figures for each region.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 327]: The available information is given in the table.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total number of private hospitals, homes and clinics registered on 31 December 1983 under section 3 of the Nursing Homes Act 1975 which contain both operating theatres and (a) pathology departments and (b) radiology departments; and if he will give the figures for each region.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 327]: The available information is given in the table.

Private hospitals, nursing homes and clinics registered under the Nursing Homes Act 1975, as amended by the Health Service Act 1980 Position at 31 December 1983

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the total numbers of (a) nursing staff and (b) medical practitioners employed (i) by all the private hospitals, homes and clinics registered on 31 December 1983 under section 3 of the Nursing Homes Act 1975 and (ii) by those private hospitals, homes and clinics which contain operating theatres; and if he will give the figures for each region.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 327]: The available information is given in the table.

EMPLOYMENT

Departmental Achievements

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list his Department's principal achievements since 1979.

Mr. Tom King: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Link Courses

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many and what percentage of women on link courses withdraw because of becoming pregnant; and what were the equivalent figures for each of the last five years for which records are available.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information is not available.

Trade Unions (Political Funds)

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has as to the proportion of trade union political fund expenditure represented by affiliation fees to political parties.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Information about trade unions' expenditure from both general and political funds is contained in annual returns of accounts which all trade unions are required to submit to the Certification Officer. It is not possible in every case to distinguish between expenditure on affiliation fees and other grants and donations to political parties. An analysis of the latest accounts of the ten trade unions with the highest level of political expenditure, representing about three quarters of all political fund expenditure shows that in 1983 at least 78 per cent. of that expenditure was accounted for by affiliation fees and other grants and donations to a political party.

The figures for each of these trade unions were as follows:

Union	Amount of payments to a political party £	Proportion of total political fund expenditure per cent.
TGWU	1,449,000	91
GMBATU	1,164,000	81
NUPE	585,000	46
AUEW(E)	722,000	92
NUM	440,000	92
USDAW	223,000	50
NUR	272,000	90
COHSE	208,000	76
UCW	242,000	96
EETPU	205,000	99
Total	5,510,000	78

The purposes to which the remaining political fund expenditure is put are not always apparent from the accounts but it is possible that some of that expenditure also represents payments to or on behalf of a political party. In 1982 payments to a political party accounted for at least 69 per cent. of the political fund expenditure of the same ten trade unions. The difference is probably attributable to the fact that 1983 was a year in which a general election took place.

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many trade unions have balloted their members in the last 10 years on whether they should have a political fund.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In the last 10 years seven trade unions have balloted their members under the provisions of the Trade Union Act 1913 on whether they should set up a political fund, with the following results:

Year of ballot and Union	Votes for	Votes against
1976 Society of Graphical and Allied Trades	25,837	24,665
1981 National Union of Hosiery and Knitwear Workers	13,414	17,054
1981 Association of Broadcasting and Allied Staffs	871	4,506
1982 Society of Union Employees	100	20
1983 Society of Telecom Executives	10,761	9,217
1983 Civil and Public Services Association	31,479	65,922
1984 Amalgamated Society of Textile Workers and Kindred Trades	1,011	673

None of the 53 trade unions with political funds has balloted during the last ten years on the continuance of its political fund.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Employment for how many hours per month as a minimum a new employee has to be required to work in order to figure as one full digit in the official total of persons in employment.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department's inquiries into the number of employees in employment ask employers to state the number of persons employed by them on a particular date. No information is sought as to how long a person has been employed. Employers are asked to distinguish whether a person works full-time or part-time. Full-time employees are those who are normally expected to work more than 30 hours per week excluding main meal breaks and overtime. Part-time workers are included in the total on a one-to-one basis.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment by how much the number of employees rose over the last 12 months for which figures are available; and by how much the number of female part-time employees, male part-time employees, female full-time employees, and male full-time employees rose in the same period.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In the 12 months to September 1984, the number of employees in employment in Great Britain rose by an estimated 102,000. The increases for full-time and part-time females were estimates at 18,000 and 170,000 respectively. Analyses of full-time and part-time males are not made, but it is estimated that the total number of male employees in employment fell by 87,000 over the same period.

Youth Training

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment how the gross cost of the expansion of the youth training scheme in 1986-87 and 1987-88 is calculated; and what estimates have been made of the number and average cost of the additional mode A, mode B1 and mode B2 places required.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The total cost of the new youth training scheme will depend on the outcome of the consultations which the Manpower Services Commission are carrying out. The Government are prepared to provide £125 million in 1986-87 and £300 million in 1987-88 in addition to spending on the existing scheme, subject to the satisfactory outcome of those consultations. We are looking to employers, who stand to gain a great deal from this development in our training arrangements, to pay their fair share as well. The number and average cost of additional places, and the funding and administrative arrangements will also depend on the outcome of those consultations.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the estimated net cost of the expansion of the youth training scheme in 1986-87 and 1987-88; how the estimate is calculated; and what estimates have been made of the amount saved by the abolition of the young workers scheme, the number of young people who would have been covered by the scheme in each year and the average sum saved per person, and of the number of 16 and 17-year-olds in each year who will cease to claim supplementary benefit as a result of the expansion of the youth training scheme, the average sum saved per person, and the total sum saved on benefit in each year.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I will write to the hon. Member shortly.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give his best estimate of the proportion of the rise in youth unemployment since 1979 that can be attributed to the three factors cited in the White Paper "Employment: The Challenge for the Nation," Cmnd. 9474, namely the general shortage of jobs, the high relative pay of young people, and the disadvantages of those who missed the big expansion of youth training since 1983, paragraph 3.11.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Unit Labour Costs

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether the estimates of the rise in the unit labour costs of various countries given in figure 9 of the White Paper "Employment: The Challenge for the Nation," Cmnd. 9474, have been adjusted to allow the movements in each country's exchange rate; and whether he will publish an index for each of the countries cited showing the rise in unit labour costs in each year since 1974, or the nearest approximation available, taking 1974 as a base date and deriving the index in terms of United States dollars.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: As the note to figure 9 of the White Paper "Employment: The Challenge for the Nation" (Cmnd. 9474) makes clear, the data portrayed relate to unit labour costs in local currency terms.

The table gives figures adjusted for exchange rate changes. Although short run movements in exchange rates will affect competitiveness, movements in domestic labour costs are a crucial long run determinant. Over the period since 1974, unit labour costs adjusted for exchange rate changes have risen by more in the United Kingdom (+33 per cent.) than in the United States (+26½ per cent.). They fell in the Federal Republic of Germany (−8½ per cent.) and Japan (−18½ per cent.).

Ballot Rigging

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will seek powers to prevent ballot rigging in trade union elections.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Part 1 of the Trade Union Act 1984, which comes into force on 1 October 1985, introduces for the first time extensive statutory safeguards for trade union elections. It would be premature to consider any further steps before these provisions have come into force.

The Act creates a presumption in favour of postal ballots. It lays down requirements concerning, among other things, secrecy, elgibility to stand and to vote, freedom from intimidation and electoral malpractice. It also lays down requirements concerning methods of election. For example, executive members must be directly elected and "block systems" of voting must not be used. Further, the Act gives ordinary union members a new statutory right to take any complaint to the independent certification officer or to the courts, who can order fresh elections or other corrective action as appropriate. It also requires unions to compile, by 1 October 1985, registers of their members' names and addresses and to keep these up-to-date.

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Employment if, in the light of recent allegations of ballot rigging in trade union elections, he will seek a further meeting with the Trades Union Congress to discuss further the arrangements for trade union elections.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend and I are always ready to meet representatives of the TUC to discuss with them how trade unions can best fulfil their statutory obligations in relation to the Trade Union Act 1984.

Coventry

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the latest number who are now unemployed in Coventry; and how many have been unemployed for 12 months or over.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The following information is in the Library. On 14 February 1985 the total number of unemployed claimants in the Coventry local authority district was 26,453, of whom 13,185 are estimated to have been unemployed for over 12 months.

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he is taking to reduce the number of those unemployed for over 52 weeks in Coventry.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) on 2 April, at column 1050, and to the general strategy set out in "Employment: the Challenge for the Nation" (Cmnd. 9474).

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people in Coventry between the ages of 40 and 50 years are presently unemployed but engaged in retraining programmes.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The precise information requested is not available. But at the end of February, around 130 unemployed people aged between 40 and 50 years were undertaking retraining on programmes run by the Manpower Services Commission in the Coventry area. In addition some long-term unemployed people in temporary jobs funded under the community programme will be receiving training.

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people in Coventry have their wages determined by wages councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This information is not available.

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to increase the allocation of community programme places in Coventry.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) on 25 March at column 38.

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many offences in Coventry under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act were identified in the latest available year; and how many prosecutions took place.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information is not available in the form requested. In 1984 factory inspectors laid eight informations in Coventry under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 and its associated legislation. These resulted in eight convictions.

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he is satisfied that the training in new technologies available under the youth training scheme in Coventry is adequate to meet the need.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Yes. Nearly 900 of the places in the youth training scheme available to young people in the Coventry area involve significant elements of training in new technologies. In addition, all youth training scheme trainees receive an introduction to computer literacy and information technology during their time on the scheme.

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people in the Coventry travel-to-work area have received the enterprise allowance since its inception; how many are presently in receipt of the allowance; and how many continue trading after 18 months.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I regret the figures are not available in the form requested. However, in the Coventry and Warwickshire area by 8 March 1985, 1,818 people had joined the enterprise allowance scheme since its inception. On the same date 687 people were receiving the allowance in the Coventry and Warwickshire area.

Information on how businesses fare when payment of the allowance ceases is not yet available for the national scheme but experience in the pilot areas suggests that about 70 per cent. of all businesses supported are still trading up to 18 months after joining the scheme.

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of the registered insured population, male and female, are in part-time employment in the Coventry travel-to-work area.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information is not available in the precise form requested. Information about the numbers of employees, male and female, in full-time and part-time employment can be provided but only for those dates when censuses of employment are taken.

Censuses of employment have been taken triennially since 1978 and the latest results are for September 1981. At that time, there were 191,000 employees in employment in the Coventry travel-to-work area with 20 per cent. working part-time. There were 114,000 male workers and 77,000 female workers with 4·4 per cent. of the males and 42·3 per cent. of the females working part-time.

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many places there are in sheltered employment in the Coventry travel-to-work area; and if there is a waiting list.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In the Coventry travel-to-work area, defined as the area covered by Coventry and Nuneaton jobcentres and Hinkley and Bedworth employment offices, there is a total of 212 filled places supported under the sheltered employment programme. A further four places are expected to be filled shortly. There are 72 severely disabled people on waiting lists for places in the sheltered workshops in the area. The Manpower Services Commission will continue to look for opportunities to place them in suitable provision including places created under the sheltered placement scheme.

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Employment what level of funding is devoted by the Manpower Services Commission to the Coventry travel-to-work area.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I regret that the information is not available in the precise form requested. However, it is estimated that about £29 million was spent by the Manpower Services Commission in 1984-85 in the Coventry and Warwickshire area, exclusive of administrative costs, and the operating costs of jobcentres.

Community Programme

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give in 1985 prices the operating cost per approved place allowed to the sponsoring agency on the community programme since its inception; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Since the programme's inception sponsors and agents have been reimbursed operating costs up to a maximum of £440 per year for each full or part-time approved place over 52 weeks, with the exception that managers and supervisors places do not attract operating costs.

The level of operating costs is kept under review and, to date, the level of costs actually claimed by sponsors and allowed for reimbursement has remained considerably below the maximum.

Retail Price Index

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he expects to receive the report of the committee investigating the composition of the retail price index.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We hope to receive a report by the end of this year.

Wages Councils

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many workers are presently covered by wages councils in Wales and in which categories of employment.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This information is not available.

Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Employment who is to be chairman of the group to review vocational qualifications in England and Wales announced in paragraph 39 of the White Paper, "Education and Training for Young People", Cmnd. 9482, published on 3 April.

Mr. Tom King: Mr. H. G. De Ville CBE has agreed to act as chairman of the review group. Mr. De Ville is about to retire as executive deputy chairman of BICC plc and has a life time of experience of personnel training and industrial matters. At BICC his responsibilities included personnel and management services and before that he was for some 10 years responsible for personnel and training at the Ford Motor Company, Dagenham. He has been a member of the Council of the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service (ACAS) since 1976.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science, the Secretary of State for Wales and I are delighted that he has accepted our invitation to act as chairman of the review group. The Manpower Services Commission with the Department for Education and Science is now arranging for the group to be constituted and to begin its work and we look forward to receiving an interim report in the autumn and a final report in about a year's time.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people are on youth training schemes within the city of Leicester; how many companies are supporting the youth training scheme in Leicester; and if he will give the number of companies and young people involved in each month since the scheme began.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 28 March 1985, c. 293]: Information for the city of Leicester is not available. The table shows the number of young people in training on the youth training scheme in the Leicester local authority district at the end of each month since the scheme began.

Information on the number of companies taking part in the youth training scheme is not available. However, it is estimated that training under the scheme takes place in some 650 locations in the Leicester local authority district (but not all of these will be in companies).

Wages Inspectorate

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will publish for the north-west (east) division of the Wages Inspectorate a breakdown by wages council of (a) the number of firms inspected and number of workers whose pay was checked, showing those by visit and those by other method, (b) the number of firms found to be underpaying, (c) the number of workers underpaid, (d) the total arrears assessed and (e) the total arrears actually recovered, in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [pursuant to his reply, 3 April 1985, c. 626-7]: It is not the practice of the Wages Inspectorate to publish divisional analyses of the results of inspections by wages council trade. With that exception, the information requested relating to 1984 is given in the following table for the north-west (east) division.

North-West (East) division of the Wages Inspectorate—provisional results of inspections, 1984

	Number
Establishments where pay was checked by visit	1,301
Establishments found to be underpaying one or more workers	560
Workers whose pay was checked by visit	6,104
Workers found to have been underpaid	979
Arrears paid	115,859
Arrears waived by workers	26,455
Arrears not pursued	33,262
Total arrears assessed	175,576

In addition, the pay of 828 workers at 221 establishments was checked by postal questionnaire and found to be satisfactory. The pay of a further 52,199 workers at 954 branches of multiples which have head offices in the division was covered by satisfactory checks not involving an inspection visit. A number of these branches are located in other areas.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will publish by region and sub-region, the latest breakdown of Wages Inspectorate staff, showing separately those who are outdoor inspectors, on an establishment and in post basis, and if he will also publish comparable figures for April 1979.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [pursuant to his reply, 3 April 1985, c. 626-27]: The smallest area for which staffing figures are available is the Wages Inspectorate division.

Staff-in-post are not readily available for April 1979. The following table shows the number of authorised posts at April 1979 and the number of staff in post at September 1979 compared with the position at January 1985.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will publish for the years 1970, 1974 and 1978 onwards in respect of the north-west (east) division of the Wages Inspectorate (a) the number of wages council establishments registered, (b) the proportion of these inspected by visit, (c) the proportion of firms inspected by visit found to be underpaying, (d) the total arrears assessed and (e) the total arrears paid.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [pursuant to his reply, 3 April 1985, c. 626-27]: The information requested is given in the following table.

* Figures for the proportion of establishments visited and found to be underpaying one or more workers in 1970, 1974 and 1978 are available only for employers actually paying arrears.

† Provisional.

Note: These figures cannot be taken as an indication of the general level of compliance as the Inspectorate tends to concentrate visits on establishments which are more likely to be underpaying.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will publish estimates for 1984 on (a) establishments covered by wages councils, (b) numbers of inspections and underpayments, (c) numbers of workers covered, together with figures on underpayment and arrears assessed and (d) a regional breakdown of wages council inquiries, in the same format as that used in the reply given on 4 June 1984, Official Report, columns 103-104, together with a breakdown of arrears assessed and arrears actually paid by wages council and region; and whether he will also indicate the number and regional location of cases of underpayment where the employer was prosecuted, and where civil proceedings were taken to recover arrears of wages.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [pursuant to his reply, 3 April 1985, c. 626-27]: It is not the practice of the Wages Inspectorate to publish divisional analyses of underpayment by wages council trade. With that exception, the information requested relating to 1984 is given in the following tables.

Two employers in the south-west and eastern divisions of the Wages Inspectorate were prosecuted in 1984 for offences under the Wages Councils Act 1979.

Civil proceedings were brought against eight employers for the recovery of sums assessed as due in the eastern, Yorkshire and Humberside, London (east), London (west), south-west, south-east, Scotland (east) and Scotland (west) divisions.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 76

SESSION 1984-85

25th March—4th April 1985

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc., between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There will, however, be headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one will find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc., under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading 'Speakers rulings and statements'.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading 'Speaker'.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc. (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R=first reading, 2R=second reading, Money res=money resolution, Com=Committee stage, Rep=Report stage, 3R=third reading, amendt/amendts=amendment/amendments, *=matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of the volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
